When a gentleman of such high talents and extensive acquirements, addresses himself so much to the passions and party feelings, and so little to the reason and understanding of his audience, does it not, sir, afford a strong presumption that he is neither convinced of the soundness of the doctrine he advances, nor satisfied with the strength of the arguments he has to adduce in support of the measure he wishes to carry?

I observe, Mr. Chairman, on running my eye over the notes which I have taken in the course of the present debate, one circumstance which has been noticed by several gentlemen, and upon which they dwell with apparent triumph. They tell us that the members of the present Congress were elected with a view to the repeal of the act of the last session; that the people have thereby shown their disapprobation of the new organization of the Judiciary then adopted, and have expressed in a manner not to be misunderstood their sentiments in favor of the Constitutional doctrine now contended for. Gentlemen should really, however, consult facts and dates, before they indulge themselves in these round assertions. Is it not, sir, in the present instance, notorious to every body that the great majority, three-fourths at least, of the members of the present Congress, were chosen antecedent to the passage of the law in question? The elections, it is well known, had taken place in South Carolina, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and, I believe, all the New England States, before it was adopted. How, then, can gentlemen pretend to tell us at this day that the majority of the House were elected with a view to the repeal of a law which was not in existence at the time of their elections, and that the people had in this way expressed their opinions and sentiments on a Constitutional question, which could not, in the nature of things, have been before them?

I shall now, sir, and before I proceed to the discussion of the main question, beg leave to say a few words with respect to the document No. 8, which was presented to this House by the Executive, for the purpose of throwing additional light on the subject of the Judiciary, and which has been printed and dispersed throughout the continent with so much diligence and liberality. But allow me, sir, in the first place, to call the attention of the Committee to the President's Message at the commencement of the session, and remind them of what he there says on the subject. Speaking of the Judiciary, he expresses himself in the following words:

"The Judiciary system of the United States, and especially that portion of it recently erected, will of course present itself to the contemplation of Congress; and that they may be able to judge of the proportion which the institution bears to the business it has to perform, I have caused to be procured from the several States, and now lay before Congress, an exact statement of all the causes decided since the first establishment of the courts, and of those which were depending, when additional courts and judges were brought to their aid."

I know not, sir, whether this part of the Message made the same impressions on the mind of every gentleman who heard it read; but to me and all those to whom I have spoken on the subject, it certainly did appear to hold out the idea that the Executive had caused to be procured from the several States, and then laid before Congress, an exact statement of all the causes decided since the first establishment of Federal courts, and which were still depending before them. For myself, I did understand and expect that we were to have a complete and general view of the Judiciary in all its branches and ramifications. I observe, moreover, that all those gentlemen who either in this or the other branch of the Legislature, have referred to document No. 8, acted under this impression, and spoke of it as affording a general view of all the business which had been brought before the various and different courts of the United States. And such, in my humble opinion, ought in fact to have been the statement. We ought to have had a full and not a partial view of the subject, if it was necessary that we should have any official information at all with respect to it. Instead, however, of a general and comprehensive view of all the business before the Federal courts, we have only a partial and incorrect statement of the business which has been brought before a proportion (not all even of these) of the circuit courts under the old establishment: the very courts whose organization we contend was defective, and which the honorable and learned member from Delaware has proven beyond all possibility of doubt to have been found so very inconvenient in practice that suitors were driven from them, and forced, however against their inclination, to have recourse to other tribunals. If the document, therefore, incorrect as it avowedly is, proves anything, it goes to establish what we aver and contend for, to wit, that these courts were heretofore improperly organized, and did not afford that prompt and equal justice which the people of the United States have a right to expect, and ought to find in the national tribunals. And although I have not had an opportunity of procuring any information on the subject from my own immediate State, nor can be expected, being no professional man, to have acquired any practical knowledge of the business of the courts in the various parts of the Union, yet I have casually received some information from a neighboring State, which will at once show under how different an aspect the subject would present itself; how much more considerable the quantity of business brought before the Federal Courts would appear to have been had there been presented to our view a general statement of all the causes which have been or are now depending in all the different courts. It has been stated to me, on authority upon which I have every reason to rely, that the President had applied for cases in the city courts only, not in district courts; that there have been and are still, however, depending in the district courts of Virginia alone, suits to the number of twelve hundred, more than half of which are yet undetermined, and that there is no doubt but that other States have their suits in the same proportion.

The Committee will at once perceive in how very different a light this subject would have appeared to the eyes of the American world, both as to the quantity and importance of the business, under the cognizance of the Federal Judiciary, had a general statement, as was expected, of all the causes which have been brought before any and each of the courts, been submitted to us by the Executive.

Whilst on this subject, I beg permission, sir, to state another piece of information which I have received with respect to the courts of Virginia. It is stated in the document No. 8, respecting the circuit court which sits at Lexington, for the western district of Virginia, "that no causes were decided or depending in the circuit court of the western district of Virginia." But no reason is given; and the inference necessarily drawn from this by the public must no doubt be, that there was no business to be done in that court. I am credibly informed, however, that there was neither a marshal nor an attorney for that court when the judges met, nor was there any jury summoned. The commission, it seems, of marshal, for Mr. Grattan, and of attorney for General Blackburn, which had been made out, sealed, and ordered to be put into the post office, under the old Administration, (without being actually put in the mail,) were suppressed upon a change taking place in the Administration; and it was not until after the date of the docket, that Mr. Moore and Mr. Monroe received their commissions as marshal and attorney of that district. I am further told, that, as soon as the federal court met, thus organized, fifteen suits were instituted. Now, sir, were not these facts known to those who framed the document No. 8? And, if known, ought there not, in fairness and candor, to have been some notice taken of them in the exact statement, instead of admitting the insinuation which it conveys, as it now stands, viz: that there was no business at all to be transacted in the circuit court for the western district of Virginia?

[Here Mr. HUGER was interrupted by Mr. HOLLAND, from North Carolina, who wished to know the authority upon which he made these statements. Mr. H. said, in reply, that he did not conceive himself bound to give his authority; nor did he think proper to gratify the honorable gentleman's curiosity, in this respect, unless called upon to do so by the House. It was sufficient that he believed the information he had received to be correct: he stated what he conceived to be facts in his place. If he was incorrect, or misinformed, it became gentlemen on the other side to deny the facts, and point out to the Committee in what respect the information he had given was erroneous.]

Mr. H. then continued. I shall not, sir, encroach further on the time and indulgence of the Committee by any other desultory observations, but shall proceed to consider, as well as my feeble means will permit, the merits of the main question, and the bill now under consideration.

The bill sent down from the Senate, and now before the Committee, involves two very distinct questions. It is proposed, in the first place, to repeal the act for the better organization of the Judiciary, passed at the last session, and thereby to revive the former Judicial establishment. Was this the only consequence—the whole effect of the bill—I should feel little anxiety as to the result of the present debate. For, defective as the old system is conceived to have been, I have no doubt but that we might have hobbled on with it a few years longer, until further experience should have induced some future Congress to alter and amend it. Certain additional judges, however, having been required and appointed under the act of the last session, a simple and unqualified repeal of that act necessarily deranges and deprives them of their offices. Hence arises another question of far greater magnitude—in my estimation all-important, viz: Whether this can be constitutionally done? In other words, whether the judges of the federal courts are to hold their offices during good behaviour, as the Constitution would seem to require, or at the pleasure of the other two branches of the Legislature—the construction now contended for?

Having been one of those who, in a former Congress, contributed to bring about those alterations in the federal courts, which it is at this time proposed to do away, I may well be supposed to feel a partiality for, and to be prejudiced in favor of, them. To this partial feeling—to these prejudices—it is perhaps owing, Mr. Chairman, that, notwithstanding all that torrent of abuse which has been so liberally, but with so little foundation, bestowed on the law of the last session; notwithstanding the labored and learned arguments which I have heard and read on the subject, both within and without these doors, I am still so much of a heretic as to believe that the former organization of the Federal Judiciary was defective, and that it has been improved upon and amended by the new system. I am still so unreasonable as to suppose (judging from my own feelings and impressions) that the framers of the law it is now proposed to repeal might have been actuated by motives less criminal and impure than those which have been so charitably attributed to them by their political opponents, and that some grounds might be adduced in favor of the provisions introduced into it not altogether untenable. It has, however, been echoed and re-echoed, from one end of the continent to the other, that the present was a hasty and novel system—totally unnecessary—suddenly brought forward with party views—adopted for party purposes, and hurried through the last Congress by small majorities, in either branch of the Legislature. I will not undertake to say, sir, that those who passed the law, now so much deprecated, were totally exempt from party feelings; nor will I deny that it was adopted at a late stage of the last session, and carried by no very large majority, either in the Senate or the House of Representatives. I do contend, however, that the measure cannot, in fairness and candor, be attributed to mere party motives, distinct from all public advantage; that the defects of the old system have been for years back complained of; that Congress have been again and again called on to remedy them, and that the most important change—the vital principle contained in the new system—has been in contemplation from the very commencement of the present Government, and has been heretofore warmly advocated by gentlemen of the very political sect which now raise such a clamor against it. Let us test these assertions by facts and dates.

One of the most pressing and not least important duties of the first Congress, under the present Constitution, was to organize and establish national tribunals for administering justice, and carrying the laws of the Union into effect. They took the business up, therefore, at a very early period, and adopted a plan, of which I request to give the outlines.

The United States were divided into thirteen districts, to each of which a resident judge was appointed. These districts (except those of Kentucky and Maine) were again classed into three circuits—the eastern, middle, and southern. In compliance with the express injunctions of the Constitution, a Supreme Court was also established, the members of which were composed of a chief justice and five associate judges. The chief justice and his associates were not only to do the duty of judges of the Supreme Court, but alternately to make the tour of the United States; and two of them, united with the district judge of the district in which they met, were to hold the circuit court. North Carolina and Rhode Island having afterwards accepted the Federal Constitution, were erected into new districts, as were also Vermont and Tennessee, upon their being admitted into the Union as separate and distinct States.

Such, in a few words, was the system originally adopted in the year 1789. But no sooner had it been put into operation, than the inconveniences and defects of it began to be perceived and felt. In the very next year, (as early as the year 1790,) the attention of Congress was called again to the Judiciary; and the Attorney General (Edmund Randolph) was desired to report, and did present a very detailed and elaborate report, on the subject. In the course of this report, Mr. Randolph (as I shall presently show) disapproves, in the most unequivocal terms, of the principle which had been adopted of making the judges of the Supreme Court ride the circuits, and recommends the very change which was introduced into the law of the last session, and is now so much reprobated by his political friends. Nothing, however, having been done in the business at that time, complaints continued to pour in from all quarters; and a succeeding Congress found themselves (in 1799) obliged to modify the law so far as to do away the necessity of two judges in the Supreme Court attending the same circuit, and to allow a circuit court to be held by the district and a single judge of the Supreme Court. This modification of the law lessened, it is true, the bodily labors of the judges, and so far obviated the inconveniences which had been experienced. But the remedy was still not found equal to the disease. Did a judge attempt to proceed by sea, from the eastern or middle, to South Carolina, or any other of the Southern States, the vessel failed perhaps to sail at the time appointed, or was delayed by contrary winds, and the business of the court was consequently delayed, or postponed altogether to another term. Was a land conveyance preferred, the rising of rivers, bad roads, bad horses—a thousand other accidents to which travellers are necessarily liable—not unfrequently interrupted in the same way the business of the courts; and suitors, after a great expense of time, money, and trouble, were sent home as they came, with their business unsettled and undecided.

These physical impediments alone, not to speak of the instability and want of uniformity in the decisions and proceedings of the circuit courts, which were the necessary and inevitable consequences of this constant change in the person of the judges living in different parts of the United States, and accustomed in their several States to such different and sometimes contradictory rules and modes of transacting business; these physical impediments, I say alone, soon convinced all reasonable men, who had anything to do with the courts, how defective and inadequate to the due administration of justice, must necessarily be this system of sending the judges, like so many post-boys, whipping and spurring through mud and mire, from one end of this vast continent to the other. Complaints and representations, therefore, were still made from various quarters, and a revision of the Judiciary was again and again, year after year, recommended to Congress, as well by the Executive as the judges themselves. I well recollect, indeed, from the time of my return from Europe, in the latter end of the year 1791, and long before I had it even in idea that the indulgence and partiality of my fellow-citizens would honor me with a place on this floor—I well recollect to have heard this plan of an itinerant judiciary complained of and reprobated in every company, and not the least by those characters in my own State, whose opinions and judgments I was most accustomed to respect and revere. I recollect equally well, sir, that at the commencement of the session, in which I was first honored with a seat in Congress, a revision of the Judiciary was recommended by the Executive, and a committee, composed of some of the most able and respectable members of this House, were appointed for the purpose of taking this subject into consideration, and did report a bill for the better organization of the Judiciary. This bill, after having been a number of times under consideration, and undergone a variety of amendments, was committed to the same committee, who, in conformity with the amendments adopted in the House, gave it a new shape and reported a second bill, of which the present law is, I believe, nearly an exact copy.

And here, sir, permit me to observe, in contradiction to what has fallen from several gentlemen, the honorable member from Virginia (Mr. GILES) in particular, and what has been so constantly urged out of doors, that the present organization of the Judiciary was predicated entirely on party grounds, and with a view to the changes of party which have since taken place; in contradiction to this assertion, permit me to observe that, at the time I am now alluding to, when a revision was recommended by the Executive, and the bill, of which I have just spoken, was presented to the House, the Federal sect, as it has been since termed, was in the zenith of its glory, in the height of its power. An election had lately taken place, and a larger majority was returned in favor of the Federal Administration, than had ever before appeared in any former Congress, nor was there the least reason to anticipate the change of men which has since taken place. The framers, therefore, of the new system, have been most erroneously and unjustly accused of bringing it forward in the expectation of such a change; the very contrary being the fact, and the present system having been presented to Congress at the very moment when their political prospect bore the brightest and most promising aspect. Partly owing, however, to the deference which many had for the gentleman who was the author of the old plan, partly owing to the difference of opinion among the Federalists themselves, whether it was most expedient to change this plan altogether, or to endeavor to remedy the evils complained of, by adding a certain number of additional judges to the Supreme Court, and partly to the press of business, and an inclination to give time for further consideration, the subject was allowed to lie over until the next session.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

We had scarcely met, however, for the first time at the present seat of Government, long before the fate of the Presidential election was known, when the subject was again taken up, and the House were called on to adopt the law, which finally prevailed. After this plain tale, this simple narrative, the truth and correctness of which no one will deny, I leave it to the Committee and to the world to decide, with what propriety or justice this system has been branded and reprobated in such glowing colors as a hasty, novel, and unnecessary measure, hurried through the two Houses at the fag-end of a dying Administration, for the purpose of affording sinecure retreats to a few favorite characters. Gentlemen may show their ingenuity and inventive talents by the fabrication of such tales at the time of elections, but let us hear no more of them in this place.

There appears to me, indeed, Mr. Chairman, to have been a radical error in the original organization of that part of the old plan which relates to the circuit courts. In this opinion I am happy to have it in my power to show that I am supported by that of the gentleman already alluded to, Mr. Edmund Randolph, a gentleman high in the ranks, and high in the estimation of our political opponents. In the report presented by Mr. Randolph to Congress, in the year 1790, and which I have before quoted, to prove that the principle adopted in the present law, so far from being a novel one, was in contemplation from the very commencement of the Government. In this report, Mr. Randolph expresses himself in the following words, which, as they come from a quarter gentlemen cannot object to, will, I trust, command their attention, and have due weight with them in making up their minds on the present question :

“ A third alteration which the Attorney General cannot fail to suggest is, that the judges of the Supreme Court shall cease to be judges of the circuit courts. It is obvious that the inferior courts should be distinct bodies from the Supreme Court. But how far it may confound these two species of courts to suffer the judges of the supreme to hold seats on the circuit bench, he declines the discussion, and circumscribes his reflections within the pale of expediency only :

“ 1. Those who pronounce the law of the land without appeal, ought to be pre-eminent in most endowments of the mind. Survey the functions of a judge of the Supreme Court. He must be master of the common law in all its divisions; a chancellor, a civilian, a federal jurist, and skilled in the laws of each State. To expect that, in future times, this assemblage of talents will be ready without further study for the national service, is to confide too largely in the public fortune. Most vacancies on the bench will be supplied by professional men, who, perhaps, have been too much animated by the contentions of the bar deliberately to explore this extensive range of science. In a great measure, then, the supreme judges will form themselves after their nomination. But what leisure remains from their itinerant dispensation of justice? Sum up all the fragments of their time, hold their fatigue at naught, and let them bid adieu to all domestic concerns, still the average term of life, already advanced, will be too short for any important proficiency.

“ 2. The detaching of the judges to different circuits defeats the benefits of an unprejudiced consultation. The delivery of a solemn opinion in court commits them, and should a judgment rendered by two be erroneous, will they meet their four brethren unbiassed? May not human nature, thus trammelled, struggle too long against convictions? And how few would erect a monument to their candor at the expense of their reputation for firmness and discernment!

“ 3. Jealousy among the members of a court is always an evil, and its malignity would be double should it creep into the Supreme Court, obscure the discovery of right, and weaken the respect which the public welfare seeks for its decrees. But this cannot be affirmed to be beyond the compass of events, to men agitated by the constant scanning of the Judicial conduct of each other.

“ 4. If this should not happen, there is fresh danger on the other side, lest they should be restrained by delicacy and mutual tenderness, from probing, without scruple, what had been done in circuit courts. A schism of sentiment before a decision and after a free conference is not esteemed harsh; but it is very painful to undertake to satisfy another that, in a public opinion, already uttered, he has been in the wrong.

“ 5. Situated as the United States are, many of the most weighty Judiciary questions will be perfectly novel. These must be hurried off on the circuits, where necessary books are not to be had, or relinquished for argument before the next set of judges, who, on their part, may want books and a calmer season for thought. So that a cause may be suspended until every judge shall have heard it.

“ 6. The supreme judges themselves, who ride the circuits, will be soon graduated in the public mind in relation to the circuits; will soon be considered as circuit judges, and will not be often appreciated as supreme judges. When a discomfited party looks up to the highest tribunal for redress, he is told by the report of the world, that in it every quality is centered necessary to justice. But how would his sanguine hopes be frustrated, if, among six judges, two are most probably to repeat their former suffrages, or to vindicate them with strenuous ability, or if to avoid this, the wisdom of the third of the number must be laid aside?"

I am, then, supported by this high authority and these powerful arguments in saying, that the inferior courts ought to be distinct bodies from the Supreme Court. It is evident, however, that, under the old organization of the Judiciary, these two species of courts were, in a great degree, amalgamated and confounded. I do regard this, sir, as a radical vice in the old system, and I have my doubts, (which seems also to have been the case with the learned gentleman whom I have just quoted, though he does not, it is true, express himself to this effect, in clear and positive terms;) I have my doubts whether the plain meaning and intention of the Constitution has not been in this point infringed. When that instrument provides "that there shall be a Supreme Court and such other inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time ordain and establish," can any one suppose the object of this provision to be merely that the courts should be nominally distinct, and be known under different appellations, but might be all held by the same individuals, the same set of judges, presiding alternately in each of them? This system of constantly appealing from the decisions of men, sitting in a lower, to the same men, seated under a new title, in a court of higher grade, appears to me neither to satisfy the obvious intention of the Constitution, nor to comport with the dictates of common sense. But, if such a principle be tolerated even in the inferior courts, it is obviously incorrect as relates to the Supreme Court, a court of the last resort, and from the decisions of which there is no appeal. Let me ask, sir, what must be the feelings, what necessarily the impression on the minds of foreign or domestic suitors, drawn from the remote parts of the Union, who, on an appeal from the decision of a district judge, meet the same individual seated in a higher capacity, on the circuit bench, and when again on a further appeal to the Supreme Court, they recognise the same faces, the same individuals, from whose decisions in the circuit courts, they had just before appealed? Can it be presumed that suitors will, in this case, go away as well satisfied, as perfectly convinced of the equity and justice of a confirmation of the decisions of the courts below, as they might be expected to do, had they found this final and ultimate decree to proceed from an entirely new set of judges, unprejudiced and unfettered by what had preceded, and presumed from their high grade, to be of the most eminent talents and first standing in society? Yet such was the necessary consequence of the former organization of the courts. And what else has been contemplated in the new system, but to obviate this inconvenience, and do away this exceptionable part of the old plan? The only change, in fact the vital principle of the present law, is nothing more nor less than to establish the point that, instead of the same individuals sitting and holding the different courts, each district court should have its separate and distinct judge or set of judges. Now where, I pray you, sir, is the mighty error, the great crime committed in bringing about this change? I ask with confidence, whether the principle be not correct in itself, and whether it does not accord equally with the dictates of common sense, and the plain meaning and fair construction of the provisions contained in the Constitution?

If, however, it can be for a moment supposed to have been the intention of the wise men who framed the Constitution, that the national courts were to be distinct in name, but to be all held by the same individuals, the same set of judges; if it be the wisdom and enlightened policy of the present day to establish, not the most wholesome and convenient organization of the Federal Judiciary, but that which will save the greatest number of pence and require the smallest possible number of judges, why not get rid at once of all the judges of the inferior courts? The Chief Justice and his five Associates, or even the half of them, could no doubt dispatch all the business of the Federal courts. They might be packed up in a State wagon, make in due course the small circuit of this petty empire, and decide all the trifling and unimportant causes which would be brought before them, alternately sitting as judges of the district, circuit, and supreme courts. We should, by such an arrangement, not only save the twenty or thirty thousand dollars, which is so much complained of, and may be appropriated so much more advantageously to the payment of the President's salary, but a still further sum of seventy-seven to eighty thousand dollars; a sum equal to the whole amount of that most abominable of all abominable taxes, that tax so grinding to the poor, which, we are told, it requires such a host of officers and such an enormous per centage, to collect which takes from the mouth of labor such an immense portion of its earnings, and which of course must and ought to be repealed. I allude, Mr. Chairman, to the tax so well known under the title of a tax on pleasurable carriages. Gentlemen would, in all probability, have the further gratification of seeing the number of causes diminish daily in the Federal courts, and when we are favored with another exact statement on this subject, it will be found, perhaps, that they are reduced, as they no doubt ought to be, merely to those affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls. The whole business of the Union will thus be happily restored to the State courts, to which it of right belongs, and from which it has been torn, vi et armis, under the wicked Administrations of Washington and Adams, and heretofore retained, in spite of, and in direct opposition to, the wishes of the parties most immediately concerned.

But in another and still more comprehensive view of the subject, it would seem to me, Mr.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

Chairman, improper and inexpedient to repeal the law of the last session at this time. It is but too true, we all know it, sir, that parties do exist in our Government; that shades of political difference do unfortunately divide the American people. In free Governments this must ever be the case. Still, however, let it not be forgotten that we are citizens of one and the same country, and have a common interest in the public and general welfare. Would it not then be wise and prudent, would it not tend to do away, in a great measure, the baneful effect of party, and to promote harmony among our fellow-citizens, if in the changes of men and of parties, which must necessarily take place in the administration of public affairs, we accustomed ourselves to act with some little delicacy towards each other, and to pay some little respect to the measures of those who have immediately preceded us? Whilst we improve and amend what in practice is found useless or inadequate to the end proposed, would it not be as well to forbear from making innovations merely for the sake of change, or to gratify our party pique or party feelings? The present system, it is granted, has been established by the political opponents of those now in power. Be it so. The preceding organization of the Judiciary, however, was a wretchedly defective and inadequate to the due administration of justice. Some amendments have been made to it. A new system has been adopted. It is just carried into operation, and all the inconveniences and expense which usually attend such changes, have been felt and incurred. No one can pretend to complain of any defects in the present establishment from experience, for it is scarcely yet carried into complete operation. Would it not be as well, then, to try the experiment, to wait and see the practical advantages or disadvantages of the system? It would be prudent also, I humbly conceive, sir, to take this course for another reason, viz: the effect which these frequent and sudden changes in our most important establishments must be expected to have on our credit, and in no small degree, perhaps, on the reputation of our Government among foreigners. Fickleness and instability have ever been the bane of republican institutions. The nations of Europe know this well. They have their eye upon us, and watch all our motions. This want of stability in our establishments; these sudden and hasty changes in our measures, cannot, therefore, but affect our reputation and character, as well abroad as at home.

One word, sir, before I conclude my observations on this part of the subject, with respect to the additional expense incurred by the new arrangement. It has been said, that the Federal Judiciary costs the United States one hundred and thirty or forty thousand dollars; and from the manner in which this sum is brought forward and presented to our view, it might seem that the whole of this expense was to be attributed to the new system. What, however, is the fact? Upon a fair statement, and after making the deduction of the salary of one judge of the Supreme Court, whose place is vacated after the death of the present incumbent, the additional expense will be only from twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars. It is further to be observed, even with respect to this sum, that the number of judges of the Supreme Court, had the old establishment been retained, or should it now be revived, is allowed on all hands to be inadequate to the bodily fatigue and duties imposed upon them. Gentlemen have consequently all acknowledged it heretofore, and several of them, the member from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) in particular, have in the course of the present debate stated it as their opinion, that it would be necessary to increase the number of judges of the Supreme Court, if the present bill prevails. Now it is to be recollected, that the associate judges receive a salary of three thousand five hundred dollars each, and laying aside the danger of rendering this body inconveniently numerous and unwieldy, by augmenting their numbers, each additional judge must receive the above salary of three thousand five hundred dollars; whilst the present circuit judges are allowed but two thousand dollars per annum. The addition, therefore, of half the number of judges to the Supreme Court (which there is every reason to believe it is in contemplation to make, if the circuit judges are gotten rid of) would cost the United States, within a few hundred pounds, if not quite as much, as the additional judges required under the present arrangement, to get rid of whom such extraordinary pains are taken, and an expense of twenty or thirty thousand dollars already incurred, even in carrying the business thus far through the two Houses of Congress. Such is the saving wisdom, the wonderful economy, of these enlightened days! We set the whole nation in a flame, and spend thousands in one way, to the end that we may have the appearance of saving a few hundreds in another.

But, however wholesome and proper the amendments which took place at the last session in the organization of the Federal courts, appear to me to have been, I should submit without difficulty to the proposed repeal, did it only involve the mere question of expediency. I should be perfectly satisfied to gratify the whim and caprice of the majority who have at the present time the control over public affairs, in this as well as so many other respects. It is not on this ground, sir, that I am led to make so decided an opposition to the measure under consideration, and look forward with such trembling anxiety to the result of the present debate. Very different motives, considerations of a far more important nature influence my conduct and vote on this occasion. To me it appears that one of the great principles, one of the leading excellencies of our national compact is in danger of being destroyed. I feel a strong conviction on my mind, that the most stable support, the main pillar of the noble fabric already totters on its foundation, and is about to be tumbled prostrate in the dust.

We have heard a great deal, Mr. Chairman, both within and without these walls, of the discoveries and improvements which have of late years been made in the science and practice of government. Among these I had been taught to regard as by no means the least important, that maxim, which goes to establish the complete separation of the three great branches of Government, the Executive, Legislative, and Judiciary. I had, till the present day, been taught to reverence as a still more important discovery, as the climax of improvement in modern jurisprudence, the principle we now contend for, and which asserts the absolute independence of the latter of the other two branches of Government. Such is the doctrine I have seen inculcated in all modern authors of reputation, which have fallen into my hands. This political creed I had, I thought, imbibed from the best publications, and most approved authorities of our own country, and from none more decidedly than that so well known under the title of "The Federalist;" a work attributed to the joint labors and combined talents of three of the most able statesmen America can boast, and avowedly the best commentary on the Federal Constitution which has made its appearance in print. I will not take up the time of the Committee by referring to the different parts of this celebrated work, which go to the support of the doctrine we advocate. It is in the hands of every one, and I call upon, I challenge gentlemen to point out the page, the sentence, or the line, which does not inculcate and strongly enforce this principle of the entire and absolute independence of the Judiciary. There is another authority, however, of equal eminence, though of later date and less notoriety, to which I shall beg leave to call the attention of the Committee.

In the former part of my argument, I had it in my power to produce in support of the expediency of the judicial system, adopted by us at the last session, an official opinion, (given at an early period of the present Government,) of a learned gentleman, high in the ranks, and no less high in the estimation of that very party which now oppose it with such vehemence and clamor. I am so fortunate, sir, as to be at present able to offer to the Committee, an authority equally high, and in no way less respectable, also drawn from the State which at this time takes the lead, and from the ranks of our political opponents, to prove the Constitutional doctrine we are contending for. I have in my hands, sir, a paper containing the sentiments on this subject, delivered long before it was foreseen that the present question would be agitated on this floor, of one of the most eminent law characters of the State of Virginia—the gentleman who has been selected to inculcate the principles of republicanism in the minds of the youth of that country, and to teach them the genuine doctrines of our State and Federal Constitutions. I now allude to Judge Tucker, professor of law in the college of William and Mary, and one of the judges in the Supreme Court of Virginia. This document, from which I am about to state the opinion of the learned judge on this Constitutional point, does not, it is true, come recommended by an official stamp, as did the report of the Attorney General. It carries, however, with it, every mark of authenticity, nor have I any reason to doubt, but that it contains the genuine sentiments of this celebrated professor, as coolly and calmly made up in the retirement of his study, and delivered by him to his pupils in his public lectures. If I am mistaken, and the sentiments which have been attributed to Mr. Tucker are not genuine, there are several gentlemen, one in particular, not now in his seat, but in the House I believe, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) who will have it in their power to correct me, and state the truth to the Committee. Having premised this much, sir, I shall now beg leave to state the opinion and sentiments of the learned Judge in his own words, to wit:

"The Constitution and powers of the Judiciary department of the Federal Government have been equally the subject of applause and censure, of confidence and jealousy.

"The unexceptionable mode of appointing the judges and their Constitutional independence of every other branch of the Government, merit an eulogium, which all would have concurred in bestowing on this part of the Constitution of the United States, had not the powers of that department been extended to objects, which might hazard the tranquillity of the Union in attempting to secure it."

[Mr. Tucker then proceeds to define more at large the powers and objects here alluded to, but concludes with the following remarks:]

"All these objections, seem, however, to be completely removed by the amendments which were recommended by the first Congress, and have since been ratified."

[The Judge here again goes on to speak of the suability of the States, through which subject, the Constitution being in that respect also amended, it is unnecessary to follow him; after which he thus proceeds:]

"But whatever objections may be made to the Judicial power of the Federal Government, as it relates to the States, in other respects, as now organized and limited by the Constitution itself, by the amendments proposed by Congress, and since adopted, and by the act above referred to, (to wit, the act limiting the jurisdiction to a certain sum,) we may venture to pronounce, that it is worthy every eulogium that ever has been pronounced on the Judiciary of Great Britain, to which it is in no respect inferior; being indeed in all respects perfectly assimilated thereto, with the addition of a Constitutional instead of a legal independence only. Whatever there has been said by Bacon, Montesquieu, Delolme, Blackstone, or any other writer, on the security derived to the subject from the independence of the Judiciary of Great Britain, will apply at least as forcibly to that of the United States. We may go still further: In England the Judiciary may be overwhelmed by a combination between the Executive and Legislature. In America it is rendered absolutely independent of and superior to the attempts of both to control or crush it. First, by the tenure of office, which is during good behaviour." Secondly, by the independence of their salaries, which cannot be diminished. Thirdly, by the letter of the Constitution, which defines and limits the powers of the several branches of Government. Lastly, by that uncontrollable authority in matters of legislation, which is exclusively vested in that department, and which extends to every possible case, that can affect the life, liberty, or property of the individual, as a member of the Federal Republic, except in the case of impeachment. The American Constitution appears to be the first in which this absolute independence of the Judiciary has been carried into full effect. Dr. Rutherford considers the Judiciary as a branch of the Executive authority, and such in strictness it may still be considered in other countries, since its province is to advise the Executive rather than to act independently thereof. In this sense, the Judiciary are said to be one of the King's councils in England—but with us the Judiciary power is a distinct and independent branch of the Government, recognised as such in express terms in our State bill of rights and constitution, and demonstrably so too, by the Constitution of the United States, from which it derives all power, in like manner as the Executive and Legislative powers are distributed to the other departments of the Government. The obligation which the Constitution of the United States imposes upon the Judiciary to support the Constitution would be nugatory, if it were dependent on either of the other branches, or in any manner subject to control by them, since such control might operate to the destruction of the Constitution."

"And here we cannot but observe, that the Judiciary power cannot of itself oppress the citizen. The Executive must lend its aid in every case, where oppression can ensue from its decisions; but its decisions in favor of the citizen are carried into instantaneous effect, by delivering him from the coercion of the Executive officer, the moment that judgment of acquittal is pronounced, and herein consists the excellence of our Constitution, that no individual can be oppressed whilst this branch of the Government remains uncorrupted: it being a necessary check upon the encroachments of power by either of the other. Thus, if the Legislature should pass a law dangerous to the liberties of the people, the Judiciary are to pronounce not only whether the party accused be guilty of a violation thereof, but whether such law be permitted by the Constitution. If, for example, a law were passed prohibiting the free exercise of religion, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people to assemble peaceably, or to keep and bear arms, it would be the province of the Judiciary to decide that the power of the Legislature did not extend to the making of such a law, and consequently to acquit the prisoner from any penalty, which might be annexed to the breach of such an unconstitutional law.

"Should he be persecuted by the Executive, it is the province of the Judiciary to decide, whether there be any law that authorizes the proceedings against him, and if there be none, to acquit him not only of the present but of all future prosecutions for the same cause. The power of pardon, which is vested in the Executive, constitutes a proper check on the Judiciary in its turn. On this circumstance, however, no great stress can be laid, since in criminal prosecutions the Executive is, in the eye of the law, always plaintiff, and where the prosecution is actually carried on by its direction, the purity of the Judiciary is the only security for the citizen. The Judiciary, therefore, are that department of the Government, to whom the protection of the rights of the citizen is by the Constitution especially confided."

Such, sir are the sentiments of this learned and enlightened judge; a gentleman, as I before observed, avowedly and well known to be of the political party of the other side of the House. And let me ask, whether it be possible to bring, on any subject, an authority more to the point in dispute; or whether Mr. Tucker could have expressed, in terms more forcible and less equivocal, his opinion in favor of the doctrine we advocate, viz: that the Judiciary is a distinct and separate branch of the Government, and that it is equally and absolutely independent, as well of the Legislature as the Executive, or of both united. Such, too, I contend, and firmly believe, to have been heretofore the approved and generally received doctrine of the American world, and such appears to me to be the language which the people of America have spoken, as well in their State constitutions as in our federal compact. Will you permit me, sir, to turn to these constitutions and see what is the language they hold on this subject.

In the bill of rights, prefixed to that of New Hampshire, I find these words: "The three essential powers of Government, viz. the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial, ought to be kept as separate from, and independent of each other, as the nature of a free government will admit." In another section, "It is the right of every citizen to be tried by judges as impartial as the lot of humanity will admit. It is therefore, not only the best policy, but for the security of the rights of the people, that the judges should hold their offices so long as they behave well." These provisions were, I believe, borrowed from, and are to be found nearly verbatim in the constitution of Massachusetts. In New York, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, I find these three branches separated with the same care, and the judges declared to hold their offices during good behaviour. The constitution of Maryland expressly provides "that the Executive, Legislative and Judicial powers of the government ought to be forever separate and distinct from each other, and that the judges ought to hold their commissions during good behaviour." In the constitution of the State of Virginia, I meet with the same sentiments, to wit: "The Legislative, Executive and Judiciary departments shall be separate and distinct, so that neither exercise the powers properly belonging to the other;" and I find it further provided, that the judges shall continue in office during good behaviour. But it would be superfluous to encroach longer on the patience of the Committee, by other examples from the State constitutions. They all of them establish the complete separation of the three great branches of government; all of them inculcate, more or less strongly, the independence of the Judiciary on the other two branches, and, with one or two exceptions, all adopt the tenure of good behaviour, as that, under which the judge are to hold their offices. In this place, therefore, it may not be amiss to say a few words with respect to this tenure, and to examine how far it extends.

To an unprejudiced mind, to a man of plain but sound understanding, making up his opinion from the usual meaning and common acceptance of words, it would I think appear, that a right or power given to be held and exercised during good behaviour, would, and ought to be retained by the person, on whom it was bestowed, so long as he continues to behave well, nor could he forfeit it otherwise than behaving ill, i. e. ceasing to behave well. It is now contended, however, that we are not to judge of the force and effect of these words, according to their plain meaning and common acception. We are told, that the words "holding during good behaviour" compose a technical phrase, and that in order to apply them correctly, we must cast our eyes across the Atlantic, and see what is their operation in England, the country from which we derive them.

Mr. Chairman, it has not been my good fortune to be initiated in the mysteries of the law. I am no professional man; nothing more or less than a plain farmer, or to use a more appropriate term of my native State, a plain and, I trust, honest planter. I cannot hope, therefore, to throw much light on a legal question; nor do I feel myself adequate to the discussion of legal terms and niceties. I will, nevertheless, claim the indulgence of the Committee, while I make a few observations on the subject, even in this point of view.

In the earlier stages of the English, as well as many other European Governments, the King sat and administered justice in his own immediate person. This state of things, however, neither could nor did last for any very considerable length of time. It was soon found expedient to dispense with the personal attendance of the Prince, and the administration of justice devolved on certain substitutes, who were still supposed to represent his person, acted in his name, and held their offices at his pleasure. As the darkness and ignorance of the middle ages were dispersed, and the inhabitants of Europe became more enlightened, the feudal chiefs in the first instance, and afterwards the people, generally, increased in power, and procured to themselves certain rights and charters. By degrees they came also to participate in the legislation and government of the country. But the laws were still interpreted, and justice administered, by the creatures of the Crown; and experience sufficiently proved, that while the judges were left at the mercy of the Prince, they would invent modes and find evasions, by means of which the will of him on whom they depended might be carried into execution. The necessity, therefore, of establishing the independence of the judges became evident, and the people of England, after a long struggle, succeeded in carrying this point. The judges, instead of holding their commissions durante bene placito, during pleasure, as heretofore, received them under a new tenure, quam diu se bene gesserint, during good behaviour; nor could the King any longer remove them, except on an address from both Houses of Parliament. This was all that was necessary, all that was required, all that could be done; for, as the two Houses of Parliament and the Crown united, possess what has been styled political omnipotence, as they act not only in the confined sphere of agents, bound down by certain fixed rules and a written constitution, but are supposed also to represent the nation in its original capacity, there is nothing so sacred under this system of government which they cannot and do not control and alter at their pleasure and discretion. The Judiciary continues, nevertheless, in that country, to be a subordinate department; the judges continue still to hold of, and from the Crown, to administer justice in its name, and are supposed to be an emanation from the regal power. The courts are still called the King's courts; the judges, the King's judges. This being the case, as respects the King's power and prerogatives in England, gentlemen now bring forward the monstrous doctrine, that the Executive stands precisely in the place of the Crown, and imply that the Judiciary are placed in precisely the same relative situation with respect to him as that of England is to the Crown. Is this really the case, Mr. Chairman? Is the Judiciary of the United States really subordinate to the Executive? Do the judges indeed hold, as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) tells us, of and from the President, that very President, at whose trial, in case of impeachment, one of them is to preside; do they indeed administer justice in his name? Does their power emanate from him? Are the Federal courts the courts of the President, the Federal judges his judges? No, sir, the Federal courts are the courts of the United States. Justice is administered in the name of the United States. The judges are only known as judges of the United States. They hold their commissions of and from, and act under the authority of the United States. What, then, is the fair inference? Against what power under our Constitution was the tenure of good behaviour intended to operate? I say, sir, the fair and honest inference is, that this tenure was intended as a limitation and restraint against the United States in its corporate capacity; that is, against the Government of the United States, which in fact and in truth, are placed in the same relative situation with respect to the Judiciary, in which the Crown stands in that country of which we have been speaking. The native citizens of America, Mr. Chairman, are a plain but shrewd people, of sound and distinguishing minds, and possessed of their full share of common sense. They are not apt to do things idly, to adopt measures which mean nothing, and are of no avail. It, therefore, is paying them but a poor compliment, to suppose that when they adopted this tenure they intended it to operate only against that branch of the Government which did not possess the powers and prerogatives, against which the check was originally aimed and directed in the country from whence we are supposed to borrow it. They looked not, sir, to the sound, but the substance; they regarded not the name or the title, but the thing itself; they meant not to combat a shadow, a nonentity, but to limit and restrain the power itself, in whatever branch it might appear to have been deposited under the Constitution, and which, possessing or assuming the prerogative of the British Crown, might be disposed to make the Judiciary a subordinate department of the Government, or to affect the independence of the judges. Therefore, whatever branch of the Government assumes this power, from whatever quarter the attempt is made to render the Judiciary subordinate to its will and pleasure, and to infringe the independence of the judges, this Constitutional barrier stares them in the face, and upon a fair and honest construction of the tenure under which the people have willed that the Federal judges should hold their commissions, they can only forfeit them, (while the Constitution lasts, or until the people think proper to alter it) they can only forfeit them by ceasing to behave well; they can only be deprived of them by impeachment.

That this is the construction heretofore given to the tenure of good behaviour in the American world may, I think, also be proved by a further reference to the State constitutions. In those of New Hampshire and New York, it is expressly declared, that the judges, who hold their offices during good behaviour, shall not continue in them after reaching a specified age—sixty or seventy years—and in that of Massachusetts, that the Governor, with the consent of Council, may remove the judges, holding under the same tenure, upon the address of both Houses. Here I say, in the first instance, the exception proves the rule. If the judges were not to hold their offices (but for this exception) during their lives and good behaviour; to what end, with what possible view, was the exception as to age introduced? In the latter case, if the other two branches have, (as is contended) in the nature of things, and of course, the right of deranging and the power of depriving the judges of their offices, why was the proviso adopted? What necessity could there have been to grant this power expressly to them in the Constitution? Is it not fair and correct to imply from this proviso, this express grant; that, in the opinion of the framers of that Constitution, the Legislature would not otherwise have possessed the power therein given? Again; in the constitutions of Pennsylvania, Delaware, &c., it is provided, that the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour, (subject however to impeachment;) but for any reasonable cause, which shall not be a sufficient ground of impeachment, the Governor, at his discretion, may remove any of them on the address of two thirds of each branch in Pennsylvania, and in Delaware, on the address of two thirds of all the members of each branch of the Legislature. Now, sir, does not the major include the minor? If then, it was contemplated by those who framed these constitutions, that a simple majority of the two Houses could pass a law, which would, to all intents and purposes, derange and remove the judges from office, why in the name of common sense require, as we have just shown is done in the constitutions of Pennsylvania and Delaware, an union of two thirds of all the members of both branches of the Legislature to effect the same thing, viz: the removal of the judges?

Far, however, as these examples go to show the effect which this tenure was supposed to have in restraining the power, as well of the Legislature as the Executive, the point is still more triumphantly and unanswerably proved in the case of those States in whose constitutions no specific mode is provided of removing the judge, except by impeachment, and in which the Executive neither exercises, nor has the power of removing an incumbent from office. Such is, for example, the case in North Carolina, and in the State I have the honor immediately to represent. Here the judges are chosen by joint ballot of both Houses, and hold their offices during good behaviour. The Executive however neither does nor can remove any civil officer from office who holds a commission at pleasure. Did the judges, therefore, hold under this inferior tenure, they would be still out of his reach, beyond his authority and control, yet the Constitution declares, "they shall hold their commissions during good behaviour." Why, then, is this particular tenure secured to them by the Constitution? In whose hands is the power placed against which it is intended to operate and secure them? Certainly not in the hands of the Executive, for we have just seen that he cannot remove from office even in cases where the commissions run "during pleasure." If, therefore, anything is meant by this provision in the constitutions of these States, the intention and object must have been thereby to limit and restrain the power of the Legislature; and as I have never yet heard it contended that a public officer, holding during good behaviour, could be turned out of office by a simple vote or resolution of the two Houses, or by an express act passed for that purpose, it follows, that this tenure was adopted to prevent them from doing the same thing by a side wind, by deranging the individual thus secured, and taking his office from him.

From this hasty review of the State constitutions it would appear, that in the general received opinion of the American people, the tenure of good behaviour, where no express provisions to the contrary were introduced in their State constitutions, went to secure the independence of the judges and their continuance (the very term made use of in the constitution of Virginia) in office, equally against the attempts and encroachments of the Legislature and Executive.

The wise men who framed our Federal compact were perfectly aware of this. The State constitutions were all before them. They were well acquainted with the sentiments and opinions of the people in every part of the continent. They deemed it, however, most expedient to omit the various exceptions, contained in the several State constitutions; and in establishing the Federal Judiciary, they carefully provided that the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, should hold their office under the pure and simple tenure of good behaviour, subject to a possibility of removal from office in no other way under the Constitution, save only by impeachment. So far were they, indeed, from intending that a bare majority of the two branches of the Legislature, uniting with the Executive, should have the important and effectual power of deranging and getting rid of the judges by putting down their offices, that they would not even trust them with the much inferior power of reducing their salaries, but expressly provide that the salaries of the judges should not be diminished during their continuance in office. In the only instance in which they grant the power of removal, viz: by impeachment, they avoid giving the Executive any agency whatever in the business; they suspend all the Legislative functions of the Senate and House of Representatives, and introduce them entirely in a new character, by making of the latter a body of accusers, and converting the Senate into a court of justice. They go further, and from abundant caution provide at the same time in cases of impeachment, that no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of the Senate, before whom he is impeached.

But granting for a moment that the tenure of good behaviour was intended more immediately as a check against the Executive; whence, I pray you, does the Legislature obtain the right of disregarding this check, and removing the judges in spite of this express limitation of any and every such power? Will any one contend that they can exercise a power not given them by the Constitution? If not, I repeat the request of the member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) that gentlemen will turn to the page and point their finger to the clause which gives even the semblance of any such power to the Legislature alone, or united with the Executive. And if, as is the fact, no such power is given in the Constitution, I ask with the same gentleman, how this Committee can possibly get over the provisions contained in the tenth amendment to the Constitution? viz: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

In the face of all this, and contrary to the practice which has heretofore invariably prevailed as well under the State governments, as that of the Union at large, gentlemen now tell us that the members of this separate, distinct, and co-ordinate branch, are left at the mercy of every political gale that blows, and subject to the whim and caprice of every party, which may chance from day to day predominate in the other two branches of the Government.

The error of this novel doctrine seems to me, sir, to arise from an impression on the minds of gentlemen which lead them to suppose, that as the Executive and Legislative branches are elected by, and therefore presumed to be the more immediate representatives of the people, they are in fact one and the same with the people, and possess all the powers of the great body of the nation in its original capacity. They forget in how narrow and limited a sphere they are delegated to act, assimilate themselves to the Parliament of Great Britain, and would fain assume the political omnipotence, which is supposed to vest in that body; or to express my idea still more clearly, and in American language, they regard themselves, not merely as sitting here in a legislative capacity under a written constitution, but as possessed of the much higher and more important powers of a convention. But will any one at this time, whatever may be done hereafter, come boldly forward and openly avow this doctrine? No, sir, the fact is far otherwise. We are nothing more or less than the mere agents of the people, empowered to transact the current business of the day; honored, it is true, by the confidence and trust they place in us, but bound down by written rules or instructions, and under an obligation to move within a confined sphere, and within narrow and specified limits. The Constitution is the power of attorney under which we act, and I might as well be told that an agent empowered to dispose of my personal, had of course a right to do the same with my real property; as that we are to judge of the expediency and propriety of the quantum of power vested in this or that branch of the Government by the Constitution, and to make its express provisions bend to what we deem right, and what comports best with our own immediate purposes and wishes. When, therefore, the Constitution says, article third, section one, "The judicial power shall be vested in a Supreme Court, and in such other inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," I contend such must necessarily be the organization of the Federal Judiciary. When it goes on and provides in the subsequent part of the same section, that the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, I boldly affirm, that such only can be the tenure under which they can hold their offices; nor have the Government any other means of getting rid of them than that pointed out by the fourth section, second article, viz: impeachment. The Legislature and Executive, whether acting separately or in unison with each other, have no more Constitutional right to evade or contravene the fair and honest meaning of the express tenure, i. e. good behaviour, under which the judges hold, and to derange or displace a judge, either of the supreme or inferior courts, whilst he continues to behave well, than they have to diminish the number of years, during which the Executive now remains in office, or to increase that for which the members of the Senate and House of Representatives are at present elected.

I am not only, however, Mr. Chairman, strongly impressed with the conviction that the framers of the Federal Constitution intended to secure the absolute independence of the Judiciary, as well against the power and control of the Legislature as the Executive, but humbly conceive that they have wisely done so. We have, indeed, heard a great deal of rhodomontade about the dangers which were to be apprehended from an independent Judiciary. We are threatened with an army of judges, and some gentlemen, whom neither the roar of cannon, nor glistening of steel could ever appal, begin already to tremble at the idea of facing a few decrepid old men seated on the bench of justice. But this is the first time, Mr. Chairman, I must confess, that I have ever heard or imagined the independence and consequent impartiality of the judge could give alarm to honest men, strong in the rectitude of their intentions and conduct. To the guilty, indeed, I had been taught to believe such a tribunal, before which party influence and the power of friends could afford no protection, was truly awful. The conscious culprit might well tremble—might well dread to appear before a tribunal of this kind. But reverse the position; destroy the independence of the Judiciary; let the judge depend on the nod of the Legislature, or rather of the party which may for the moment prevail in the Legislature, and of what avail will innocence itself be to the accused? Can his innocence protect him against the power of his oppressor, armed with the whole force of the Government, and on a compliance with whose will the judge knows his subsistence to depend? Alas! sir, they are little acquainted with human nature, who suppose that in such a state of things innocence will avail aught.

Those who have power will use it—will command. Those who are subject to and feel the effects of that power, must obey and will forget right. From an ex post facto law, from a suspension of the habeas corpus in time of peace, from a bill of attainder, or from any other act of violence, however unconstitutional, on the part of the Executive and Legislature, where are we to look up for relief? To what tribunal are we to apply for the protection of our persons and our rights against the predominant faction, or leaders of a faction—against the rage and violence of party zeal and party animosity—if this tribunal, instead of being a barrier, behind which the weak may take shelter, is to become the tool of those in power, and to be made use of as the instrument of their persecution and oppression? In contests between individuals of different States, between the different States themselves, what reliance will be placed in the Federal courts, when deprived of their Constitutional independence? What confidence could one of the smaller States—Delaware, for example, placed as she now is, in the minority, and exposed to a contest of rights with the great and powerful State of Virginia, possessed of the preponderating influence she avowedly has at this moment, in the two branches of the Legislature, and one of her immediate citizens armed with the whole power and influence of the Executive department—what confidence could the State of Delaware place in the impartiality and justice of the national tribunals, if those who are to preside in them and decide on their conflicting claims, are to be dependent on the Legislature and Executive, and of course on the nod and pleasure of Virginia, the most powerful of the parties concerned? What, sir, must necessarily be the consequence of such a state of things? Must it not, will it not, give rise to jealousies, and excite the fears and apprehensions of the least powerful States? Will they not be seeking out for some other protection, some greater security for their rights; and must not the want of an independent tribunal, in which all parties might equally confide, drive the weaker into compacts for their mutual protection against the encroachments of the larger and most powerful States? The next step is an appeal to arms, and a civil war follows. Such must be the natural course of things. Such has been the invariable effect produced by the same causes among other nations. And I hesitate not in saying that, between an independent Judiciary, constituting a tribunal which can control the unconstitutional attempts of the other two branches of the Government, which dares, without dread or fear, to deal out justice, with an impartial hand, between the weak and the strong, the great and the small; between such a tribunal and the bayonet there remains no resource or alternative.

The great object of Government, Mr. Chairman, is to provide against danger from abroad, and to insure protection at home. For these purposes adequate powers must be lodged somewhere. Place them in what hands you please, dispose of them as you will, still you are exposed to the risk of their being abused, and converted to improper ends. In those governments which approach nearest to monarchy, the powers of the Executive will, of course, preponderate. In proportion, on the other hand, as a government verges more or less to democracy, will the powers of the government vest more or less in the popular branches of it. To show that these branches are liable to error, and will abuse the power entrusted to them, as well as the Executive, cannot be at this day necessary. The experience of every gentleman who hears me, must convince him of this fact. Every page of history equally corroborates it, and proves beyond all doubt that, in the most popular governments, power is at times abused, and injustice and tyranny carried to the utmost unjustifiable lengths. The American people, from one end of the continent to the other, are convinced of these truths. Hence the care and anxiety with which they have separated and balanced the powers vested in different branches of their State governments. Hence the limitations and checks they have introduced with so much caution in their State systems. The sages, who were drawn together from every part of the Union, and who framed the Federal Constitution, knew equally well that the powers necessary to provide for the common defence against foreign invasion, no less than to insure domestic tranquillity, were liable to abuse, might be converted to improper uses, in whatever hands they were placed. These wise men, therefore, endeavored to steer a middle course, and to divide and balance in various ways the power given for these purposes. They deposited such power with the Executive as was sufficient to carry the laws into execution, and to give energy to the national force in times of danger. They gave him a temporary and limited control over the proceedings of the Legislature, as well to protect his own right as to check, in some degree, that fervent zeal and headlong impetus to which all numerous bodies are more or less subject.

With the same view of insuring greater moderation and reflection, and as a mutual check on each other, they divided the Legislature into two distinct branches. Still the history of other nations, the experience of past ages, taught them that all this was not sufficient. They foresaw that popular branches by uniting might overpower the Executive; or the Executive might, by corruption, induce them to favor his views; or, finally, from whatever cause, these two branches might come to an understanding and unite in a common interest. They had seen examples of all this in the very country from which their forefathers had emigrated; and they well knew that, if these two branches were by any means induced to unite in a common cause, they would construe the Constitution as might best suit their purposes, and all power would of course be in their hands. Civil wars and dissensions, they were perfectly aware would, as had been heretofore invariably the case in other countries, necessarily follow; and this happy country must, sooner or later, swell the long catalogue of Republics which have fallen victims to the same or similar causes, and now exist but in name. To obviate this fatal catastrophe, one only alternative, hitherto unknown or untried by other nations, presented itself to them. This was to establish a third co-ordinate and equal branch in the Government—an independent Judiciary, which, without interfering in the peculiar duties of either of the other two, without having anything to do either in making the laws, or when made, in calling forth the force necessary to carry them into execution, should serve as a protecting shield, as well to individual citizens as the States themselves, against the encroachments and attacks of either or both these branches, acting either separately or in union; should keep each of them in its proper sphere, and check the career of one or both, when stepping beyond the limits which had been assigned them; when trampling on the Constitution, under which the people had authorized them to act, they undertook to extend their powers at pleasure, and to make their will, instead of the written will of the people, the criterion by which their powers were to be judged. These, sir, were the august functions, the all-important purposes, for which the Federal Judiciary were originally intended. And can it be said, is it reasonable, that the judges, who were destined to check the assumption of powers not given, ought or could have been intended to have been left in the power and at the mercy of those very branches whom they are to check and control?

Was this the intention of the Constitution? Was there no other object contemplated in the establishment of the Judiciary, than to have such courts, as might be necessary to dispatch the current business of the day? It would have been sufficient to have given Congress the general power of establishing such courts, as might from time to time be found necessary, and to have simply included it in the enumeration of other powers delegated to Congress in the eighth section of the first article. But what have the framers of the Constitution done in this respect; have they not established the Judiciary in as pointed and direct terms; have they not made it as necessary and distinct a branch of the Government, as either the Executive or Legislature? Turn to the Constitution and you will find, sir, that the same formalities, the same divisions, the very same expressions are made use of in establishing the one, as the other of these three great departments of the Government.

The first article declares that all Legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives. The second, in the same way, that the Executive shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. And what says the third article? Why in the very same words, mutatis mutandis, that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such other inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. Again, article first: "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year; the Senate of the United States of two Senators from each State, chosen for six years." Article second: "The President shall hold his office during the term of four years." Article the third: "The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices, during good behaviour." Thus sir, in vain do I con over each article and section of the Constitution. I see not the smallest difference in the divisions, terms, or expressions, made use of in the establishment of these three departments. I cannot find a word or syllable which goes to establish and declare the Judiciary of the United States to be a subordinate or dependent department, and not a co-ordinate and independent branch of Government.

And as to the danger to be apprehended from an independent Judiciary; what can it be? Whence can it arise? The number of judges of the United States, must necessarily be curtailed; increase them, even as far as the imagination of any gentleman will carry him, still they cannot act effectually without the aid of the Executive and Legislature. They are besides scattered over an immense continent; never assembled together in a body; and four-fifths of them will in all human probability, remain utter strangers to each other, except by name and reputation. They neither wield the sword, nor have the purse-strings at their command. They cannot move until the other two branches have acted. They can neither say what laws are to be made, or direct what measures must be pursued. Their whole power consists in assisting to carry the laws and measures, adopted by the other two branches, into operation; in dealing out justice, protecting the weak against the strong, and restraining and checking the unconstitutional attempts of the Government. Their only shield is the Constitution; their only force, argument. They not only are without the means of acting offensively, but the very situation in which they are placed, at the moment I am speaking, shows how unequal they act, even to the defence of their Constitutional rights; and proves but too clearly the justice and truth of an observation made by one of the most eminent writers of modern times. "Of the three branches of Government," says President Montesquieu, speaking of the Executive, Legislative, and Judiciary, "the latter is, in some measure, next to nothing." By what means indeed are the judges to obtain an undue and overweening influence? From what source are they to acquire to themselves a dangerous and preponderating control over the other two branches? They have nothing to give, no inducement of power or profits to hold out to their friends and supporters. Their age, their habits of life, decorum, every circumstance, combines to deprive them of the use of those means which lead to popularity; and popularity, in a Government like ours, is real strength. In a contest, therefore, with the other two branches, the Judiciary has nothing but the sober reason, and good sense of the community to depend upon for its support. How unequal then must be the contest? How few are the chances of defending with success their rights and Constitutional power on the part of the Judiciary! For we all know but too well, how frequently the phrenzy of the moment, the rage of the day, clouds and overwhelms the sober reason and good sense of mankind.

These few observations, Mr. Chairman, I have deemed it my duty to offer to the Committee. They have been dictated however, I will honestly and candidly confess, rather in the hope that they may serve as a justification of my conduct and vote on this awful occasion, to those who have done me the honor of sending me here, than from the most distant expectation that they could have the least effect on this floor. No, sir, all my hopes of stopping the further progress of this, in my humble opinion, unconstitutional and baneful measure through this House, have long since vanished. The bill on your table, I foresee, will pass. The dyke is broken down—the torrent must have its way—and God grant that its ravages in that fertile region through which it has to flow, may be confined within a narrow and circumscribed channel. In one point, however, I differ with those who think with me on the present question. I am perhaps of a more sanguine complexion than most of them. I do not, therefore, despair of the Republic. I have the most perfect confidence in the good sense and wisdom of the American people. I believe they are strongly impressed with the necessity of having an independent and impartial Judiciary, and will not allow myself to doubt, but that they will at no distant period restore to this branch of the Government its wonted splendor and independence, and close the wound which we are about at this time to inflict on the Constitution. Under these impressions, and in this hope, I shall patiently, though with pain and anguish (I confess) submit to the will of the majority, whatever it ultimately may be, on the subject now under consideration.

Mr. SMITH, of Vermont.—Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of offering you my opinion upon the motion now under consideration. I do it with great diffidence, because I am fully apprized of the importance of the question, and am conscious it merits an investigation far beyond anything I am able to give it. My diffidence is still further increased, from the recollection that this subject has already been discussed with the most profound ability, and the most moving eloquence. Little now can remain to be said; if, however, I should contribute in any small degree to elucidate the subject, I am satisfied, from the patience the Committee have manifested during this debate, the attempt I am about to make will be acceptable. I take it Mr. Chairman, the motion is, to strike out the first section of the bill. I presume the honorable mover made it from a conviction that the bill was inexpedient, or unconstitutional, or both. Whatever reasons he might have, it is incumbent on those who advocate the passage of the bill, to show, that the enacting this bill into a law, is both Constitutional and expedient. I shall first attend to the question relating to the constitutionality. The first point to be established under this head is, “the general power of Congress to repeal a law constituting tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court.” In the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, the powers of Congress are enumerated; it says, the Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, to borrow money, to regulate commerce, to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, to coin money, to establish post offices and post roads, and among many other powers, “to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court.” The Congress shall have power. The Congress here spoken of, by way of eminence, unquestionably means, not the Senate and House of Representatives which may be composed of members first chosen under the Constitution, but every succeeding Senate and House of Representatives composed as aforesaid; as if it had said, the Congress for the time being shall have power. The words “shall have power” evidently imply, that Congress may do, or omit to do, or undo, any thing which relates to the subjects here committed to their charge, as sound discretion shall dictate, and the public good require.

If Congress will that tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court shall exist, they express that will in forms prescribed by law, and they are constituted: if they will them not to exist, the same forms are pursued, and their existence ceases. It is to be observed, that the power of Congress in relation to their inferior tribunals, is spoken of in the same general terms in which all the other subjects to which their powers extend, are mentioned. It is incumbent on gentlemen, who deny the power of Congress to pass this bill, to show us in which part of the Constitution this power is taken away. They direct us to the third article, first section, of the Constitution, where it says, “the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour.” Words spoken or written, are to be understood as relating to a subject or subjects immediately under consideration, and not to subjects which at the time are not presented to the mind of the speaker or writer. It ought here to be noticed, that the advocates of the bill contend that these words apply to the Executive, and not to the Legislative authority. To ascertain more clearly the extent of the meaning which the framers of the Constitution meant should be affixed to this sentence, on which the gentlemen opposed to the bill so much rely, it will be particularly useful to attend to the orderly arrangement of the subjects treated on in the Constitution: perhaps a more correct and uniform arrangement never took place in any composition. It begins by a division of the powers of Government into three departments; the Legislative, the Executive, and Judiciary. These separate departments of the Government are considered separately, under three distinct articles. The first article speaks of the Legislative power; it declares that "all Legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." It first speaks of the investment of Legislative power; it then tells how the bodies who are to possess this power are to be composed; it then declares how they shall be inducted into office, or in other words, of their election, and the tenure of their offices in virtue of such election. The Senators shall be elected for six years, the Representatives for two years. It then proceeds to point out the qualifications of the electors and the elected, and some further regulations relative to the government of their own bodies respectively; and lastly speaks of their powers and duties. Here the second article is introduced: it begins with declaring, that "the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America; he shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice-President, chosen for the same term." It then speaks of his induction into office, or the manner of election, and the qualifications of electors and elected, and lastly points out his powers and duties. Now comes the third article, which treats of the judicial powers; it begins as before, by declaring that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." Here is introduced the clause, or sentence, on which the gentlemen opposed to the bill on your table so vehemently insist. It is in these words; "the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour." I am here constrained to notice, that the words "appointed by the President," are omitted in this sentence. It will probably be asked, why was it so? It is answered, on the page preceding, speaking of the powers of the President, it says, "he shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law." To have repeated in this sentence the words which were to authorize the President to appoint judges, would have been more than unnecessary; it would have been tautology.

It follows, then, that the sentence of which we have been speaking should be understood thus: "the judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall be appointed by the President, and shall hold their offices during good behaviour." The subject which presented itself to the consideration of the framers of the Constitution, evidenced by the words themselves, and the analogy which the article bears to both the preceding articles, was, first, the power of the President to appoint the judges; second, the tenure of their offices in relation to such appointment. This clause in the Constitution establishes, in the first place, that the President shall appoint the judge, and not the Legislature, which otherwise might have been doubtful; secondly, the judges should hold their offices, not at the will of the President, nor for any limited period, at the expiration of which the President might again exercise his will upon the tenure of their offices; but it should, after the appointment is made, be held independent of any exercise of his will thereafter. It should be during good behaviour. Every appointment of the Executive for an indefinite period, is an appointment at will. The nature of the power implies it. A power to be exercised at will, without any limitation upon it, must at all times necessarily depend upon the exercise of that will. There can be no necessity for a chain of reasoning upon this point. It has been the universal practice of this Government, and I believe of every other, when the Executive has had the power of appointments, that a person receiving an appointment, where neither the Constitution or laws have defined the period for which he is to hold it, it is considered as held at the will of the Executive. In the Government from which we derive much of our knowledge of jurisprudence, it had long been deemed an evil that the judges held their offices at the pleasure of the Crown. This tenure has finally been changed into a tenure for good behaviour, defeasible, however, upon the application of both Houses of Parliament. The framers of our Constitution most unquestionably saw good and sufficient reasons for giving the same independence to our judges, and the words which they have introduced into the Constitution for this purpose, are strictly applicable to that subject; not a word could be added or taken away, without injury to their meaning. It should seem, then, that the judges are independent of Executive will, subject, however, to the ordinary power of the Legislature, in constituting, altering, and modifying the courts, in such manner as, in their opinion, the public interest may require. If this clause of the Constitution, about which so much has been said, was not intended by the framers of the Constitution to be understood in subordination to Legislative power, and exclusive of it, they should have inserted some words which would plainly inhibit Congress from altering or modifying the courts; they ought to have said, not only they shall hold their offices, but their offices shall not be abolished during good behaviour; their offices are the work of the Legislature, they have their existence in Legislative will; the power of the President to appoint, and the tenure of their offices in virtue of that appointment, are all suspended on the existing pleasure of Congress, expressed in your law; if that is withdrawn, the whole fabric tumbles into ruin. Gentlemen have said much about the co-ordinate powers of the Government, and that the Executive and Judiciary are co-ordinate with the Legislature. So far as they have a Constitutional existence, independent of Legislative will, they are so, but when their existence or power depends on the exercise of that will, they are dependent. This is one of those cases; gentlemen are endeavoring to take from the Legislature their power, by inference and implication. They reason thus: "the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour." If you repeal the law, they cannot hold their offices; therefore you cannot repeal the law. Will not this reasoning apply to every law constituting an office held at the will of the President? Your supervisors hold their offices at the will of the President; if you repeal the law constituting these officers, you determine the President's will, and deprive them of their offices; therefore you cannot repeal the law.

"The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army." If you repeal the law organizing an army, he will not be the Commander-in-Chief; therefore you cannot repeal the law organizing the army, and so on of the navy and militia. The only explanation which can be given for this apparent contradiction and absurdity is, it must be understood in subordination to, and exclusive of, Legislative power. Should doubts still remain about the application of these words in the Constitution, it appears to me the rule for construing statutes would be sufficient for our purpose. When a statute is passed granting general powers, and there is a proviso introduced limiting those general powers, and a proviso within the proviso, with expressions broad enough to affect many of the general powers in the body of the statute, the rule is, the last proviso shall be confined to the providing clause, and not extend to the body of the statute. Now, apply this rule to the nature of Government and of the Constitution. The Legislative is the primary and original power; it comprehends in it all Executive and Judicative powers. That authority which can make laws (when no restrictions are expressly imposed) can cause those laws to be executed; for, what would be the authority of a lawgiver if he did not possess the means of enforcing obedience? In ancient times, and in many countries at present, where the science of Government is very imperfectly understood, the Executive are the mere creatures of the lawgiver, and wholly dependent on his will; but as advances have been made in the science of Government, the propriety of dividing the power of Government, and giving the Executive independence to a certain extent, has been confirmed. The Executive, also, charged with the execution and application of the laws to these various objects, both civiliter et criminaliter, found it expedient to call to his aid judges who might inform the Executive who were objects of animadversion and remuneration. These judges, at first, were the mere creatures of Executive will; this will was a long time severely and oppressively felt in the British Government; they have now obtained a very high degree of independence of the Executive. This view of the progress of Government gives us to understand that Executive authority is nothing more or less than a reservation and limitation from Legislative authority; and in the same manner the Judicial authority is a limitation and reservation from Executive authority. Apply these rules for construing statutes to the Constitution and the three branches of your Government. The Executive authority being a reservation of authority out of the general powers of the Legislature, when applied to them, is to be construed strictly, and to take nothing by implication. The Judicial power, also growing out of the Executive, and reserved from it every enlargement of right or power in behalf of the Judiciary, is to be taken as applicable to the Executive and not the Legislature, excepting when they are expressly pointed out.

Mr. Chairman, the reasons which I have already offered to the Committee, have induced me to believe the Constitution, when it says, "the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour," did not intend to deprive the Legislature of their ordinary power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court, or abolish or modify, from time to time, as in their opinion the public good, and the due administration of judicial justice might require. If, however, in the estimation of gentlemen, the construction which I have attempted to give the Constitution, is inadmissible, I ask of gentlemen to reflect on the absurdities which grow out of their construction, and the absolute inefficiency of this instrument, to produce the result for which they contend? Gentlemen say, the Constitution authorizes the judges to decide your laws unconstitutional, and they are to hold their offices independent of the Legislature, to give greater efficiency to this salutary check. I beg leave to inform gentlemen, the Constitution has established no such principle. It is true your judges have authority, derived from the nature of their power as judges, to decide in this way; but the clause which the gentleman speaks of has nothing to do with this question. Whether the judge holds his office at the will of the President, or for one year, or during good behaviour, it is equally his duty to decide a law void, which directly infringes the Constitution. When there is a constitution of government, this principle is inseparably united with the judiciary authority; but prudent judges will exercise this right with great caution, knowing the Legislature has an equal right to put constructions; they will also consider the Legislature are obliged to precede them in their construction. The evil resulting from a difference in opinion cannot escape them. Hence it has been said, that the judges, in deciding the question on the carriage tax, observed they never would exercise this right, unless this law and the Constitution were absolutely irreconcilable. It might as well be said, this was an evil inseparable from judicial authority, as to call it a salutary principle of the Constitution. Why is it thought that the barriers which the Constitution has opposed to the passage of hasty, inconsiderate laws, are not sufficiently multiplied? Here is a House of Representatives composed of about one hundred members, coming from every part, and representing every interest in the United States; on every law which passes this House, the different interests and feelings of its members are rallied to guard the passage. The other branch is composed of members differing in number, in years, and the interests they represent. All calculated to impose a restraint on such interests and passions which, from any circumstance, might have found way for a bill through this body. It is finally to be presented to the President, who represents the entire interest of the people of the United States; and is accountable to them by an election every fourth year; if he dissents, it must be re-enacted by two thirds of both Houses. What further checks can be wanting? There is a point of precaution, beyond which it would not be salutary to go. If the framers of the Constitution contemplated your judges as the great safeguards against the encroachments of the Legislature in passing unconstitutional laws, I ask, how does it happen that the Constitution does not provide, that every bill, previous to its becoming a law, should be laid before the judges of the Supreme Court, for them to decide on its constitutionality? The evils which result from a postponement of this decision until the law has gone into operation, are too obvious to have escaped their notice. A law which concerns the life, the liberty, and property of the citizen, may be many years in operation, before any decision had, and then called up collaterally perhaps in the case of an individual, in which it will have little effect upon its general operation. Instead of placing the judges where they might have rejected the cause which some gentlemen seem to think likely to produce unconstitutional laws, they are left to maintain a perpetual, but ineffectual combat, against the effects of such laws. This view of the subject convinces me the framers of the Constitution never deemed the check of which the gentlemen speak of any importance.

It has also been said, this part of the Constitution was intended to guard against the assumption of judicial powers by the Legislature. That part of the Constitution which declares, that "the Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish," is the Constitutional safeguard, in this respect. Congress not only can have no pretensions for assuming and exercising Judicial powers, but the manner in which they are organized utterly forbids it. Congress, sitting as a court of judicature, would immediately become contemptible; nor will history, since the separation of the Judicial from the other powers of the Government, furnish a single instance of an assumption by the Legislature. If such tendency could possibly exist, this holding of offices, as gentlemen insist, would furnish the best possible pretext for an encroachment. A violent assumption of all Judicial power, at once, would be thought too daring; the attack must be insidious; your courts are badly constituted; the tenure of their offices stands opposed to a reform; you must wait until death or misbehaviour remove them. This gradual extinction of your courts calls for the substitution of other tribunals in their place. Congress, during the progress of their extinguishment, assumes to itself the exercise of such Judicial powers as the courts become incapable of exercising, until a convenient and Constitutional opportunity presents, of constituting a judicial system, which shall better answer the purposes intended by it. The plea of necessity is powerful; the ambitious and assuming rarely neglect to improve it. An opportunity is also afforded disappointed legislators of securing for themselves and friends a safe retreat. Here, by the power of the Executive, is to be found an ample reward for the loss of popularity.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen say, their construction of the Constitution alone will give firmness to the judges in checking the unconstitutional acts of the Legislature. Can they entertain an opinion of their judges so unfavorable? Will the judges, under an apprehension of removal from office by the Legislature, under the pretext of a law for the better and more perfect organization of courts, give up all their independence of opinion? Will they forget their oaths? Will they forget everything which constitutes the excellency of a judge, for the paltry consideration of a salary, which, gentlemen say, is no more than adequate to their services? Your judges are, or ought to be, the first in talents and information; they must have experienced, as the gentlemen observed, the viginta annorum lucubraciones; they cannot, therefore, become the mere dependants on public favor. If the Government has no further employment for them, their talents will secure for them a private employment equally lucrative. This retreat will neither injure their property or hazard their reputation. I should have thought, if the dependence of the judges were to give the alarm, the power of impeachment vested in this House must have occasioned it. It is in vain we talk of independence of judges, whilst the rod of chastisement hangs over them. Let us suppose a law in which this struggle between the Legislature and courts is most likely to be put to the test. In some great national emergency the Legislature pass a law which, in their opinion, is highly promotive of the public good; the safety of the country, in the opinion of the Legislature, depends on its execution; your judges paralyze the operations of Government by deciding that law unconstitutional. Here is a collision of opinion destructive in its nature, and for which a remedy must be devised. The Legislature have decided it compatible with the Constitution; your judges the reverse; here is an impeachable fact; an impeachment is ordered. Gentlemen will say, the safety of the judges is in the purity of their intentions; I answer, I have seen with what facility gentlemen can impeach motives; I have seen it here; I have seen it in solemn trials at the bar. It is this uncharitable spirit which has deluged the world with blood; which, from the Christian era, and before, has swept from the earth a great portion of its inhabitants. We cannot easily discern how the same truths, presented to different minds, should appear different, especially after we have shown to such minds the connexion of truth, as it exists in our own. We look for other causes, we ascribe it to that corruption of heart which we know, upon so many occasions, perverts the understanding. But, granting a conviction is not produced, and they escape with impunity, where will they find thereafter that delicacy of character which is essential, so absolutely necessary, to men of their pre-eminence? They are, at best, either left without a character, or forced and driven from political life with infamy and disgrace. Mr. Chairman, there are Constitutional modes in which obnoxious judges are exposed to be assailed by the Legislature. It is said, you cannot abolish the office of a judge, yet, you are at liberty to vary the duties of the office. It is said, you must leave enough of the duties to preserve the office. Gentlemen have not clearly pointed out the distinction between office and the duties belonging to it. That the duties of the office of a judge may be varied or taken away, to a certain extent, has been denied by no one. The gentleman from Delaware has attempted to fix the right of the Legislature in passing on this subject, upon the bona fide intention with which they act. You may legislate about the jurisdiction of courts, both civil and criminal; you may alter the jurisdiction of a court, or transfer the jurisdiction to another court, or give it to a court newly constituted; but this must be done with an upright intention, not to destroy the office. Where there is no other limitation to our power but the purity of intention with which we act, the necessary inference is, that there is no Constitutional barrier in the way, provided a majority are of opinion the measure is expedient. The Legislature has too frequently varied the jurisdiction and duties of their courts to admit any dispute on that point. They must show us the true line of distinction between the office of a judge and the duties belonging to it, that, while we do our duty in relation to one, we need not overleap the bounds of the Constitution in relation to the other.

The truth is, and I am ready to admit it, the officer, the office, and the duties of the office, are separate distinct things. An office may be thus defined: "A place created by the Legislature, for the purpose of having some person placed therein to discharge such duties as may be assigned to it; the place created is the office; the person placed in it is the officer, and the duties of the office, the services to be performed, be they more or less." Suppose your public debt all discharged, would the loan offices established in the different States for the purpose of aiding the discharge of that debt, necessarily be abolished? I take it not. The duties of an office are the reasons which induce the Legislature to create the officer, not the office itself. Congress are the sole judges of the quantum of duties necessary to justify them in creating an office, and when the office is created, it remains, let the amount of service assigned to it be ever so small, until abolished by the power creating it. Should any of your courts render themselves obnoxious to Congress by deciding their laws unconstitutional, what is to be done? Take from them all their jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, and transfer it to other courts, who will decide more in unison with your own opinion. By this measure you remove every obstacle which the judges, by declaring your laws unconstitutional, might throw in your way. Will it be said, if the office and salary remain, Congress will never take from the courts their jurisdiction? If it should become an object of magnitude, they certainly would. Wherever Congress have the power to act, and the doing of that act would, in the opinion of Congress, be promotive of the public interest, that power is immediately converted into duty, and the obligation resting on them to do the thing is indispensable. How, I ask then, is this construction which gentlemen contend for, to end? In some embarrassment of the Legislature, but no possible advantage to the public. It terminates in a mere personal advantage to the judges; they hold their offices to preserve their salaries. Will this be thought a wise and national provision? The office was created because there were duties to assign to it, and the salary was given for the discharge of those services. Congress have seen cause, in a Constitutional mode, to dispense with those services. I ask, then, ought not the office to be abolished, and the salary given up? The maxim is, all compensations given to the public agents of every description, are upon the principle of rendition of services, and not as sinecures. In this view of the subject, will Congress conceive it their duty to appropriate money for the payment of their salaries? Will gentlemen, the friends of those judges, ask it? Will the judges themselves receive it? I cannot say what the feeling of others may be; but for myself, at the stretching forth my hand for such purpose, the suffusion of shame would redder in my face. I should blush from a consciousness of guilt.

Mr. Chairman, I shall say a few words in answer to some observations advanced by the gentleman from Delaware. He said we could not do that indirectly which we could not do directly. Meaning, I suppose, since we could not remove the judges from their offices without abolishing them, we could not abolish their office, and thereby do it. This proposition is so far from being true, that the converse of it is nearer true. We cannot make a single appointment to office; but we can create offices by which it becomes indispensably necessary for others to do it. We cannot directly take from the inhabitants of this city a shilling's worth of property, but indirectly, by the removal of the seat of Government, we can take from them one-half they possess. We can create and abolish offices, because we have duties assigned to us in relation to them, and we are responsible to the community for the faithful discharge of those duties; but in relation to appointments we have no duties, we have no responsibility. The gentleman last mentioned, in answer to an observation which had been advanced by some gentleman opposed to him, that the power to pass a law necessarily implied a power to repeal it, showed us two instances in which that right did not exist. First, where the right to repeal the law was expressly taken away, as in the case of diminishing a judge's salary; this right was never contended for. The second instance was, where the law was in the nature of a contract; no one ever supposed a contract could be repealed. The gentleman was candid enough to inform us at the time, that he did not pretend it applied to the case under consideration. Lastly, he urged very strenuously the British statute, which provides that the King, upon the application of both Houses of Parliament, should have power to remove the judges; and also the constitutions of two of the States, nearly to the same effect. From the insertion of the provision in the British statute, and in the constitutions of the two States respectively, we insisted it was a fair inference, that no such power previously existed. It is true no such power did previously exist. The inserting this proviso in the act of Parliament, and the State constitutions before mentioned, enabled the Parliament and Legislatures of the two States respectively, to operate on the persons of their judges, to remove them from office; an operation wholly unwarrantable without such provisions.

Mr. Chairman, I shall take the liberty to say a few words upon the episode of this debate, the eulogy of the late Administration. Gentlemen say the affairs of the Government, by them intrusted with its management, have been conducted with the greatest wisdom and purest intentions. I am not disposed to arraign motives. I am inclined to give full credit on that score. It has been said in justification, that the expensive measures into which we have been led by the Government, arose not from any causes reprehensible in the Government, but from causes imputable to others, from circumstances and events not indeed excusable in those who produced them; but on the side of your Government uncontrollable, irresistible.

All our troubles, external and internal, from the commencement of the Government to the present time, are said to be of this description. They ask, and appeal for the decision, whence your Indian war? On the part of your Government, say they, was displayed wisdom, prudence, moderation, and conciliation, towards those hostile tribes. There was an allowance for the ignorance, the prejudices, and the weaknesses of a savage people. A disposition to enlighten, persuade, and inspire those barbarian nations with a sincere confidence and belief in the friendship of the United States. But on the opposite side was displayed a spirit implacable, revengeful, blood-thirsty; a disposition to imbrue their hands in the blood of your children; a spirit which nothing but the most lively apprehension for their own safety could extinguish. It is inquired also, from whence arose your Western insurrections? Did they proceed, say gentlemen, from your Government's deprecating this principle, that the understanding as well as the will of the people should bow to the laws? Were not the singular and formidable appearances arising out of a new Government sufficiently explained? A second Government, bringing with it a debt of eighty millions of dollars, a heavy impost, and a demand for further contributions in a way of all others the most detestable to the people. Is there not a manifest distinction to be taken between a heavy and insupportable burden of taxes, when demanded by a foreign Government, and when levied by your own? Is an explanation to the people of the justice and propriety of your laws to be expected from your Government, or is it sufficient that they cause them to feel submission to them? Your people stand in need of Government, and the rulers do right in seeking occasions to exercise it, so long as they discover an indisposition to submit. The constituted authorities of a country should never cease governing until there is manifested on the part of the people a disposition to acquiesce in laws in which they can discover no traces either of utility or justice: your Government stands justified. But on the part of the insurgents was evidenced a spirit hostile to all Governmental authority; a spirit opposed to every species of subordination; a Jacobinical spirit, a disposition which originates from an aversion to all authority, government, and subordination; a savage dissocial spirit, which fattens on its own sinister views and purposes, but pines on the prosperity of others. Gentlemen speak also of the misunderstanding with the French Republic, and of the evils and troubles dependent thereon. On the part of your Government, say they, was entertained a high sense of gratitude for the great and essential services rendered by that nation during a long, distressing, bloody Revolutionary war, in which we had lately been engaged. Their present circumstances excited compassion. A great, a generous nation, struggling for the blessing and sunshine of liberty, opposed by internal dissensions, and resisted by every earthly power. At a time when despair began to brood on the countenance, and they were sinking under the monstrous pressure of external and internal force, assistance and favors were asked of your Government by their Minister, which he declared was not intended to exceed, on our part, the strict position of a neutral situation. They were refused, it is true, but in a manner so pleasant and agreeable, it ought not to have given offence. Their pressing and urgent solicitations were continued until the American Government were compelled to refuse the civility of an answer. Offended at this necessary and justifiable conduct of your Government, their Minister withdrew, and what followed? They discovered, by a treaty presently made with a belligerent nation, you had violated your neutrality by authorizing the capture and condemnation of French property on board of American vessels, and by permitting American vessels, bound to French ports with provisions, to be delivered, upon paying a reasonable mercantile profit. They, therefore, under a sentence to be found in your treaty with them, placing them upon the footing of the most favored nation, authorized the capture of British property found on board American vessels. It is said they are an aspiring ambitious nation; their rulers thirst for domination; there is no medium between resistance and unconditional submission. I have no disposition, on the present occasion, of entering into a minute investigation of the merits of this controversy. An attempt of that sort would prove ineffectual. All the minutiae of circumstances necessary to form a correct opinion, cannot, at this late period of time, be brought up. These circumstances and events have all passed in review before the people of the United States; their judgment has been made up; they have rendered judgment, and the judgment is against those gentlemen to whom we stand opposed. They should acquiesce; they should not argue after judgment.

Mr. Chairman, in relation to the expediency of this measure, gentlemen should consider we have the most expensive Government on earth. It may be denominated imperium in imperio; doubly harassed with Legislative, Executive, and Judicial officers. A Government so complicated and expensive ought to be administered with economy. We should reflect, the bane of all Governments has been the extravagance of their expenses. Government is instituted for the protection of property; but when the expense of protection nearly equals the amount protected, it defeats its own end. By the document on your table relating to these courts, it appears, that, in a period of ten years, there has been depending therein upwards of eight thousand suits, which will fall short of one thousand a year. The yearly salaries of the judges exceed thirty thousand dollars. This expense, averaged upon the suits, exceeds thirty dollars in each suit, simply for the salaries of the judges alone. If other expenses of suits are proportioned, the bill of cost must be enormous. Compare this expense with the expense of State courts. In the State in which I live, the county courts are the courts of entry for civil actions or suits; the compensation of the judges is paid by the suitors. Their whole compensation, when averaged on the suits, does not exceed a dollar and a third of a dollar to each. The disproportion of expense then, by this calculation, is more than twenty to one. I am of opinion the number of suits in the circuit courts of the United States will be less for ten years to come, than they have been for ten years past. Several causes have existed which served to increase the number of causes for the period which is past. The troubles in Europe, and the embarrassed situation of our commerce for the most of that period, has greatly increased our maritime suits, both civil and criminal. The probability, and almost certainty of the relinquishment of all your internal taxes is another cause which will tend to a further decrease. That spirit of speculation which was created and put in operation by funding the public debt, and other measures of the Government, since it commenced its operation, has been a fruitful source of litigation in these courts. None of the beforementioned causes, it is hoped, will hereafter exist, particularly for a considerable period of time. My reasons, however, for the expediency of this measure, are not grounded on a calculation of expense. I have no idea that the circuit courts of the United States ought entirely to be done away. My opinion is, the present judges of these courts are supernumerary. You may preserve the circuits of the United States as they now are, viz: six. You may associate one of the judges of the Supreme Court with the three district judges residing in each of these circuits. Let these judges constitute the circuit court in their respective circuits. In trials at law uniformity of decision is said to be the great desideratum. In effecting this end, we are to look to the influence your Supreme Court will have over the other tribunals. This court, as was beautifully expressed by the gentleman from Delaware, is the conscience which is to actuate all the subordinate courts. But how is this conscience to operate under the present system? There is no personal connexion between these courts. The few solitary suits which may be brought up by appeal to the Supreme Court, will have but little influence, and even these present themselves in so new and doubtful a shape, that very little is to be understood about the justice or legality of the judgment in the court below. Upon the plan which I propose, one of the judges of the Supreme Court will be present in your circuit courts, by means of which an opportunity will be afforded him of infusing into every part of a trial, that superior legal knowledge which he may possess. Your district judges will also profit from this connexion. It will be a source from which they will derive much legal knowledge and improvement; and it will show itself in the trial which may be had in their respective districts. No means can be derived to give the judges of your Supreme Court so correct and so universal influence over judges of subordinate tribunals. I am also persuaded that all the business which belongs to the courts of the United States, can conveniently be done by associating the supreme judges and the district judges, in the manner proposed. If so, the present judges of your circuit courts are supernumerary, and their salaries are, as it relates to the public, thrown away. The gentleman from Delaware has indeed suggested, the judge of the Supreme Court who may have presided in a trial below, when the same is removed into the Supreme Court, may set himself to intrigue, and condescend to low arts and management, to gain over the other judges to the support of his opinion. This is too improbable to merit a serious refutation. It is the pride of a judge, particularly in a station so exalted, to hold himself at all times open to conviction, and nothing gives him greater pleasure than to have it in his power to correct an error, which he may discover in a former opinion. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I am against striking out the first section of the bill.

Mr. MACON.—As no other member at present seems disposed to take the floor, I will ask the attention of the Committee for a few minutes. I have attended with the greatest patience and diligence to the arguments of gentlemen who oppose the bill as unconstitutional; and had they produced a single doubt in my mind on the point of constitutionality, I should most certainly have voted with them against the bill on your table; but I can with truth say, I have not heard any argument which has in the least changed my first conviction, that we have a Constitutional right to pass it.

I should not, I believe, have spoken on this question, had not my colleagues, who differ with me in opinion, thought proper to bring into view a vote of the Legislature of the State, instructing her Senators and recommending it to the Representatives to use their best endeavors to obtain a repeal of the last Judiciary act. On this resolution of the State Legislature, they made some extraordinary remarks, which I mean to notice; but first permit me to inform the Committee, that it has been the constant practice of the Legislature of that State, from the commencement of the General Government to the present day, to instruct her Senators, and to recommend to her Representatives, to pursue such measures on all the great national questions that have occurred, as the Legislature judged the interest of the State required, and this proceeding has never been considered improper. I shall endeavor to answer the gentlemen in the order they spoke, beginning with my colleague (Mr. HENDERSON) who was first on the floor. If I understood him rightly, (and if I do not he will correct me, because it is not my desire to misstate a single word,) he said that the Legislature of the State might have adopted the resolutions in consequence of the Message of the President; but, upon examination of the dates, this will be found to be impossible. The Message could not have reached the Legislature before the question on the resolutions was taken and decided; and on no important question was that body ever more unanimous; and though my colleague has said the question was there viewed but on one side, and decided in a manner ex parte, yet I will be bold to say, if there were any member in that Legislature who thought on this subject as he does, he enjoyed the same right there that my colleague does here, to deliver his sentiments.

Knowing as I do, the great talents and integrity of my colleague, and I believe no one on this floor knows them better, I was surprised when he charged others with being under the influence of passion, when his conduct must convince them that he was guided by the very passion which he attributed to others. He quoted the constitution of North Carolina; let us examine it, and see whether his argument can be aided by the practice under that instrument. The thirteenth article is in the following words; that "the General Assembly shall, by joint ballot of both Houses, appoint judges of the supreme court of law and of equity, judges of admiralty, and attorney general, who shall be commissioned by the Governor, and hold their offices during good behaviour." On this clause he noted the independence of the State Judiciary; and they are independent so long as the law creating their office is in force, and no longer; and it is worthy of notice, that in this section no mention is made of salary, and yet the judges have been considered as independent as the judges of the United States. Soon after the adoption of the Constitution, the Legislature of the State established courts in conformity thereto; first county courts, and then superior, and afterwards, by a Legislative act, without electing a single new judge, gave the superior courts the additional jurisdiction of a court of equity, and never a solitary complaint, that this law was unconstitutional; and it must be acknowledged, that if you can make a court of law also a court of equity, by a Legislative act, you can by the same power take it away; and what becomes, in this case, of the commission which is to be held during good behaviour? It is, according to my construction, to last no longer than the law which created the office remains in force, and this is long enough to make the judges independent. As to the salary of the judges of North Carolina, the twenty-first section of the Constitution says, "they shall have adequate salaries during their continuance in office," and yet with this clear right in the Legislature, to lessen as well as to add to their salaries, the judges, it is agreed, are independent. My colleague well knows, that many attempts have been made to deprive the superior courts of exercising any jurisdiction in cases of equity; and he also knows, that attempts have been made to establish a court of appeals, which should revise the decisions of the superior courts now in being; and by the constitution of the State any supreme court may, on presentment of a grand jury, try the Governor for mal-administration, &c., and I believe the present courts are authorized to do this. I have not at this place been able to see the act which gives this authority, but no doubt is entertained of the fact.

It is clear then, that in North Carolina, all parties have thought, that "during good behaviour," only meant so long as the office existed; because, by establishing a court of appeals, the judges now in being would not be supreme judges, and in all these various attempts no one ever charged either of them to be unconstitutional. On examination of the constitution of North Carolina, it will be found that it makes provision for the appointment of other officers by the Legislature, but says nothing about adequate compensation, except in the section last read, and if you take the office away, what is an adequate compensation for doing nothing? Another proof might be drawn from the constitution of North Carolina, in favor of the opinion I hold, which is taken from the twenty-ninth section, that "no judge of a Supreme Court shall have a seat in the General Assembly," and my colleague knows, that the present judges could not hold a seat there, because they are supreme judges. And he also knows, that no one ever doubted the Constitutional right of the Legislature to establish the courts before mentioned; and it seems to me this, on his construction, would be a violation of the Constitution, because, having once made a Supreme Court, it must always remain so, to secure, what he calls, the independence of the judges.

Sir, I was astonished when my colleague said, that the judges should hold their offices, whether useful or not, and that their independence was necessary, as he emphatically said, to protect the people against their worst enemies, themselves; their usefulness is the only true test of their necessity, and if there is no use for them, they ought not to be continued. I will here ask my colleague whether, since the year 1783, he has heard of any disorder in the State we represent, or whether any act has been done there which can warrant or justify such an opinion, that "it is necessary to have judges to protect the people from their worst enemies, themselves." I had thought we, the people, formed this Government, and might be trusted with it. My colleague never could have uttered this sentence, had he not been governed by that passion which he supposes govern others. It is true that we are not a rich and wealthy State, but it is equally true, that there is no State in the Union more attached to order and law; and my colleague himself would not say that it was necessary to have judges for this purpose in the country we represent; the people there behave decently without having Federal judges or standing armies to protect them against themselves. Is it not strange, that the people should have sense enough to pay their taxes without being driven to it by superior force, and not have sense enough to take care of themselves without this new Judiciary? They certainly contrived to do this before the act establishing this Judiciary passed.

Another expression of his equally astonished me; he said, that on the 7th day of December, a spirit which had spread discord and destruction in other countries, made its entry into this House. What! are we to be told, because at the last election the people thought proper to change some of their representatives, and to put out some of those who had heretofore been in power, and to put others in power of different opinions, that a destroying spirit entered into all the public functionaries? For what, sir, are elections held, if it be not that the people should change their representatives when they do not like them? And are we to be told from the house-tops, that the only use of elections is to promote, not public good, but public mischief? We are also told, that this Constitution was to be destroyed by the all-devouring energies of its enemies. Who are its enemies? We are not, nor do I think there are any in this House; but there are parties as well in this House as out of doors, and no man wishes more sincerely than I do that they were amalgamated, that we might get rid of all party gall, and free ourselves from improper reflections hereafter. But by what energy is the Constitution to be destroyed? The only energy heretofore used, and which made the change so much complained of, was the energy of election. Sir, I scarcely know what to say when I hear such uncommon sentiments uttered from a head so correct and a heart so pure; it is the effect of a passion of which he is unconscious. Again he says, if you repeal this law, the rich will oppress the poor. Nothing but too much law can anywhere put it in the power of the rich to oppress the poor. Suppose you had no law at all, could the rich oppress the poor? Could they get six, eight or ten per cent. for money from the poor without law? If you destroy all law and Government, can the few oppress the many, or will the many oppress the few? But the passing the bill will neither put it in the power of the rich to oppress the poor, nor the poor to oppress the rich. There will then be law enough in the country to prevent the one from oppressing the other. But while the elective principle remains free, no great danger of lasting oppression can be really apprehended; as long as this continues the people will know who to trust.

He has also brought into view the repeal of the internal taxes, and the naturalization law, and these are some of the measures which this destructive spirit approves; and will they oppress the poor; will the repeal of taxes oppress the poor, or will it oppress anybody? If it will, the people will cry out with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) give us more oppression. You cannot give us too much of this kind of oppression, provided you pay our debts and protect us at home and abroad. One word respecting the naturalization law—observe the danger apprehended by North Carolina on this head; the fortieth section of her constitution is in the following words: "That every foreigner who comes to settle in this State, having first taken an oath of allegiance to the same, may purchase, or by other just means, acquire, hold, and transfer land or other real estate, and after one year's residence shall be deemed a free citizen." After this, can we believe that the people of that State have any fear of the few aliens that may wish to settle among them?

It is asked, will you abolish the Mint, that splendid attribute of sovereignty? Yes, sir, I would abolish the Mint, that splendid attribute of sovereignty, because it is only a splendid attribute of sovereignty, and nothing else; it is one of those splendid establishments which takes money from our pockets, without being of any use to us. In the State we represent, I do not believe there are as many cents in circulation as there are counties. This splendid attribute of sovereignty has not made money more plenty; it has only made more places for spending money.

My colleague next said, what I sincerely wish he had not said, that if you pass the bill, he would neither shed a tear nor heave a sigh over the Constitution. If we pass the bill, and the people should think we did wrong in so doing, nay, that it violates the Constitution in their opinion, have they not the power to bring it back to its original stamina, by a peaceable corrective, which they can exercise every two years at the elections? Suppose this done, would not the Constitution then be worth something, even in his estimation? Would it not be better to cherish this expectation than to destroy the Constitution, and put everything afloat? Would not this be much better than confusion, anarchy, and the sword of brother drawn against brother? As to myself, I confide in the people, firmly believing they are able to take care of themselves, without the aid or protection of any set of men paid by them to defend them from their worst enemies, themselves.

Permit me here, sir, to advert to the resolutions of North Carolina. [Mr. MAÇON here read them.] In commenting upon these resolutions, my colleague certainly used very complaisant language towards the Legislature of that State; but it seemed to me that he gave them a back-handed compliment when he said they passed these resolutions without a fair hearing. But, sir, is there anything indecent in them? Have they expressed a sentiment which they had not a perfect right to express? They wish the law repealed, because they believe the old system adequate. They wish the law repealed, because it produces a useless expense. This, perhaps, they more sensibly felt from being in the habit of conducting their public affairs with the greatest economy; and, finally, they wish the law repealed, because it is an useless extension of Executive patronage; and they at the same time declare that they have due confidence in the Chief Magistrate of the Union. Yet they do not wish offices continued merely that persons may be appointed to fill them. I perfectly agree with them in every particular.

We have heard much about the judges, and the necessity of their independence. I will state one fact, to show that they have power as well as independence. Soon after the establishment of the Federal courts, they issued a writ—not being a professional man I shall not undertake to give its name—to the Supreme court of North Carolina, directing a case then depending in the State court to be brought into the Federal court. The State judges refused to obey the summons, and laid the whole proceedings before the Legislature, who approved their conduct, and, as well as I remember, unanimously; and this in that day was not called disorganizing.

As so much has been said about the resolutions of North Carolina, I will repeat again, that it is no uncommon thing for the Legislature to express their opinion on great national subjects, and will ask my colleagues whether they ever heard any complaint of the resolutions about the Western land? And whether none of them in the Legislature never voted for the resolutions about the Western land, nor about post offices and post roads? The Legislature surely had as much right to give an opinion as the Chamber of Commerce of New York; but, put it upon what footing you please, it is entitled to respect, as the uninfluenced opinion of so many respectable individuals; and the Legislature never intended nor wished that the recommendation to the representatives should be binding on them at all events; and if I believed the bill to be unconstitutional, I should not vote for it, but as I do not, I hope the gentleman will pardon me for pursuing my own sentiments, and voting for it. I hope no man will ascribe to me a disposition to produce anarchy in my native country. Although poor myself, I feel as strong a desire as any one on this floor for the preservation of good order and good government.

It has been asked, by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD,) will the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) say, the assuming the State debts was improper? I have no hesitation to say that it was done at an improper time; and, in showing that it was, I hope I shall be pardoned for travelling over topics that really have nothing to do with the merits of the present question. That act is now done, and, by what I say, it is not to be understood that I wish Congress should put their hands upon it. It will be noticed that Congress are authorized to establish post offices and post roads for the general and equal dissemination of information throughout the United States; and is it not known that no act was passed on that subject before the assumption of the State debts, and that there was only one post road which run near the seacoast? Of course, the people in the interior country had no communication with those in the Government, nor had they any knowledge of what was doing. But the rich speculator, who was on the spot, by going into the country where the people were ignorant of what had been done, purchased up their certificates—the only reward they had received for their toil and wounds—at about one-tenth of their value. And it is possible that many of these purchases may have been made with public money. And it is clear to me, that if a proper number of post roads had been established, before the act was passed for assuming the State debts, the war-worn soldier would not have lost half as much as he did by the speculation on his certificates.

The gentleman from Delaware says we drove them to the direct tax. This is the first time I ever heard of a minority driving a majority. Is such a thing possible? Did we drive them to the measures that made such immense expenditures of the public money necessary? No, sir, we opposed those measures as useless; and the true ground of the direct tax is this: the public money was expended; public credit was stretched, until, to preserve it, it became necessary to provide for paying, and the means adopted were the direct tax.

The same gentleman tells us there is nothing sacred in the eyes of infidels. We know our opponents. The allusion here is too plain not to be understood; and evidently is, that those who differ with him in opinion are infidels. This is a strong expression; it would have seemed that his love of Americans ought to have prevented the use of it. I shall make no answer to it, except to remind him that in a book, the truth of which he will not deny, he will find these words, "Judge not, lest ye be judged." He also said that gentlemen might look to the Executive for victims, and not to the judges. Notwithstanding this remark, and without condemning or approving the appointments made by the late President, I hope I may be permitted to express my own ideas, without being considered as under the influence of the present President. Prior to the fourth of last March, all, or nearly all, the offices in the gift of the Executive were in the hands of men of one political opinion. On that day the people changed the President, because they did not like measures that had been pursued. But, to those who have attended to the debates in this House, it must appear strange, indeed, to hear gentlemen complain of the President having in office those who agree with him in opinion, when we were formerly told that the President would do wrong if he appointed to office those who differed from him in political opinion; and whenever he had done it, he had had cause to repent of it. Was that opinion then correct, and now false, in the estimation of gentlemen? For my part, I did not think the opinion correct when I first heard it, nor have I since been convinced of its propriety. Indeed, before I can think so, I must have a worse opinion of human nature than I now have, and think of men as they pretend to think of us, which God forbid! But, taking things as they are, what course, on this point, is most fair and tolerant? The community, as well as this House, is divided into two parties. It seems to me, that all the most tolerant could wish, would be an equal division of the offices between the parties, and thus you might fix a reciprocal check on each other. But I ask gentlemen to be candid, and tell me whether they are at this time equally divided? Sir, they know that there are many more persons who now fill offices who agree with them in opinion than agree with us. As to myself, I care not who fill offices, provided they act honestly and faithfully in them. I can with truth say, so little party attachment have I on this head, that I never solicited to have any man discharged from office. Knowing that a large majority of those now in office agree with those gentlemen in political opinion, I am at a loss for the cause of all this clamor. They have no doubt some reason for it, which has not been declared. The fact is, they have a majority of the offices, and a majority of the people are with us. I am contented it should be so.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

The gentleman has dwelt much on a subject which, from my habits of life, I am not enabled fully to notice; I must decide for myself, and, judging with the small share of information I possess, I cannot agree with him. I do not pretend to understand the subject as well as he does, but certainly he was not so perspicuous as it might have been expected. I mean, sir, his opinion on the common law. He told us that the judges only adopted such parts of the common law of England as suited the people, and that he apprehended no danger from this. Sir, I do apprehend danger from this, because I cannot find any authority given them in the Constitution to do it, and I suppose it is not an inherent right. Without pretending to know the extent of this common law, it has always appeared to me to be extremely dangerous to the rights of the people, for any person not elected by them, to undertake to exercise the power of legislating for them, and this adopting the common law is only another name for legislation. He has also told us, that the States had adopted it. If the States adopted it, it became a law of the State and not of the United States; but the adoption of it by the individual States, could not give the judges a right to adopt it for the United States. The judges have no powers but what are given by the Constitution or by statute, and this power cannot be found in either. He even told us, that the Constitution was a dead letter without it. I do not believe this was the opinion of the Convention that formed it, and by an examination of the debates of the State conventions that ratified it, it will not be found to be their opinion; nor is it, I believe, the opinion of all the judges of the Supreme Court, that the Constitution would be a dead letter without the common law of England. I have understood, that one of them has given it as his opinion, that the common law was not in force in the United States. The gentleman told us, that the Sedition law was Constitutional, and that the judges had so determined. This we have often been told before; but, in my opinion, the contrary is the fact. I firmly believe there is no authority given in the Constitution to pass that law, and although the judges agree with him in opinion, I believe the people agree with me. He, like my colleague, did not pretend to say that the judges under the old system had too much business, but too much riding. The whole burden of the song seems to be riding and salary, salary and riding; you may destroy the office, but the officer must have his salary, and this I suppose without riding. The old system was, in my opinion, equal to every object of justice contemplated by its establishment.

The gentleman has ascribed to us the wish to have the courts viciously formed. Is it possible, that he can have so degrading an idea of the American people, as to suppose they would send men here to legislate on their dearest interests, so base and corrupt, as to wish their courts so formed that vice and not virtue should prevail in them? I am happy to say that gentleman is the only one who has uttered a sentiment so abhorrent to human nature. He also said, if you permit the State courts to execute your laws, you would have no Constitution in ten years. I have not heard any one express a desire that you should have no courts, or that the State courts should execute all your laws; but I do not believe, that if the State courts were to execute your laws, that they would destroy the Constitution which they are sworn to support. He has told us that we paid millions for an army which might be useless, and refused thousands to a Judiciary which was useful. As to the army, those who agree with me in sentiment are as clear of it as it is possible for men to be of any political sin whatever; we always considered them useless, except in a small degree, and voted against them.

But, says he, this is the President's measure; he may prevent it. This is indeed a bold assertion. Are a majority of this House so degraded, so mean, so destitute of honor or morality, as to act at the nod of a President? What the majority may hereafter do, I cannot tell; but I can say, as yet they have done nothing which even the eye of criticism can find fault with. But are we to infer from these charges, that it has heretofore been the practice for the President to give the tone to the majority of the House, and to wield them about as he pleased? I had, before, a better opinion of our adversaries. I had thought, and still think, that no man can wield a majority of this House; that the House is, and has been, too independent for this; to think otherwise, would be degrading to my country. Sir, I do not believe the gentleman from Delaware himself, with all his talents, can wield those with whom he generally votes, at his will and pleasure.

Much has been said about the manner in which the late law was passed, and the purpose for which it was done. I hope I shall be pardoned for saying nothing on this subject; enough, if not too much has already been said on it; nor can I conceive that it has anything to do with the question.

The true question is, were there courts enough under the old system to do the business of the nation? In my opinion there was. We had no complaints that suits multiplied, or that business was generally delayed; and when gentlemen talk about Federal courts to do the business of the people, they seem to forget that there are State courts, and that the State courts have done, and will continue to do almost the whole business of the people in every part of the Union; that but very few suits can be brought into the Federal courts, compared with those that may be brought into the State courts. They will be convinced that under the old system we had federal judges and courts enough; besides, sir, I believe each State knows best what courts they need, and if they have not enough, they have the power and can easily make more. I am sure the old system answered every purpose for the State I live in as well as the new.

Until the present session, the people have not presented a single petition to this House on the subject of courts; and now, I believe, there are a majority of the petitioners in favor of the repeal; but their not having heretofore petitioned, is conclusive, in my mind, that they were perfectly satisfied with the old system. They know that they have the right to petition, and we know that they have exercised it whenever they pleased, and if they wanted these new courts, they would have told you so by petition.

The gentleman said he would forgive the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) for everything he said, except disturbing the ashes of the venerable dead. I did not understand the gentleman from Virginia to say a word about the illustrious WASHINGTON. It is needless for me to say what I think of him; I have said before what my opinion was; I sincerely regret that ever his name should be mentioned in this House in such debates as these; respect for his memory ought to forbid it.

He also told us, that we attempt to do indirectly what we cannot do directly. I do not know of any such attempt. The bill is certainly a direct attempt to repeal the act of the last session; but I have seen things done indirectly which I believe could not have been done directly: such was the army of volunteers; it surely was an indirect attempt to officer and get possession of the militia. The same gentleman challenges us to say there are any in the United States who prefer monarchy. In answer to this I say, there were such during the American revolutionary war, and I have not heard that they had changed their opinion; but as he has told us there were jacobins in the country, it is not unfair to suppose there are monarchists, they being the two extremes. We are also charged with a design to destroy the whole Judiciary. If there is such a design, this is the first time I ever heard it; no attempt of the kind is yet made. But what is the fact? We only propose to repeal the act of the last session, and restore the Judiciary exactly to what it was for twelve years, and this is called destroying the Judiciary.

The same gentleman told us that under the new system you would have an uniformity of decision in each circuit, and that it was not very desirable to have it uniform in every circuit. I differ with him; I think uniformity of decision desirable, for this reason, that a person knowing a decision of the Federal court on any given point in any part of the Union, may know that the same decision would prevail in every other court of the United States; and unless there is an uniformity of decision, you may have a different one in each circuit; a determination one way in Delaware, and another in Maryland. But, sir, from the very nature of the courts, you must have an uniform decision in either system; because, if different courts should decide differently, appeals would soon be carried to the Supreme Court, where the question would be finally settled.

Another curious principle was advanced by the same gentleman, which was this, that the judges received their pay from the date of their commissions. If they do, I am confident they are the only officers appointed by Government that do. I had always before understood, that the pay of officers did not commence until they accepted their appointments. On his idea a judge might have pay as a circuit judge, while he was holding a court as district judge, because he might be a district judge, and appointed a circuit judge without his knowledge; and before he was informed of his new appointment, might hold the court under the old, and the gentleman himself would not pretend to say that the proceedings of the court in such case would be illegal or irregular. The salary of the President is brought into view. I have never heard these gentlemen before complain that it was too high; if it is, I am perfectly willing to join them, and diminish it to what shall be deemed only an adequate compensation for services actually rendered, for the next Presidential term; sooner, the Constitution will not authorize its reduction.

To complete the scene, we were told of the sword, of civil discord, and of the sword of brother drawn against brother. Why such declamation? Why do we hear of such things on this floor? It is for them to tell who use the expressions; to me they are too horrid to think of. Do gentlemen appeal to our fears rather than to our understanding? Are we never to be clear of these alarms? They have often been tried without producing any effect. Every instrument of death is dragged into this question: sword, bayonet, hatchet, and tomahawk; and then we are told that the passing this bill may be attended with fatal consequences to the women and children. Can it be possible, sir, that the gentleman was really serious when he talked about an injury to women and children? He also told us, if you pass the bill and it should produce a civil war, not only himself but many enlightened citizens would support the judges. And have we already come to this, that enlightened citizens have determined on their side in case of a civil war, and that it is talked of in this assembly with deliberation and coolness? We certainly were not sent here to talk on such topics, but to take care of the affairs of the nation, and prevent such evils. In fact, it is our duty to take care of the nation, and not destroy it. Compare this with the conduct of the former minority. I challenge them to show anything like it in all their proceedings. Whenever we supposed the Constitution violated, did we talk of civil war? No, sir; we depended on elections as the main corner-stone of our safety; and supposed, whatever injury the State machine might receive from a violation of the Constitution, that at the next election the people would elect those that would repair the injury, and set it right again; and this in my opinion ought to be the doctrine of us all; and when we differ about Constitutional points, and the question shall be decided against us, we ought to consider it a temporary evil, remembering that the people possess the means of rectifying any error that may be committed by us.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

Is the idea of a separation of these States so light and trifling an affair, as to be uttered with calmness in this deliberative assembly? At the very idea I shudder, and it seems to me that every man ought to look on such a scene with horror, and shrink from it with dismay. Yet some gentlemen appear to be prepared for such an event, and have determined on their sides in case it should happen. For my part, sir, I deplore such an event too much to make up my mind on it until it shall really happen, and then it must be done with great hesitation indeed. To my imagination the idea of disunion conveys the most painful sensations; how much more painful then would be the reality! Who shall fix the boundaries of these new empires, when the fatal separation shall take place? Is it to be done with those cruel engines of death that we have heard of, the sword, the bayonet, and the more savage instruments of tomahawk and hatchet? And is the arm of the brother to plunge them into the breast of brother, and citizen to be put in battle array against citizen, to make this separation which would ruin the whole country? And why is all this to be done? Because we cannot all think alike on political topics. As well might it be said, because we cannot all agree in the tenets embraced by each particular sect of our holy religion, because one is a Calvinist and another a Lutheran, that each should be employed in plunging the dagger into the heart of the other. But suppose, sir, you agree to divide these States, where is the boundary to be? Is it to be a river, or a line of marked trees? Be it which it may, both sides must be fortified, to keep the one from intruding on the other; both the new Governments will have regular soldiers to guard their fortified places, and the people on both sides must be oppressed with taxes to support these fortifications and soldiers. What would become, in such a state of things, of the national debt, and all the banks in the United States? If we do wrong by adopting measures which the public good does not require, the injury cannot be very lasting; because at the next election the people will let us stay at home, and send others who will manage their common concerns more to their satisfaction. And if we feel power and forget right, it is proper that they should withdraw their confidence from us; but let us have no civil war; instead of the arguments of bayonets, &c., let us rely on such as are drawn from truth and reason.

Another topic has been introduced, which I very much regret: it is the naming of persons who have received appointments from the late or the present President. I hope I shall be pardoned for not following this example. And one gentleman is named as having been an important member during the election of President by the late House of Representatives. It ought to be remembered there were others as important as the gentleman named. In talking about the late or the present President, it ought not to be forgotten that they both signed the Declaration of Independence, that they have both been Ministers in Europe, and both Presidents of the United States. Although they may differ in political opinion, as many of us do, is that any reason we should attempt to destroy their reputation? Is American character worth nothing, that we should thus, in my judgment improperly, attempt to destroy it on this floor? The people of this country will remember that British gold could not corrupt nor British power dismay these men. I have differed in opinion with the former President, but no man ever heard me say, that he was either corrupt or dishonest; and sooner than attempt to destroy the fame of those worthies, to whose talents and exertions we owe our independence, I would cease to be an American; nor will I undertake to say that all who differ from me in opinion are disorganizers and jacobins.

We have heard much about the document No. 8, sent to this House by the President, and are told that it is not correct. Admit everything which has been said about it, and does it amount to anything like the least invalidating it? No, it only shows a clerical error of no importance, and it must be agreed to be sufficiently correct to prove the inutility of the late system. The gentleman from South Carolina told us, that many learned men who agreed with us generally in politics, differed with us on the present question. This I never heard before; but, suppose the fact to be so, it unquestionably proves that with us each man makes up his own opinion for himself. He told us of one, who had lately held a high office under the federal Government, who had, when in office, made a report, a part of which was directly against our opinion, and that he was high in the ranks of the opposition. The opinion of that gentleman formerly given is nothing more than this, that he at that time thought the then Judiciary system might be amended. From the rank which he assigned to the author of the report, he is certainly much better acquainted with the opposition than I am. He included, among those who differed with us on the question, and who generally agreed with us, all the judges of Virginia. I am not acquainted with but few of these gentlemen, and do not know anything of the political sentiments of those with whom I am not acquainted; but if the few with whom I am acquainted differed with us in opinion, they would not esteem us the more for relinquishing an opinion before we were convinced it was erroneous. But, sir, judging from a pamphlet which has been read during this debate, and said to contain their opinion, it is clear to my mind, that we perfectly agree. The same gentleman read to the Committee a part of a lecture of one of the judges of Virginia, which, if it strengthened his opinion on the present question, ought to convince him that the Sedition law was unconstitutional. And what will he say to the opinion of the same judge, on the favorite doctrine that the common law of England is in force in the United States? He told us, by passing the bill we shall not save more than the small sum of $5,000. Here he and my colleague (Mr. STANLEY,) differ a little in opinion. My colleague thinks the saving will be somewhere about $40,000, though not a dust in the balance. Sir, I would vote for the bill, on the principle of economy, if it would only save the useless expenditure of $1,000 of the public money. Let it be remembered that public money in all countries is drawn from the sweat of the people.

The same gentleman also told us, that we ought to keep up these courts to convince the nations of Europe of the stability of our Government; to look respectable abroad. Sir, the public good alone shall be the principle by which I will always govern myself, without considering what the people of Europe may think. I will never consent to keep up what I deem useless and expensive establishments, merely because it may make us look respectable abroad, or to convince the people of Europe of the stability of our Government. Nor can I believe that the passing the bill, which is altogether an internal regulation, can affect our national character in Europe; it is one of those internal regulations that the Governments of Europe care nothing about. All that independent nations require of each other is, that they govern themselves with honesty and equity towards other nations.

The gentleman asked us to show him the clauses in the Constitution which authorize the repeal of the late Judiciary act. I will answer this question, by asking another: Can he show any clause in the Constitution which gives express and direct authority to repeal any law? He cannot; there is no such clause. But the authority given to pass laws, gives also the authority to repeal, except in cases named, where you are expressly forbid, and this is not a forbidden case. The whole authority to repeal is an implied one; you may establish post offices and post roads, you may establish courts, and if you can repeal the one, you may repeal the other.

The same gentleman says, if you pass the bill, you make the Judiciary dependent on a faction. Who is the faction, sir, the majority or the minority? Formerly, I have heard it in said this House, the majority was the nation, and the minority a faction; and has the meaning of these words now changed? This the gentleman did not tell us.

He also told us, there were but two ways of governing; one by the Judiciary and the other by the bayonet. Sir, we are so daily in the habit of hearing of all the instruments of death, that a stranger would suppose no other articles were manufactured or used in the United States, and that it was a standing order of the day to be told of them; and it is a little extraordinary, that most of the gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, have reminded us of them. Power, says the gentleman, in whatever hands it may fall, will be abused. I hope that he is mistaken, and that time will convince him of his error; but if it should be so, no one in this country will hold power long, because there is a peaceable corrective in the nation, the application of which is perfectly well understood, and is, in my opinion, a sovereign antidote to prevent this abuse. I mean a remedy to which I have often already referred the gentleman; it is an answer of itself to almost everything that has been said—I mean elections. These gentlemen seem to depend on threats and bayonets. We always had a better dependence; it was elections and the good sense of the people; and these, it seems to me, is what every true republican ought to depend on, in a country where the people would as soon change a President as a constable for doing wrong.

Do gentlemen expect to affright us by the constant cry of terror, or do they intend to prepare the nation for civil war, and all the evils consequent to such a state of things? If such be their object, let me tell them they will find themselves mistaken in both respects; they will not deter us from doing what we think ought to be done; and if all Congress were to join, they could not produce a separation of the States: the people would laugh to scorn all those who should wickedly make the attempt; they would say to them, in language not to be misunderstood, We gave you no authority to divide us from our brethren, we are determined never to fight them, let you determine what you may. Instead of fighting our neighbors, we will hold elections, and send more faithful men to fill the places you have disgraced.

It is rung in our ears from all quarters, that we shall destroy the Constitutional divisions of the departments by passing this bill. The Legislative, the Executive, and Judicial, will all be unhinged by keeping them exactly in the same situation they have been for twelve years; and to add to all the other mighty charges, we are told, that we are about to repeal the law because the judges do not agree with us in political opinion. This could scarcely be thought to have much weight, if the gentleman will reflect that six judges are quite enough to sound the tocsin, whenever there shall be danger that the other departments are about to invade the liberty of the people; or is it necessary to keep up these new judges to prepare the people for this terrible work of plunging the bayonet into the breast of their nearest kinsman or neighbor? Whatever may be the opinion of the judges lately appointed in other States, I hope I may be permitted to state, that the judge appointed in North-Carolina does not disagree with us in politics; and if a sincere and disinterested friendship for a worthy man, whom I have known from his infancy, and who left a lucrative practice, when he took a seat on the bench, could influence my vote, I should certainly vote against the passage of the bill. But, sir, shall friendship, shall respect for a worthy man, induce us to give a vote which we know to be wrong? Were it possible, we should not only despise ourselves, but every man of worth and candor would also despise us.

Mr. Chairman, it was my intention when I rose, to have examined more particularly the Constitutional ground which the gentlemen on the other side have taken; but as I most cordially agree in the opinion delivered on this subject, by a very respectable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) and as I also agree with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) it would be needless to take up the time of the Committee in repeating arguments which have been some days delivered and remain yet to be answered.

I beg pardon of the Committee for the time I have occupied—I did not expect to have detained them so long, but the importance of the subject, and the wide field into which it has been branched by those who preceded me, will be my apology.

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed till to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 24.

A memorial of sundry merchants and underwriters of the City and State of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying relief in the case of the capture and condemnation of certain vessels and their cargoes, of which the memorialists are owners or assurers, by the cruisers and courts of the French Republic, during the late European war.—Referred

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating a report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of Marine Hospitals, which appear to require Legislative attention; also, information respecting the situation of seamen and boatmen frequenting the port of New Orleans, and suffering there from sickness, and the want of accommodation. The Message and documents accompanying it, were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to alter the time of holding the District Court of Maine.

Ordered, That Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. CABELL, and Mr. VAN NESS, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. GODDARD.—Mr. Chairman, the bill on your table having been so long before the Committee, and the principle of the first section, now under consideration, having been so fully and ably discussed, that I should content myself with a silent vote, if the subject was of less importance. To this course I should be more inclined, as gentlemen on the other side of the House have already expressed an opinion that nothing new could be offered to the Committee, and manifested an uneasiness that the debate should be further protracted.

But, sir, the man who deems this subject as important as I do—as one involving the dearest and best interests of our common country—will seek rather for an apology for silence than for speaking.

Before I enter upon a distinct consideration of the two questions involved in this discussion, I hope the Committee will pardon me for adverting to the history of this bill in this House. When the bill first came from the Senate, a motion was made to refer it to a select committee, which had been appointed in this House on the subject of the Judiciary system of the United States. That motion I then supported, with an anxious hope that it might prevail. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) being chairman, and myself a member of that committee, I felt extremely solicitous there to meet—to lay aside all party feelings or prejudices; to banish all considerations, when or how the act now proposed to be repealed, was passed; to confine ourselves to the inquiry whether the existing system does not afford to the citizens of the United States a fairer chance to obtain prompt and speedy justice in their courts, than the former system now proposed to be revived. But, sir, the chairman of that committee then told us, that a great Constitutional question had been raised; that such questions were improper for the consideration of select committees; that a fortunate period had arrived for its discussion; that it was proper to be considered only in Committee of the Whole; and that it must be decided.

On a subsequent occasion, when a motion was made to postpone the consideration of this bill to a future day, the solicitude which I had felt to avoid an unnecessary decision of the fatal question was revived; my dormant hopes returned, fortified by petitions from respectable sources, informing us that the present organization of the courts, in one circuit at least, was not only superior to the old system, but absolutely necessary to the attainment of justice in that circuit. Animated with a hope, excited by those petitions; deeply impressed with a sense of the dangerous and deadly blow which I then was, and still am, persuaded the repeal of this law will give to the Constitution, I then expressed a wish, which, although it drew upon me from one gentleman a charge to delay and embarrass the business of the session, was the honest effusion of my heart; that an opportunity might still be given to ascertain whether the act proposed to be repealed is not what its title imports: "An act for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States." That our inquiries might still be confined to that question, and if the result of such inquiries should prove to us that the courts as organized by the act, now proposed to be repealed, were throughout the United States what these petitions prove them to be in the third circuit: an useless—a dangerous discussion of the Constitutional question might be avoided. We were then told, sir, by another gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that a great Constitutional question had been raised, (raised let me add by the gentlemen who support the bill,) and that it must be decided. That gentleman then told us what that question was, "Whether the Judiciary is a co-ordinate or subordinate branch of our Government?" Defeated in both these attempts, we are at length brought to a consideration of the important principles of the first section of the bill on your table.

After the repeated declarations of the two gentlemen from Virginia, that the great Constitutional question must be decided, although in doing it a judicial establishment may be abolished, which is necessary to the administration of justice, those who oppose the passage of the bill might be excused from making any remarks on the question of expediency. Yet, sir, lest silence on that question should, by some others, be construed into an admission that the new system is not preferable to the old, now to be restored, I will take the liberty to submit a few remarks on that question.

I am induced to believe that there must exist between the several gentlemen from Virginia, who have spoken on this subject and myself, some radical difference of opinion as to what is a due administration of justice in courts of law. One gentleman from Virginia (Mr. THOMPSON) expressed his astonishment at what he was pleased to call, this immense establishment. To prove its inutility, he declared that he came from a State where justice was "truly and speedily" administered, and produced to the Committee a document to show that there are now pending before a court in that State, in which only one old man sits as judge, no less than two thousand six hundred and twenty-seven causes undecided.

On a former occasion, which has been alluded to, I took the liberty to suggest, as a reason for confining ourselves to an inquiry into the expediency of the measure only, that the organization of the courts, as it now exists, was calculated to carry justice home to every man's door; another gentleman from Virginia declared that to be the very reason why he should vote for the repeal of the law, intimating that we had too much Federal justice. I must believe that those gentlemen take, as the basis of their opinions, the position, that suits at law are evils in community, and infer that the organization of courts, which is best calculated to deter citizens from applying to them, is the best. Hold out to the citizens a prospect of an endless continuance of the evil, and they will not involve themselves in it.

For, sir, what prospect of justice can that suitor promise himself who sees that two thousand six hundred and twenty-seven causes, which have been accumulating for ten or twelve years, must be decided before his can be attended to? This administration of justice may suit the state of society in Virginia, but it is not such as the people of the United States meant to provide for themselves under that happy form of Government which they have adopted. In looking into the sixth article of the amendments to the Constitution, which have been adopted by the people, I find this expression of the public will, "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial," &c. If, sir, the old system is to be revived, what, let me ask, will be the condition of persons accused of crimes? And who may not be accused? It is acknowledged by those who advocate the repeal of this law, that under that system, owing to the vast distance which judges were obliged to travel, the rising of rivers, impassable roads, and various inevitable accidents, judges could not, and frequently did not, arrive in time to hold a court. The same thing, owing to the same causes, will happen hereafter. What will be the consequence? Persons accused of crimes and confined in your jails to await their trials, must continue perhaps in the confinement of a dungeon six months longer before they can have an opportunity of having their guilt or innocence ascertained before a court of law. What, under this system, becomes of the right of the accused to a speedy trial, sacredly guaranteed to him by the Constitution? If innocent, you punish him; if guilty, you inflict a double punishment, one before, and one after conviction. This consideration alone, in a free country, ought to outweigh all arguments arising from the trifling additional expense to which we are subject by the act proposed to be repealed. But however important the speedy administration of justice in criminal prosecutions, that alone was not all which the citizens intended to secure to themselves when they adopted this Constitution. The speedy administration of justice in civil actions was then deemed important. The Convention of the State of Virginia, when this Constitution was adopted, proposed certain amendments to it, and, among others, a bill of rights. In that bill of rights I find the twelfth article expressed in this manner: "That every freeman ought to find a certain remedy, by recourse to the laws, for all injuries and wrongs he may receive in his person, property, or character. He ought to obtain right and justice freely, and without sale; completely, and without denial; promptly, and without delay; and that all establishments or regulations, contravening these rights, are oppressive and unjust." The Convention of North Carolina, copying after Virginia, adopted precisely the same amendments. Both those States then thought, that all establishments or regulations contravening the right of obtaining justice, promptly and without delay, were oppressive and unjust. Those amendments were proposed to the Constitution of the United States, and regarded the attainment of justice in the courts of the United States. Those States, then, were not afraid of a too prompt administration of federal justice. Now a system, which has confessedly been found to prevent courts from being holden, and to postpone suitors from term to term without trial, and which,

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

from the very nature of its organization, will often produce that effect, is to be restored; and one which all agree is calculated to insure a speedy trial, is to be abolished. I am not disposed to dwell long upon this subject, not having been a member of this House when the act now to be repealed passed. But, sir, when I heard the objections to the old system, and the advantages of the new one, so fully stated by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD,) when I found that the plan of separating entirely the supreme from the circuit courts originated as early as the year seventeen hundred and ninety, and was then recommended to Congress by the then Attorney General, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) as appears by his report, read yesterday by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HUGER;) when, as that gentleman has truly observed, the document before us contains only the business done by the judges of the supreme and district courts in the circuit courts, and not the business of their own particular courts also; when I reflect on the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and the extreme absurdity of subjecting, in another place, the determinations of the same men to the revision of themselves, might I not rationally indulge the hope that gentlemen would have been satisfied, that the Judicial establishment, as it now exists, does furnish to the citizens a much fairer chance for the attainment of justice than the old one? and that they would have permitted the Constitutional question to have slept for the present? But, sir, we are compelled to consider whether the bill on your table can pass without a violation of the Constitution. Before other considerations are attended to, I hope I may be permitted to present to the Committee one argument, derived from the progress of the bill itself. A gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) told us some days past, that, on this subject, the Constitution speaks a plain and intelligible language. Let me inquire where gentlemen have found this plain and intelligible language. One gentleman, taking for granted the position to be proved, and reasoning ab inconvenienti, has found it in the evil consequences, resulting from establishing a different doctrine:—"an army of unimpeachable judges, with salaries, and without offices."

Another has found it in a distinction between supreme and inferior courts, derived from the words "may" and "shall." Another, in the words, "from time to time." Another, in that clause of the Constitution, which authorizes Congress to establish tribunals inferior to the Supreme Courts supplying the word abolish, omitted by the Convention which framed the instrument. Another, in a discovery, that misbehaviour is no crime in a judge, for which he can be impeached; and therefore the Legislature must, ex necessitate rei, possess the power of removing judges from office.

Another has found the language in "the will of the people," not literally expressed in their written Constitution, but in their elections, in a change of rulers; believing, I presume, that the vox populi is vox dei, and that human, must yield to divine laws and constitutions.

Another has found it in the tyranny which will be established, if you suffer the judges to test the laws by the Constitution. Another, in the words "to promote the welfare," in the preamble to the Constitution. Another, in an exposition of the word "hold," connected with that clause of the Constitution, which authorizes the President to grant commissions.

And last of all, the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. R.) abandoning all these, has found it in the "quo animo," as he expresses it, with which you give your vote: erecting in every man's mind a tribunal before which to test the constitutionality of measures. The doctrine is—believe that you do not violate the Constitution, and it is not violated! This last position, whatever its merits, has not novelty to recommend it. "As a man thinketh, so is he," has been taken for the basis of many false speculations before this time. Instead of finding this plain language in any one part of the Constitution, ought not the various grounds which have been taken by the friends of the bill, to teach gentlemen to distrust the soundness of the doctrine which they wish to support? Shall I be told, in answer to this, that those who oppose the bill have taken grounds as various in their opposition to it? No, sir, we uniformly ground our arguments on two plain and unequivocal sentences in the Constitution: "The judges both of the superior and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour; and shall receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." Those who oppose, are indeed obliged to follow those who support the bill, in their devious course; and find arguments to answer the constructions, by which these words, which are truly plain and intelligible, are attempted to be done away. But having been apprized by the gentleman from Virginia, that the great Constitutional question to be decided is, whether the Judiciary is a co-ordinate or subordinate branch of our Government; and whether it is competent for the courts to decide upon the constitutionality of laws; and this bill having been brought forward at a period, which gentlemen are pleased to call fortunate for that purpose, I hope I shall be excused for requesting the attention of the Committee for a few moments to this question. One gentleman, from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH) having said he was not disposed to contend about the terms co-ordinate and subordinate, I am willing to substitute others. Is the Judiciary a distinct and independent branch of the Government, ordained and established by the Constitution as such? In examining this question, I may be permitted to inquire, whether it is competent for the judges to pronounce on the constitutionality of your laws. One gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) seemed disposed to waive this inquiry, probably in consequence of the sentiments of a different kind, avowed by his friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) yet it deserves to be considered; and that gentleman could not suffer it to pass in silence, but charged the claim of such power to the judges as one of their crimes.

Although proving this, does not, I admit, prove that the judges of our courts are, by the Constitution, rendered independent of the Legislative power; yet it furnishes a strong reason for giving to that instrument, if it will bear it, such a construction as will make them so. Judges dependent on the Legislature for their continuance in office, for the continuance of their offices, or for a continuance of their salary, cannot be expected to decide against the wishes of those on whom they depend. Gentlemen ask, where we find in the Constitution a power given to the judges to decide against the constitutionality of laws? I answer, in the sixth article, these words: "This Constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." The judges are not only sworn to support the Constitution, but their oath of office binds them to judge "agreeably to the Constitution and the laws." The expression, "supreme law of the land," imports inferior and subordinate laws. What are those laws, unless acts of Congress? The expression respecting laws made pursuant to the Constitution, necessarily implies that laws may be made which will not be pursuant to that instrument. Such are not the supreme law of the land. They are not law. Shall not the judges when called upon to decide if, in their opinion, a bill should be passed by Congress against the Constitution which assumes the form of a law, declare it, I will not say null and void, if gentlemen dislike those terms, but to be no law?—not being made pursuant to the power delegated to Congress by the Constitution. In the case of Vanhorne vs. Dorrance, decided in the circuit court for the district of Pennsylvania, reported in Dallas's Reports, Judge Patterson is made to say:

"What is a Constitution? It is the form of Government delineated by the mighty hand of the people, in which certain first principles of fundamental laws are established. The Constitution is certain and fixed; it contains the permanent will of the people, and is the supreme law of the land; it is paramount to the power of the Legislature, and can be revoked or altered only by the authority that made it. The life-giving principle and the death-doing stroke, must proceed from the same hand. What are Legislatures? Creatures of the Constitution; they owe their existence to the Constitution; they derive their power from the Constitution; it is their commission; and therefore all their acts must be conformable to it, or else they will be void. The Constitution is the work and will of the people themselves in their original, sovereign, and unlimited capacity. The one is the work of the creator and the other of the creature. The Constitution fixes limits to the exercise of Legislative authority, and prescribes the orbit within which it must move. In short, the Constitution is the sun of the political system around which all Legislative, Executive, and Judicial bodies must revolve. Whatever may be the case in other countries, yet in this there can be no doubt that every act of the Legislature repugnant to the Constitution is absolutely void."

In another part of the same case, the same

Judge, speaking of an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, upon the constitutionality of which he was then deciding, says:

"If this be the legislation of a Republican Government, in which the preservation of private property is made secure by the Constitution, I ask, wherein it differs from the mandate of an Asiatic Prince? Omnipotence in legislation is despotism. According to this doctrine, we have nothing we can call our own, or are sure of for a moment; we are all tenants at will, and hold our property at the mere pleasure of the Legislature. Wretched situation, precarious tenure! And yet we boast of property and its security, of laws, of courts, of constitutions, and call ourselves free!"

Before I lay aside this case, I will take the liberty to read the remarks of the same Judge, respecting the tribunals of justice:

"The rights of private property are regulated, protected, and governed by general, known, and established laws, and decided upon by general, known, and established tribunals—laws and tribunals not made and created on an instant exigency, or an urgent emergency, to serve a present term or the interest of a moment. Their operation and influence are equal and universal; they press alike on all. Hence security and safety, tranquillity and peace. One man is not afraid of another, and no man afraid of the Legislature."

In another case, reported in the same book, Judge Iredell, speaking of Congress, says:

"Upon this authority, there is, that I know, but one limit, that is, that they shall not exceed their authority. If they do, I have no hesitation to say that an act to that effect would be utterly void, because it would be inconsistent with the Constitution, which is a fundamental law, paramount to all others, which we are not only bound to consult, but sworn to observe."

In the case of Bull and wife against Calder and wife, as well as in several other cases, the same doctrine is maintained by the Judges of the Supreme Court. And, sir, it is to this doctrine that we owe our liberty—which consists in security to our persons, our property, and reputation. And will the gentleman from Virginia impute the maintaining of this doctrine to the judges as a crime? Is this the question to be decided? Are we to show our control over the courts, to repeal this law, and put the judges down? Let it be remembered that, in these decisions, the judges were not "claiming powers," as the gentleman from Virginia has been pleased to express it, but solemnly deciding between citizen and citizen, the rights of private property. And let us arrogate to ourselves as much wisdom as we please, who, let me ask, are most competent to decide correctly important questions arising under the Constitution, our judges or our legislators? Legislatures will, in violent times, enact laws manifestly unjust, oppressive, and unconstitutional; and that, too, under the specious pretext of relieving the burdens of the people. Such laws, it is the business of the judges, elevated above the influence of party, to control. Let me mention an instance: Previous to the adoption of this Constitution, and during the time of the paper-money system of the State of Rhode Island, an act was passed by the Legislature of that State, subjecting to a penalty any person who should refuse that money, then in a very depreciated state, for articles offered for sale in the market; and a new and summary mode of prosecution and trial was provided. The money was offered to a butcher in the market for his meat; it was refused. An action was brought to recover the penalty, and I now see in his place an honorable member of this House, then a judge of the supreme court of that State, who concurred with the rest of the judges of that court in declaring the law to be unconstitutional and void.

H. OF R.

The consequence was, that the judges were summoned to appear immediately before the Legislature to answer for their conduct, and it was with the greatest difficulty that the Legislature were prevented from dismissing them instantly from office. I mention this to show, that such has been, and such will be, the conduct of Legislative bodies. Such ought always to be the conduct of judges, and this can with certainty be effected in no other way than by rendering them independent of the Legislature, subject only to removal by impeachment. But, sir, I beg leave again to recur to the amendments which were proposed by certain States to the Constitution, at the time of its adoption, to show what was the sense of those States, at that time, on the importance of the independence of the Judiciary to the liberties of the people of this country. In the declaration of rights proposed by the Convention of the State of Virginia, I find the fifth article is in these words, "that the Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary powers of Government, should be separate and distinct, and that the members of the two first may be restrained from oppression by feeling, and participating in, the public burdens, they should, at fixed periods, be reduced to a private station, return into the mass of the people, and the vacancies be supplied by certain and regular elections." Then, sir, the doctrine of the responsibility of the judges to the will of the people, did not prevail in Virginia. It was not then thought necessary that the judges should return to the mass of the people, to restrain them from oppression. The Convention of the State of North Carolina recommended a bill of rights as an amendment to the Constitution, containing precisely the same words; and to render the judges as independent as possible, the convention of each of those States recommended also an amendment, that the salaries of the judges should neither be increased nor diminished during their continuance in office. Who, then, can say that a limitation of the Legislative power was not intended by those who adopted the Constitution? and, sir, it was intended by those who framed the Constitution. Gentlemen admit that the words in the first section, article third, of the Constitution, "The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall, at stated times, receive for their service a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office," were designed to secure the independence of the judges while in the exercise of their official duties, as long as the office continues. Let me ask gentlemen, if, upon their construction, that you may abolish the office, this end is really attained? In what consists the independence of a judge? It consists in having his mind elevated above the fear of any evil consequence resulting to him from rendering upright and impartial judgments; in his being so situated as not to have his mind wrought upon, directly or indirectly, by any other considerations than those arising from the justice of the causes which he is about to decide. Considering the infirmities of human nature, the framers of the Constitution supposed it necessary, in order to secure an administration entirely impartial, that the judge should know that, let him decide as he will, provided he acts honestly, he shall not be deprived of his office, nor suffer a diminution of his salary.

Here, let me ask, what difference in effect there can be upon the mind of a judge, while in the administration of justice, to know that, in consequence of the decision which he is about to make, his office will be taken from him, or he taken from his office? Will not the effect be precisely the same in one case as the other? In either case the office and the judge are separated from each other. Upon the construction given to this part of the Constitution by the friends to the bill, the judge is not to be turned out of office, nor his salary diminished, lest his independence should be impaired; and yet he is to cease to exercise judicial functions, and to cease to receive any salary if he decides against the wishes of the Legislature—and still be independent! If the Constitution meant to secure the independence of the judges, while in office, let gentlemen apply to it one rule of construction of instruments of writing; so construe "ut res magis valeat quam pereat." And, then, let them ask themselves, if, upon their construction, the end which they acknowledge the Constitution had in view is attained? But if the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) can avoid the first part of the sentence, "the judges shall hold," &c., by considering hold, as implying tenure under the President, and not operating as a limitation upon Legislative power; how does he avoid the second: "They shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished," &c.? I am sensible it has been attempted, by saying that compensation is given for services rendered, and if you deprive the judges of the power of rendering services, by abolishing their offices, the compensation ceases of course. But, I apprehend, you cannot entirely dispense with his services. If you abolish the court in which he ordinarily administers justice, he may still grant commissions of bankruptcy, issue judicial writs, and perform various other services. To my mind the plain language of the Constitution is this: Congress may "from time to time," as the exigencies of the country, arising from its increasing population, growing commerce, or other causes, shall require, ordain and establish such inferior courts as may be deemed necessary. In the exercise of this power, the Constitution supposes that a sound discretion will govern; that there will be no abuse of it. That, as the country shall advance in population and wealth, its situation may be such as to require more inferior courts, but never less. That when courts are once established, you may, if you please, alter, modify, change, or transfer jurisdiction from one court to another. But whatever is done upon this subject, must always be done with a sacred regard to the inviolability of the judges already in office: and if you wish entirely to change the organization of the courts, it can only be done when the offices of the judges are vacant, or with reference to the happening of that event. You cannot totally divest a judge of all judicial authority or diminish his salary, and thereby compel him to resign his office; nor deprive him both of office and salary. Upon any other construction, the provisions of the Constitution intended to secure the independence of the judges, are not only inefficient, but absurd. The word hold, itself, upon which the gentleman from Virginia has predicated his argument, supports this construction. It implies an inseparable connexion between the person holding and the thing held; which can no more be dissolved in one way than in another. All means looking to that end are alike forbidden.

A gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) has defined a court to be an institution for the administration of justice; and said that he could no more conceive of a court without a judge than of a Legislature without legislators.

[Mr. BACON explained.—He said he was not responsible for the definition, he took it from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL.) He did not say "without judges, but without offices."]

Mr. GODDARD proceeded. I am not able to recollect the force of the gentleman's argument, unless he meant to say that the abolition of a court necessarily put down a judge. The gentleman quoted the twenty-seventh section of the act of last session, which abolished circuit courts, as a precedent in point to justify the repeal of that law. But the abolition of a court does not necessarily imply that a judge is put out of office, or the office itself discontinued. Congress, by law, erect courts, give names to those courts, and create offices; but this same justice cannot be administered in them until afterwards, by an act of the President, judges are appointed. The circuit courts, as organized before the act of last session were holden by judges of the Supreme Court, assisted by district judges. Abolishing circuit courts did not affect the judges of the Supreme Court, or the district judges; each remained independent judges, holding their proper offices. A name of the institution is nothing, and I very much question, whether the name of the Supreme Court may not be changed. The Constitution, it is true, has said that there shall be one Supreme Court. It implies that there shall be one court, supreme or superior to all others—but may it not be called by what name you please? But it has been said, upon the same principle that you can withdraw from a court a part of its jurisdiction, you may withdraw the whole, and leave a naked judge, without any jurisdiction, following a salary; this does not follow. As I have before remarked, a judge may exercise many judicial functions without a court to sit in; and I have also remarked, that the power to erect new tribunals from time to time, was always to be exercised with sound discretion. The Constitution does not go on the ground that it will be abused; that new courts will unnecessarily be erected; that power is no otherwise limited than by enjoining upon the Legislature, to do all which is done on this subject with an eye to the independence of judges already in office. To aid us, sir, in our construction of the Constitution of the United States, I beg leave to turn the attention of the Committee for a few moments to some of the State constitutions. I believe we shall not only find, in many of them, the principle of the independence of the Judiciary admitted; but, in some of them, expressly, the doctrine for which I now contend. Some of the State constitutions existed in their present form anterior to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States; some have been since amended. In the bill of rights prefixed to the constitution of New Hampshire, are these words: "It is, therefore, not only the best policy, but for the security of the rights of the people, that the judges should hold their offices, so long as they behave well." In the constitution of that State, under the head of the Judiciary power, are these expressions: "The General Court are hereby empowered to make alterations in the power and jurisdiction of the courts of common pleas, and general sessions of the peace, respectively; or if they shall judge it necessary for the public good to abolish those courts," &c. Previous to the adoption of this constitution, which was but a revision of a former one, there existed in that State a Supreme Court, the judges of which, as well as those of the inferior courts, held their offices during good behaviour.

The people of that State supposed it necessary expressly to delegate to the Legislature the power of abolishing inferior courts, the judges of which hold their offices during good behaviour, and for that purpose, among others, amended their constitution. And, sir, delegating to the Legislature the power of abolishing inferior courts, clearly implies that the power of abolishing the Supreme Court was withheld. Can, then, the Legislature of New Hampshire repeal the law organizing the Supreme Court of that State? Clearly not. In the bill of rights, as well as in the constitution of Massachusetts, the independence of judicial officers is provided for, and in the article which relates to the Executive power, I find these expressions: "as the public good requires that the Governor should not be under undue influence of any of the members of the General Court, by a dependence on them for his support," &c.; then follows a provision for an honorable salary to be provided for him, also for the judges of the Supreme Court. I read this for the purpose of showing that, if the public good requires that the Governor should be elevated above an undue influence of the members of the General Court, it much more requires that the judges should be above that influence. But, sir, I will not detain the Committee by adverting to all the State constitutions, in which the independence of the Judiciary department is established; I will only notice the expressions in that of New Jersey: "The judges of the Supreme Court shall continue in office for seven years." An act of the Legislature of that State would be necessary to organize that court. Can a subsequent Legislature repeal that act before the expiration of seven years? Can a judge be said to continue in office after the office is abolished? I presume not. The Constitution is imperative—he shall continue in office. Here the word hold, implying tenure, is not used, and yet the principle is precisely the same as that adopted in the Constitution of the United States. The difference consists only in the time for which the office is held. In New Jersey, the time is definite; in the Constitution of the United States, indefinite, until the happening of an event—the misbehaviour of the judges. In many of the State constitutions, provision is made for the removal of the judges upon the joint application of both branches of the Legislature, to the Executive. Having these constitutions and the statute of 12th and 13th William, which introduced that provision in England, before them, the framers of our Constitution chose to discard it, and provide for the removal of judges only on impeachment of the House of Representatives before the Senate, and a judgment of that body, in which two-thirds must concur. Gentlemen admit that, in England, the independence of the judges has ever been the pride and boast of that country. That it has tended to the preservation of the liberties of the people. But, they say, upon our construction of the Constitution of the United States, judges will be more independent than they are in England. Suppose it is admitted; what follows? Nothing, but that the liberties of the people of this country are better secured than in that. From the nature and principles of the British Government, there is no danger of the judges being removed but for misbehaviour. One branch of the Legislature of that country being hereditary, the other elective, if the judges decide uprightly, but against the wishes of the popular branch, the other branch will not probably concur in a vote to remove them. If they decide uprightly, but against the wishes of the hereditary branch, the other will not probably concur in such a vote, and they can be removed only upon the joint address of both branches. Our Government being more free, and wholly elective, a mode that gives greater independence to the judges than that is adopted. No joint vote of both branches of the Legislature can, in no way, remove a judge or separate him and his office. A vote of the House of Representatives may impeach; a vote of the Senate, two-thirds concurring, may remove. Several gentlemen, in discussing this subject, have gone very far from the question before us, in bringing into view matter foreign from the merits of the question. I shall not attempt to follow them. But, sir, suffer me for a moment to notice one charge which is brought against the judges: They have attempted, say gentlemen, to introduce the common law into this country, and this gentlemen seem to consider as a crime. I had, indeed, believed that the people of this country esteemed the common law as their privilege. In the seventh article of the amendments which have been adapted to the Constitution, it is expressly recognised, "in all suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." The people of the State of Maryland esteemed it so important, as to introduce a provision respecting it, into their bill of rights, the third article of which declares, "that the inhabitants of Maryland are entitled to the common law of England, and the trial by jury according to the course of that law." But, sir, I will not pursue this subject. Gentlemen have told us that they are honest—that they have the good of their country at heart; that elections in this country are always to be confided in; that the people will, by their votes, cure all the evils which may be introduced. Let the motives and views of gentlemen be ever so pure, I cannot but shudder at a principle, which is calculated to prostrate at the feet of one department of the Government, another department co-ordinate with itself—independent of it; and unless gentlemen can prove to me that there is something more than human in the American character, I cannot cease to fear the evils which will result from this measure. Ought not gentlemen, at the moment of the triumph of one party over another, to distrust themselves? The human mind is often influenced by motives which it does not acknowledge, even to itself. Hazael, when told that he would set fire to the strong holds of Israel, and commit other abominable crimes, exclaimed, "But what! Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" But he went away and did the very things which he thus spurned at. I do not believe that gentlemen wish to introduce into this country the horrid scenes which have lately passed in review before us in France. But they are too recent and too horrible to be soon forgotten. Too horrible, indeed, to be mentioned.

Let gentlemen ask themselves if this measure does not look the same way? There was a time when the Brisotines in France were thought honest, virtuous, and patriotic. They claimed from the people unlimited powers; confiding in them, unlimited powers were granted. Let gentlemen call to mind the time when, in that country, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial powers were exercised by the same persons; let them remember the scenes, too dreadful to be repeated, which flowed from the concentration of all the powers of Government in one branch. And let them ask themselves if we have no reason to tremble at the consequences which may result from the introduction of the same principle, by the passage of the bill on your table?

Mr. RUTLEDGE.—I have kept my seat, Mr.

Chairman, until this late stage of the debate, under a hope that the arguments of gentlemen who advocated the passing of this bill would convince me it is not unconstitutional; but, after having listened most attentively to them for many days, I find the deep impression made upon my mind that it attacks the very vitals of our Constitution, has been fortified and extended instead of being dismissed.

It is not necessary, sir, for me to call to your recollection what was the situation of America anterior to the formation of the present Government. Our State Governments had proved to be mere ropes of sand. Experience had shown the Confederation to be miserably defective in all its parts. Those evil times, when anarchy and jealousy distracted our State Governments, and clashing interests threatened to break our Federal Union, called all America to action. The people of this nation summoned their wisest and best men to meet in Convention, to form a Constitution which should promote the lasting welfare of our country, and secure the liberties their valor and wisdom had won. The difficulty of the task was fully equal to its importance.

In reviewing the histories of other Republics, the Convention saw that, like the splendid shows of a magic lantern, they had appeared and disappeared in almost the same moment of time: as had been observed by a celebrated writer, they rose like a rocket and fell like the stick. Although their existence had every where been transient, yet it had been protracted wherever the institutions of the country had excited any kind of veneration for its judicature. At Athens in particular, and indeed throughout Greece, the liberties of the people were for a season preserved by the respect felt towards the august Court of Areopagus. Notwithstanding the aspiring ambition of some of the States, the intrigues of powerful demagogues, and the general degeneracy of manners, yet, as long as this venerable judicature was respected, Greece continued free. As soon as it lost its influence the people lost their liberties. Taught, by these examples, the value of a good judiciary, the patriots who met at Philadelphia determined to establish one which should be independent of the Executive and Legislature, and possess the power of deciding rightfully and finally on conflicting claims between them. The Convention laid their hand upon this invaluable and protecting principle; in it they discovered what was essential to the security and duration of free States; what would prove the shield and palladium of our liberties; and they boldly said, notwithstanding the discouragement in other countries in past times, to efforts in favor of republicanism, our experiment shall not miscarry, for we will establish an independent Judiciary; we will create an asylum to secure the Government and protect the people in all the revolutions of opinion, and struggles of ambition and faction. They did establish an independent Judiciary. There is nothing, I think, more demonstrable than that the Convention meant the Judiciary to be a co-ordinate, and not a subordinate branch of the Government.

This is my settled opinion; but on a subject so momentous as this is, I am unwilling to be directed by the feeble lights of my own understanding, and as my judgment, at all times very fallible, is liable to err much where my anxieties are much excited, I have had recourse to other sources for the true meaning of this Constitution. During the throes and spasms, as they have been termed, which convulsed this nation prior to the late Presidential election, strong doubts were very strongly expressed whether the gentleman who now administers this Government was attached to it as it is. Shortly after his election, the Legislature of Rhode Island presented a congratulatory address, which our Chief Magistrate considered as soliciting some declaration of his opinions of the federal Constitution; and in his answer, deeming it fit to give them, he said: "The Constitution shall be administered by me, according to the safe and honest meaning contemplated by the plain understanding of the people at the time of its adoption; a meaning to be found in the explanations of those who advocated, not those who opposed it. These explanations are preserved in the publications of the time." To this high authority I appeal—to the honest meaning of the instrument; the plain understanding of its framers. I, like Mr. Jefferson, appeal to the opinions of those who were the friends of the Constitution at the time it was submitted to the States. Three of our most distinguished statesmen, who had much agency in framing this Constitution, finding that objections had been raised against its adoption, and that much of the hostility produced against it had resulted from a misunderstanding of some of its provisions, united in the patriotic work of explaining the true meaning of its framers. They published a series of papers, under the signature of Publius, which were afterwards republished in a book called the Federalist. This cotemporaneous exposition is what Mr. Jefferson must have adverted to, when he speaks of the publications of the time. From this very valuable work, for which we are indebted to Messrs. Hamilton, Madison, and Jay, I will take the liberty of reading some extracts, to which I solicit the attention of the Committee. In the seventy-eighth number we read:

"Good behaviour for the continuance in office of the judicial magistracy, is the most valuable of the modern improvements in the practice of Government. In a Republic it is a barrier to the encroachments and oppressions of the representative body. And it is the best expedient that can be devised in any Government to secure a steady, upright, and impartial administration of the laws. The Judiciary, in a Government where the departments of power are separate from each other, from the nature of its functions, will always be the least dangerous to the political rights of the Constitution. It has no influence over the sword or the purse, and may truly be said to have neither force nor will, but merely judgment. The complete independence of the courts of justice is essential in a limited Constitution; one containing specified exceptions to the legislative authority; such as that it shall pass no ex post facto law, no bill of attainder, &c. Such limitations can be preserved in practice no other way than

‘through the courts of justice, whose duty it must be to declare all acts manifestly contrary to the Constitution, void. Without this, all the reservations of particular rights or privileges of the States or the people would amount to nothing. Where the will of the Legislature declared in its statutes, stands in opposition to that of the people, declared in the Constitution, the courts designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the Legislature, are to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority. The Convention acted wisely in establishing good behaviour as the tenure of judicial offices. This plan would have been inexcusably defective had it wanted this important feature of good government.’

The authority I have read proves to demonstration, what was the intention of the Convention on this subject; that it was to establish a Judiciary completely independent of the Executive and Legislature, and to have judges removable only by impeachment. This was not only the intention of the General Convention, but of the State conventions, when they adopted this Constitution. Nay, sir, had they not considered the judicial power to be co-ordinate with the other two great departments of Government, they never would have adopted the Constitution. I feel myself justified in making this declaration by the debates in the different State conventions. From those of the Virginia convention, I will read some extracts, to show what were there the opinions of the speakers of both political parties. The friends of the Constitution insisted that our federal judges would be independent of everything but their behaviour and their God. The opposers of the Constitution insisted that they would not be perfectly independent of the Legislature, because they might increase their salaries. Most affectionately attached to the sovereign rights of the States and the people, the opposers of the Constitution displayed all the suspicion of jealous lovers. They supposed the judges would not be completely independent, and insisted if they were not, there would soon be a concentration of all powers in the Legislature, and a perfect despotism in our country. Hence it appears, that both parties thought the judges ought to be beyond the reach of the Legislature, except by impeachment. The friends of the Constitution insisted they were so; the opposers feared they were not. Let us attend to the debates in the convention of Virginia.

General Marshall, the present Chief Justice, says:

“Can the Government of the United States go beyond those delegated powers? If they were to make a law, not warranted by any of the powers enumerated, it would be considered as an infringement of the Constitution, which they are to guard: they would not consider such a law as coming under their jurisdiction; they would declare it void.”

Mr. Grayson, who opposed the Constitution, we find saying:

“The judges will not be independent, because their salaries may be augmented. This is left open. What if you give six hundred pounds or one thousand pounds annually to a judge! It is but a trifling object, when, by that little money, you purchase the most invaluable blessing that any country can enjoy. The judges are to defend the Constitution.”

Mr. Madison, in answer, says:

“I wished to insert a restraint on the augmentation, as well as diminution, of the compensation of the judges, but I was overruled; the business of the courts must increase. If there was no power to increase their pay, according to the increase of business, during the life of the judges, it might happen, that there would be such an accumulation of business as would reduce the pay to a most trivial consideration.”

Here we find Mr. Madison not using the words good behaviour, but says, “what we say was meant for good behaviour” during the life of the judges. The opinions of Mr. Madison I deem conclusive, as to the meaning of the words good behaviour; but I will read what was said by Mr. Nicholas, which is substantially the same. [Here Mr. R. read several extracts from the debates in the Virginia convention. Those quotations show that, in Virginia at least, the public wish and intention was to have an independent Judiciary.] Let us now see what was the opinion on this subject of the first Congress under the Constitution, when the first Judiciary bill was debated. Mr. Stone says: “The establishment of the courts is immutable.” Mr. Madison says: “The judges are to be removed only on impeachment, and conviction before Congress.” Mr. Gerry, who had been a member of the General Convention, expresses himself in this strong and unequivocal manner:

“The judges will be independent, and no power can remove them: they will be beyond the reach of the other powers of the Government; they will be unassailable, and cannot be affected but by the united voice of America, and that only by a change of Government.”

Here it is evident, Mr. Gerry supposed a project, like the present, could only be effected by the people, through the medium of a convention; he did not suppose it possible for Congress ever to grasp at this power. The same opinions were held by Mr. Lawrence and Mr. Smith. [Here Mr. R. read further extracts from the Congressional Debates.] In addition to those high authorities, permit me, Mr. Chairman, to read some parts of the lectures on the Judiciary of the United States, of the celebrated Judge Tucker, the present Professor of Law at the University of William and Mary, in Virginia. [Here Mr. R. read from Tucker's Lectures.] I wish gentlemen, who compare the official tenure of our judges with those of Great Britain, to attend to the wide distinction between their independence, as shown by the learned judge and professor, whose lectures I have cited; he shows that the judges in England have only a legal independence; while in America, they enjoy Constitutional independence.

The advocates of this bill say, the people could not have meant to establish an independent Judiciary, because a permanent body of men, beyond all control, would prove hostile to the liberties of the people. Sir, we do not contend for any such establishment; we do not wish for a Judiciary permanent and beyond control. No, sir, all we insist upon is, that the judges are liable to that sort of control only which the Constitution establishes; that "good behaviour" is the tenure by which they hold their office, and that they cannot be removed from it but by impeachment. That the Judicial authority was never designed to depend upon the Executive and Legislative powers, but, in some sort, to balance them. That our federal judicature was meant to give to the Government a security to its justice against its power; it was contrived to be, as it were, something exterior to the State. The honorable gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. SMITH,) who preceded me, says, our construction of the Constitution is derived from implication. This is not the case, sir; we require no ingenuity, no sophistry, no metaphysical distinctions to bear us out in our construction. We resort to the plain meaning of the words of the Constitution. Knowing the Constitution would contain the seeds of its dissolution, should it contain articles liable to ambiguity, the Convention cautiously avoided obscurities; they selected as plain words as any in our language, to represent their intention of having an independent Judiciary; they used words that are intelligible to almost every capacity. Let us read them. "The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour." These are the words of the Constitution; and what words, sir, could have been found more express, more unequivocal in their meaning? Let us suppose, that, instead of being the Legislature, and instead of having the Constitution before us upon trial, and (as is the case I fear) being about to sign its death warrant, we were a convention, called by the people, to form a constitution; that we had determined to establish an independent Judiciary; to have judges removable only by impeachment; that, having decided this principle, it was referred to a committee to draught a clause conformably to the idea of having the Judiciary entirely independent of Executive and Legislative power; and that this service was assigned to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES;) could his ingenuity, could his knowledge of our language, furnish words to represent the intention of having an independent Judiciary, more appropriate, more unequivocal, more familiar, than the words used by the Convention, and which I have just read? They are explicit, simple, unqualified, and, at the same time, imperative. The understanding of the Convention, of the States, and of the people at large, was, that our Judiciary should be independent. They deemed this Constitutional check essential to the duration of the Government; and until the fourth day of last March, I believe the Judiciary was considered as sacred. The State Governments, and the people, and the friends of our Federal Union, revered it as the fortress and ark of their safety.

While this shield remains, it will be difficult to dissolve the ties which knit and bind the States together. As long as this buckler remains to the people, they cannot be liable to much or permanent oppression. The Government may be administered with indiscretion and with violence; offices may be bestowed exclusively upon those who have no other merit than that of carrying votes at elections; the commerce of our country may be depressed by nonsensical theories, and public credit may suffer from bad intentions; but, so long as we may have an independent Judiciary, the great interests of the people will be safe. Neither the President nor the Legislature can violate their Constitutional rights. Any such attempt would be checked by the judges, who are designed by the Constitution to keep the different branches of the Government within the spheres of their respective orbits, and say, thus far you shall legislate, and no farther. Leave to the people an independent Judiciary, and they will prove that man is capable of governing himself; they will be saved from what has been the fate of all other Republics, and they will disprove the position that Governments of a Republican form cannot endure. I did hope, from the promises made by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) on a former occasion, when we attempted to postpone this bill, that he would have given it an unimpassioned consideration. If it were possible for him to dismiss party feelings, and argue any question upon its real merits, it was to be hoped he would have given a cool and deliberate consideration to this all important subject, and argued it upon the ground of Constitutionality. But, unmindful of his promise not to consider this a party question, the gentleman prefaced his observations with saying, he designed to make them personal.

His preliminary remarks were highly afflictive to myself and friends. We deprecated this course, but the gentleman's crimination must be deemed a justification of the recrimination which he has rendered necessary.

This is a painful task, and if gentlemen should feel themselves or their friends wounded by any of our observations, they must recollect the situation in which they have placed us, and that the necessity of defending ourselves has been imposed upon us by their attacks. In a speech which occupied two hours, ten minutes only of that time were given to a consideration of the constitutionality of this measure, and then the gentleman found it convenient to employ the rest of it in fulminating his anathemas against the past Administrations, and reiterating those invectives and censures which on all past occasions he has indulged himself in bestowing upon those who are no longer in power. Whether attacks are to be continued upon the past Administrations to divert the public eye from the present Administration, or whether they are calculated to raise a smoke, under the cover of which gentlemen may march unobserved to attack the vitals of our Constitution, is best known to themselves. The gentleman from Virginia has rendered homage to the Judiciary of Great Britain; acknowledges much of the prosperity of that nation to be produced by the independence of their judges; says ours are at least as independent, but that the doctrine of making them completely independent, is a monstrous one. Sir, there is no kind of analogy between the Governments of America and Great Britain, and none between the situation of the judges in that and in this country. The people of England gained much, and an abundant source of oppression dried up, when they got their judges made independent of the Monarch, whose creatures they had been, and whose arbitrary measures they had been obliged to support. But, sir, it was impossible to make the judges a check upon Parliament, for nothing in that Government is independent of Parliament. In this country things are far different; we have a written Constitution; the people have given certain powers to the Executive, other defined powers to Congress, and delegated other powers to the Judiciary. But the gentleman from Virginia wishes to make Congress as powerful as the Parliament of Great Britain; he wants the Legislature in America to be (like the Parliament in England) without control; he wants to destroy that check which the people in their Constitution formed for us; he wants to prostrate that protecting principle which was never before known in a Republican Government, and for want of which all Republics have perished. In England the independence of the Judiciary, as far as it goes, I highly appreciate; but I venerate the independence of our judges (as designed by the people when they adopted the Constitution) because it is complete; in England it is not. There they have a legal independence; here a Constitutional one. Although the independence of the judges in England is partial, yet it has been productive of vast good; although they may be said to be in some measure still dependent on the Monarch, inasmuch as pensions and places are in his gift, yet it is well known the independence they do possess of the Crown prevents reasons of State from entering the courts, and that the royal will sinks into nothing and disappears at the seat of justice when opposed by the law. From many proofs of this fact, I beg leave to select the case of Mr. Wilkes, at the time of his second election, and when he had been outlawed: although the whole power of the Crown was most actively employed to crush this obnoxious subject, yet Lord Mansfield, and the whole bench of judges, declared the outlawry contrary to the principles of common law, and reversed it as being illegal. Permit me to read this case. [Here Mr. R. read an account of the proceedings, and the whole of Lord Mansfield's celebrated speech.] The Judiciary on this occasion we see checking arbitrary Executive measures, because they were independent of the Executive.

H. OF R.

In America the Judicial power was designed as a Constitutional check upon both the Executive and Legislature; but gentlemen on the other side, deprecating all control, are for prostrating the check imposed by the people on their Representatives, and the destruction of which will make them omnipotent. The gentleman from Virginia says the Judicial power was not formed by the Constitution. I shall not be surprised by any declaration he may make about the meaning of the Constitution after this. Sir, the Judicial power is established by the Constitution equally with the Executive and Legislature. The organization of the courts has been left to Congress, but the instrument under which we act has established the Judiciary, and has also assigned its duties. A charge has been made against us by the honorable gentleman, which I must deny; I plead not guilty to it, and say he is wholly mistaken. He has charged us with having changed with the times, and with having formerly advocated the extension of the powers of this House. Sir, this is not the case, tempora mutantur sed non mutamur in illis. Knowing how strongly disposed in Governments like ours the popular branch always is to grasp at illegitimate powers, we have in times past struggled hard for preserving to all the branches of the Government the powers delegated to them respectively by the Constitution. We have ever been watchful of Executive and Judicial rights, and defended them from the encroachments attempted by the Legislature. The gentleman from Virginia must permit me to call to his memory the course of conduct we pursued on a very memorable occasion, when he and his friends wished this House to arrogate Executive powers. I refer to the proceedings on a motion made by the honorable gentleman then his colleague, who is not now a member of this House, (Mr. Nicholas,) in the debate on the foreign intercourse bill. Mr. Nicholas said:

"I believe all governments like ours tend to produce a union and consolidation of all its parts in the Executive department, and the limitations of each other will be destroyed by Executive influence, unless there is a constant operation on the part of the Legislature to resist this overwhelming power. A representative Government may be made the most oppressive, and yet preserve all its Constitutional forms, and the Legislature shall appear to act upon its own discretion while that discretion shall have ceased. Where under our Government the Executive has an influence over the Legislature, the Executive is capable of carrying its views into effect in a manner superior to what can be done in a despotic monarchy. Mischiefs will be carried further, because the people will be inclined to submit to a Government of its own choosing. Monarchs cannot carry their oppression so far without resistance as Republics. Suppose Executive patronage had extended its influence into the Legislature, and that in consequence of a thirst for office majorities were formed in both branches of the Legislature devoted to the views of the Executive; where would be a check to objects hostile to the public good? In what branch of the Government would you look for it? Was it the Senate? Will you look to this House? The majorities are humble expectants of office. Where then will you find anything capable of controlling the overbearing influence of the Executive? It must be in small and feeble minorities, who, by their opposition, and attention to the interests of the people against arbitrary power, may rouse the people to a sense of their danger, and force the public sentiment to be respected; this, he conceived, would be the only check."

It hence appears, that those gentlemen have availed themselves of every occasion to extend the powers of Congress, and had their attempts been successful, we should ere this have had a consolidated Government; a kind of Government which the people of this country never wished to establish, and which is incompatible with their best rights. The gentleman from Virginia, whose argument I have quoted on the subject of the foreign intercourse bill, shows that those who were then in the minority extended their project so far as to count upon the minority to check the powers of the other departments of Government. Not so, sir, is the case with us; we do not count upon the efforts of feeble minorities; we do not wish to guard the Constitution by appeals to the people; we will do nothing calculated to produce insurrection; we do not want to protect the great charter of our rights by the bayonet. No, sir, we rely on honest and legitimate means of defence; we wish to check these gentlemen only with Constitutional checks. The people of America say in their Constitution, the Judiciary is designed as a check upon the Legislature and Executive, and as a barrier between the people and the Government. We say it is the sheet-anchor which will enable us to ride out the tornado and the tempest, and that if we part from it there is no safety left; that it is the only thing which can preserve us from the perilous lee-shore, the rocks and the quicksands, where all other Republics have perished. The Judiciary is the ballast of the national ship; throw it overboard and she must upset.

[Mr. GILES begged leave to explain. He said the gentleman had not quoted his arguments fairly; he never held the ideas ascribed to him; he certainly had not said the gentleman from South Carolina wished, on former occasions, to confide power to the popular branch of the Government. The gentleman from South Carolina, he believed, never wished this or any other popular branch of Government trusted with power.]

Mr. R. said, on a subject so momentous as this he would not trust to his memory; that he had taken down the words of the gentleman from Virginia; he certainly did not mean to misrepresent him, and was sorry he had supposed he had not quoted him fairly. It has been further said by this gentleman, that as the Judiciary was established for the benefit of the people, and is maintained by their money, the people must wish it put down when the proper authority tells us it has no duties to perform, and is a mere sinecure. I should be glad to know, sir, what is meant by the proper authority; are we to judge in this business, or is the Executive to judge for us? Sir, the Executive has seen fit to judge for us; but I believe he has gone beyond the line of his duty; and it would be more proper to call this document, now in my hand, an officious than an official act. However unpleasant it may be to gentlemen to call this an Executive measure, the great solicitude discovered by the President to get disembarassed of this most salutary Constitutional check, proves it his measure. It is not the measure of Congress nor of the people, but of the Executive. Not satisfied with calling the attention of Congress to this subject, he has, in his zeal to furnish arguments to those who support here his measures, given us a table showing what business had been done in the Federal courts prior to the late organization of them. Had the former President furnished the late Congress with such a document as this, it would have been considered as abundant evidence of the inconvenient organization of the Federal courts, and furnished arguments for the change in the system which we did make. The result of this document is, that owing to the inconvenient arrangement of the system, suitors were deterred from entering the national courts. It shows how insufficient the provision for doing business was under the ancient system, and not how little there is to do. In a nation so great, and so growing in its greatness as ours is; among a people so commercial, so enterprising, and so attached to right as are the people of this country, there must be much law or there will be no justice. But had the late Executive furnished, unsolicited by Congress, such a document, the whole nation would have rung with censures. He would have been charged with considering Congress as a mere bureau; a committee or commune through which the Executive was to make his projects and his propensities felt. In this document, No. 8, we see the arm of the Executive raised against the Judiciary, and in his Message we hear him say it must fall. If he had contented himself with merely directing our attention to the law he wishes repealed, we might have obtained much more useful information for ourselves than what he has been pleased to give. If he had only adverted to this subject as one requiring the consideration of Congress, and they had wished for information, they would have called upon the proper officer for it, and have directed the Attorney General to furnish a table, showing what business had been done in the circuit courts since the time of their establishment. Such a document would have shown whether the existing law be beneficial or not. But the President, it seems, did not deem it wise to leave us the usual course of obtaining information; perhaps he had sufficient reasons for this; probably such a document as I have mentioned would have given a result not suited to Executive views. It would have shown that much important business had been done in the circuit courts, although they had but a short existence. Whether the Executive was incited to act with the promptitude he did, to prevent its being known of what vast utility the law is, it is not for me to say. I must be permitted, however, Mr. Chairman, to say, that having passed the last Summer in the Eastern States, I know that in that section of the Union the circuit court was fully occupied during its session. It is within my own knowledge, that at Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, there was much business done; at Boston there was a great deal of important business despatched, much to the satisfaction of suitors, and I learned from an authentic source that the court was a highly popular one. At Newport, in Rhode Island, there was so much business, that the court was under the necessity of holding evening sessions. In Vermont, I know that much business was done, and done much to the satisfaction of the public. From the gentlemen of the bar in New Jersey, we have a memorial, stating that there had been many causes tried in the circuit court in that State. In Philadelphia, the gentlemen of the bar, of both political parties, have united in informing us that they deem the continuance of this court not only useful but necessary. From the Chamber of Commerce at New York, and from the merchants in Philadelphia, we have received petitions, praying for a continuance of the law, which has been denounced, and which the Executive thinks unnecessary. These facts make a mass of high evidence, which on ordinary occasions would weigh much. But I hear it will not preserve the law in question. It has been frowned upon from high authority, and I fear it must perish.

Sir, this document, No. 8, is as little calculated to serve the purposes of gentlemen who appeal to it, as is the document produced some days past by a gentleman from Virginia. (Mr. THOMPSON;) he gave us a record from the court of chancery, in Virginia, to show how much business there is done in that court, where, he says, there is but one judge, and his salary is only one thousand five hundred dollars. The honorable gentleman says, in Virginia they have but one chancellor, with the salary of one thousand five hundred dollars, who renders as much service as all the national courts; and to prove this, he reads to us a certificate from the clerk of the court of chancery, stating, that on the chancery docket there were two thousand six hundred and twenty-seven causes. This paper serves to show, not what business is done, but what a mass of business there is undone, and which the court is incompetent to dismiss. What a frightful picture has he given of the judicature of his own State! How alarming must it be to foreigners, and the citizens of other States, who may have causes depending in Virginia! What chance can a citizen of South Carolina, Massachusetts, or elsewhere, have of obtaining justice before the lapse of many years, if the history given by the gentleman from Virginia be correct! Should a citizen of another State be a suitor in Virginia, it is competent to the citizen of that State to carry the cause into the court of chancery, where a mass of business presents itself to his view, and he finds two thousand six hundred causes must be dismissed before his can be heard. Where would the citizens of other States, having debts in Virginia, attempt their recovery? They would seek justice, sir, in the Federal circuit court, which gentlemen now are endeavoring to annihilate, and not in the State courts, which may be more properly called a bed of justice than a court of justice, if justice sleeps there, as the gentleman has represented. He also states, that State justice is cheaper than national justice. I do not believe this a correct position. I am very willing to enter into a comparison, but must exclude from it Virginia, because he has shown that justice is denied there, it being greatly delayed. I did hope, Mr. Chairman, the motion made before I got up, for the rising of the Committee, would have obtained, and should not have commenced offering my observations at so late an hour, had there not been a loud call for the question; but as I am unwilling to abuse the patience of the Committee, as I have detained them I find more than two hours, and have not yet offered half of the observations I am desirous of submitting, I will suspend them for the present and continue them to-morrow, or will now proceed, as shall be most agreeable to the Committee.

On motion of Mr. S. SMITH the Committee rose.

THURSDAY, February 25.

A memorial of John Gardiner, an alien, now an inhabitant of the City of Washington, was presented to the House and read, stating that the memorialist has brought his family into the United States, with an intention to reside permanently therein; and praying, that, therefore, he may be enabled to obtain a patent for discovery of a method of constructing dry docks to repair and build ships in, on navigable waters, where the rise and fall of tides is inconsiderable.—Referred.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred, on the ninth instant, the petitions of John Caldwell and others, merchants and traders in the State of Connecticut, and of sundry merchants and inhabitants of the town of Plymouth, in the State of Massachusetts, reported a bill for the rebuilding the light-house on Gurnet Point, at the entrance of Plymouth harbor; for rebuilding the light-house at the eastern end of New-castle Island; for erecting a light-house on Lynde's Point, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House then went into a Committee on the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. RUTLEDGE.—I beg leave, Mr. Chairman, to proffer my thanks to the Committee for the indulgence with which they favored me yesterday; and at the same time to acknowledge the respect excited by the politeness of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, who moved for its rising. In the course of the observations I yesterday offered, I endeavored to show that it was the intention of the Convention to make our judges independent of both Executive and Legislative power; that this was the acknowledged understanding of all the political writers of that time; the belief of the State Conventions, and of the first Congress, when they organized our Judicial system. If I have been successful in my attempt to establish this position, and if (what I suppose cannot be denied) it be true in jurisprudence that whenever power is given specially to any branch of Government, and the tenure by which it is to be exercised be specially defined, that no other, by virtue of general powers, can rightfully intrude into the trust; then I presume it must follow, of consequence, that the present intermeddling of Congress with the Judicial department is a downright usurpation, and that its effect will be the concentration of all power in one body, which is the true definition of despotism. As, sir, every thing depends upon the fair construction which this article in the Constitution respecting the Judiciary is susceptible of, I must again read it. [Here Mr. R. read several clauses of the Constitution.] Some of the clauses we see are directory and others prohibitory. Now, sir, I beg to be informed of what avail are your prohibitory clauses, if there be no power to check Congress and the President from doing what the Constitution has prohibited them from doing? Those prohibitory regulations were designed for the safety of the State governments, and the liberties of the people. But establish what is this day the ministerial doctrine, and your prohibitory clauses are no longer barriers against the ambition or the will of the National Government; it becomes supreme and is without control. In looking over those prohibitory clauses, as the representative of South Carolina, my eye turns with no inconsiderable degree of jealousy and anxiety to the ninth section of the first article, which declares—[Here Mr. R. read the article respecting migration before the year 1808.]

I know this clause was meant to refer to the importation of Africans only, but there are gentlemen who insist that it has a general reference, and was designed to prohibit our inhibiting migration as well from Europe as any where else. It is in the recollection of many gentlemen who now hear me, that in discussing the alien bill, this clause in the Constitution was shown to us, and we were told it was a bar to the measure. And an honorable gentleman from Georgia, then a member of this House, and now a Senator of the United States, (and who had been a member of the Convention,) told us very gravely, he never considered this prohibition as relating to the importation of slaves. I call upon gentlemen from the Southern States to look well to this business. If they persevere in frittering away the honest meaning of the Constitution by their forced implications, this clause is not worth a rush; is a mere dead letter; and yet, without having it in the Constitution, I know the members from South Carolina would never have signed this instrument, nor would the convention of that State have adopted it. My friend from Delaware, standing on this vantage ground, says to our opponents, Here I throw the gauntlet, and demand of you how you will extricate yourselves from the dilemma in which you will be placed, should Congress pass any such acts as are prohibited by the Constitution? The judges are sworn to obey the Constitution, which limits the powers of Congress, and says, they shall not pass a bill of attainder or ex post facto law; they shall not tax articles exported from any State, and has other prohibitory regulations. Well, sir, suppose Congress should pass an ex post facto law, or legislate upon any other subject which is prohibited to them, where are the people of this country to seek redress? Who are to decide between the Constitution and the acts of Congress? Who are to pronounce on the laws? Who will declare whether they be unconstitutional? Gentlemen have not answered this pertinent inquiry. Sir, they cannot answer it satisfactorily to the people of this country. It is a source of much gratification to me to know, that my sentiments on this subject, as they relate to the constitutionality of it, are in unison with those of the wisest and best men in my native State. The Judicial system had proved so inconvenient there, as to render a new organization of it necessary some years past. There were gentlemen in the Legislature as anxious to send from the bench some of the judges as gentlemen here are to dismiss our federal judges. Personal animosities existed there as well as here, though not to so great an extent; but it was the opinion of a large majority of the South Carolina Legislature, that as the Constitution declares "the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour," the office could not be taken from them, the measure was abandoned, and the wise and cautious course pursued, which we wish gentlemen here to follow: the system was not abolished, but modified and extended; the judges had new duties assigned to them, and their number was increased, but no judge was deprived of his office. In South Carolina they have a court of chancery, consisting of three chancellors, and the law establishing it requires the presence of two judges to hold a court. During a recess of the Legislature one of the chancellors resigned and another died. The functions of this court of consequence became suspended. All the business pending in it was put to sleep. The public prints were immediately filled with projects for destroying the court, which had been denounced as unnecessary. As the citizens of the western part of the State had not participated much in the benefits derived from the court of chancery, many of the most influential of them deemed it of little utility. The opposition assumed so formidable an aspect as to determine the Governor (who exercises the power of appointing judges during the recess of the Legislature) not to make any appointment, believing the court would be abolished. When the Legislature met, an effort was made to abolish the court; but a large majority giving to the Constitution the honest meaning of its framers, considered the judges as having a life estate in their offices, provided they behaved well; and the vacancies on the chancery bench were immediately supplied.

That the national Judiciary Establishment is comparatively more costly than are the State Judiciaries, is far from being the case, I believe. It may be so in Virginia, where they have one chancellor, with little salary and much business, but it is not so in other States. In South Carolina, we have six judges at common law, at six hundred pounds sterling a year each; three chancellors at five hundred pounds each; which, together with the salaries and fees of office of the attorney general, master in chancery, solicitors, clerks, and sheriffs, amount to six thousand two hundred pounds sterling. And yet, sir, justice, I believe is no where cheaper than in South Carolina. By the judicious structure of her Judiciary system, the streams of justice are diffused over the whole State, and every man is completely protected in his life, liberty, property, and reputation. The courts are almost constantly in session. The judges are gentlemen of high talents, integrity, and strict impartiality; and every one who goes into the court of that State, not only obtains ample justice, but obtains it promptly; this, sir, is what I call cheap justice. The gentleman from Virginia has seen fit to notice the law which laid a direct tax, and said it was imposed when we knew the Administration of this Government was soon to pass from those then in power, and was resorted to as a means of extending Executive patronage, and to make provision for the friends of an expiring Administration. Can the honorable gentlemen be serious in all this? Does he remember when we passed this law? It was in 1798, when I will be bold to say, the Administration enjoyed the highest degree of popular favor. In no popular Government, perhaps, was an Administration more popular than was the former Administration, at the time this tax was laid. Sir, this law had no connexion with personal or party considerations. Like all the measures of the past Administration, it was designed to promote the public good. Had we, like our opponents, consulted the caprices and prejudices, and not the real interests of our constituents; had we been merely attentive to popular favor, we should not have passed this law. At the crisis it was passed, the public good demanded it, and we were regardless of every other consideration. A nation that had lighted up the flame of war in every corner of Europe, that was prostrating the liberties of every free people, and subverting the Government of every country, saw fit to menace us. Told us for the preservation of our peace and independence we must pay tribute. This degrading measure was scornfully rejected by our Administration; they said, if we must fall, we will fall after a struggle; and our citizens prepared themselves for war with alacrity, and regarded every sacrifice as inconsiderable, compared with the great sacrifice of our independence. With this prospect of immediate war, we should have acted not only unwisely but treacherously, had we trusted for public income to the revenue derived from trade. Had our trade been destroyed, there would have been a complete destitution of revenue, and to place the means of national defence as far beyond the reach of contingency as possible we imposed the direct tax. We knew this law would prove arms and ammunition to those who were inventing all the falsehood credulity could swallow, and who were busily employed in misrepresenting and calumniating the conduct of the Government. We did suppose they might make this law their artillery to batter down the Administration; but we were not deterred from our honest purposes by this expectation; a change of men, when compared with a change of government, weighed with our minds as dust does in the balance; our measures did not aim at popularity, and we were just to our country, regardless of party consequences.

At this early period, says the gentleman, it was to have been calculated what would be the result of the Presidential election. Sir, those must have been gifted with second sight, they must have been prophets indeed, who could have then foretold how the election would issue; the result was as doubtful as any event could be, till within a few days of the election. It is recollected that everything depended upon the South Carolina vote; all the gentlemen in nomination went there with an equal number of votes; the anxiety displayed at the time by the gentlemen here from Virginia, proved they then deemed it doubtful how the election would terminate. Indeed, sir, nothing could have been more doubtful, and I believe it is fully known to the ministerial side of this House, that it depended upon one of the gentlemen nominated, who had not the Carolina votes, to have obtained them, and produced to the election a different result; but his correct mind was obnoxious to any intrigue; it would not descend to any compromise, and this honorable man knew that no station could be honorable to him unless honorably obtained. In the very wide range which the gentleman from Virginia has permitted himself to take, he has been pleased to notice the conduct of the late Congress when they were occupied in the election of a President of the United States, and he has said we were then "pushing forward to immolate the Constitution of our country." What does all this mean, sir? What, sir! because we, of the two gentlemen who had from the electors an equal number of votes, did not prefer him who was from Virginia, are we to be charged with an immolation of our Constitution? Sir, the gentleman from Virginia was not a member of the last Congress, and lest he should not know the history of the transaction to which he alludes, I will give it.

The Electors chosen in the different States gave the same number of votes for Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr; there being a tie, it devolved, by the direction of the Constitution, upon the House of Representatives to make an election. We sincerely believed that Mr. Burr was the best and the most fit man to be President, and we accordingly voted for him; we continued to vote for him six and thirty times; we were anxious to have him elected, and we deprecated the election of the other candidate; but when we found gentlemen were determined not to have the candidate from New York, and said they would have him from Virginia President, or they would have no President, we, who venerated our Constitution too sacredly to do anything which should hazard the loss of it, yielded. We believed Mr. Jefferson radically and on principle hostile to the National Constitution; we believed some of the most important features in it obnoxious to him; we believed him desirous of destroying the independence of our Judiciary; we believed him opposed to the Senate as now organized, and we believed him destitute of that degree of energy necessary to maintain the general liberty of the people of the United States. With these impressions deep upon our minds, we should have been traitors to our country had we voted for the gentleman from Virginia, as long as there was any prospect left to us of elevating the gentleman from New York; but when we found the object of our preference was so obnoxious to gentlemen on the other side, that they would hazard the having of no President rather than have him, we ceased our opposition. And this is what the honorable member from Virginia has been pleased to call "pushing forward to immolate the Constitution."

I regret, Mr. Chairman, being compelled to mention names and say anything of a personal nature, but I am obliged to do it in pursuing the gentleman from Virginia, who in his extraordinary course has not only mentioned the names of gentlemen, but ascribed unworthy motives for their conduct. He has said Mr. Read and Mr. Green voted for the law under which they got appointments. Although I have abundant proof that neither of these gentlemen solicited their offices, that they were given spontaneously, and without being expected, yet I will merely answer this observation by mentioning what is very generally known to all gentlemen who have been of late in the councils of the nation; it is, that it was the invariable practice of the former Executive to appoint gentlemen to office without previously advising with them. It is well known that under the law gentlemen are now endeavoring to repeal, Mr. Jay was appointed Chief Justice, and about the same time several gentlemen in this House were appointed to some of the most honorable stations under our Government; the Executive's intention, it is well known, had not been previously notified to them; it is well known they all declined accepting the places proffered to them. Permit me, sir, to give a brief history of the case of Mr. Green, on which the gentleman from Virginia has dwelt so much.

The district judge in Rhode Island was appointed circuit judge, and Mr. Green was appointed district judge. On the fourth day of March, Mr. Green took his seat in the Senate; the friends of the Administration objected to his keeping it; they said he was a judge, as appeared by the journals of the Senate; they here made a complete recognition of his appointment as judge, and he vacated his seat. After getting home he received his commission, in which the blanks had been filled up with the words circuit judge, instead of district judge. Mr. Green enclosed his commission to the Executive, in a letter most profoundly respectful, and requested the errors of the clerk in the Department of State might be corrected, and his commission made to conform to the appointment, as recorded on the Senatorial journal. To this letter, which was in highly respectful terms, the President would not deign to have any answer given; he pocketed Mr. Green's commission, and placed another gentleman in his office. This is a history of the appointment of Mr. Green, and the manner in which the President "corrected the procedure." To my friend from New York, (Mr. MORRIS,) who some days past adverted to the President's system of persecution, the honorable gentleman from Virginia says he is so ignorant of the existence of any such system that he cannot conceive what is alluded to; and my friend from North Carolina, (Mr. HENDERSON,) who spoke of the destructive spirit which had mounted in the whirlwind and now directs the storm against one-half of the community, he charges with having winged his flight into the regions of fancy; and tells us the spirit he sees is a mere spirit, thin as air, and without real form or substance. Sir, my honorable friend from North Carolina is under no magical delusion; the spirit he noticed is a gigantic spirit, and with a giant's size unites a giant's appetite: it attacks the independence of mind, and violates the right of opinion; it establishes a mental tyranny; tampers with integrity and poisons morals; it has arraigned one-half of the community against the other; it denounces as a "sect" in our country all those whom the illustrious WASHINGTON took to his confidence and invested with his favor. It establishes boards of inquisition to know how men who are in office voted at the last election, and if they did not then subserve the views of the ruling party they are stripped of their offices. Many of the proscribed are veterans of '76. They wasted their youth and their substance in fighting our Revolutionary battles, and as a small reward for great services, they had offices given them by the distinguished WASHINGTON. Most of those who had been appointed by him, this destroying spirit has turned adrift, and to those who are not yet destroyed, it gives (in the New Haven reply) the promise of Polypheme to Ulysses, and says, "you shall be devoured last." This is the spirit, sir, against which my friend from North Carolina has raised his voice, and if the gentleman from Virginia will appeal to the wives and children of ninety or a hundred meritorious men who have been hurled from office to make way for those who are willing, without examination, to yield a blind support to ministerial measures; to sing hosannas to the President, and bend to his will as the osier does to the breeze; I say, sir, if he will appeal to the wives and children of those gentlemen, who have been degraded, disgraced, and reduced to want, as far as it was in the power of the Executive to degrade and reduce them, they will tell him this is a spirit of substance, and not thin as air. Fatigued by its labors, we now see this great spirit resting on its club; it no longer dispatches its victims as heretofore, by batches, but, as strength and appetite return, proscriptions are continued, though in detail. Since the meeting of Congress, there have been many dismissals; in the last week only, I heard of that of a meritorious officer, who is an aged and war-worn soldier. To this gentleman, who had grown grey in the service of his country, General WASHINGTON gave an office which might cheer the evening of his days; the duties of it were discharged with industry and fidelity. He has been a useful citizen; he has thirteen children, and most of them are daughters—the oldest has scarcely numbered eighteen years, and the youngest not more than eight months. This gentleman has been placed on the proscribed list; not, sir, because he had been negligent of any one of his duties, but because some of those hands which (as it has been modestly said) burst open the doors of honor and confidence, were widely stretched out for rewards; to give them loaves and fishes they have been taken from the support of this numerous and lovely family. Sir, there not only exists, as my friend from North Carolina tells us, a great and destroying spirit, but there are also subordinate spirits employed in this goodly work of prescription; the master-spirit, unable to take a view of the whole ground, has its under spirits; these minor spirits, within the spheres of their respective departments, are singling out objects of Executive vengeance. By some of the papers which lie before me on my desk, I see the Postmaster General is busily employed; every postmaster, and every little deputy-postmaster, who cannot prove his claims to Executive favor by proofs of conformity to the orthodox faith of the day, is considered as a heretic. In the persecution of the Postmaster General, of those who are not devoted to the party, I observe something truly ridiculous. Thinking, I suppose, that public opinion would demand some justification of this conduct, he undertakes to assign reasons for it. I observe in the paper of this morning the Postmaster General has removed one of his deputies at Augusta, in Georgia, and makes a sort of an apology for it. He tells the man it is because he is a printer, and the occupations are incompatible. This gentleman writes to him that he is not a printer, and that he never was concerned, directly nor indirectly, in the publishing of a paper. It seems, then, the Postmaster General was mistaken, but the deputy lost his office. This lesson will prevent future explanations, probably, by the Postmaster General. It will be more convenient for him to wrap himself up in Executive infallibility and insist "the King can do no wrong." The gentleman from Virginia has noticed the Sedition act, and says, the present Executive requires no such shield for his protection; that he wants no artificial means of defence; yet, in the very same breath, we hear the gentleman complaining of defamatory scribblers, and of the profligacy of our presses. It does not become the honorable gentleman to complain of the public prints. It is well recollected, that when heretofore we endeavored to check the licentiousness of the press, he and his friends insisted that its licentiousness and liberty were so closely allied, that should we attempt to touch this vein, we would run the hazard of giving a mortal wound to the great arteries of the body politic. This was formerly the language of gentlemen who are now, it seems, suffering from the effects of their past policy. They are now experiencing what they might have learned from a good old book, "He who soweth the wind shall reap the whirlwind." It did not become them (to use our Saviour's expression) to "cast the first stone." I shall here, sir, close my observations in answer to those offered by the gentleman of Virginia, to whom I have had occasion to refer so often. Permit me, however, before taking my leave of him, to express my sorrow that he deemed it necessary, in ranging the wide field he occupied, to visit Mount Vernon, and attempt to disturb the ashes of our political father. This circumstance was not required to prove that pre-eminence is often obnoxious; "and why must Aristides be called more just than others?" was asked by the envious Athenian who voted for his banishment. Another honorable gentleman from Virginia asks my friend from North Carolina why he now mourns and sighs over the Constitution, which he last year assisted to violate, and insists upon it we did wound the Constitution in putting down the two courts of Kentucky and Tennessee? Sir, it has been satisfactorily shown by my learned friend from Delaware that the offices were not, in those two instances, destroyed, but modified, and that we did not take their offices from the judges, but merely assigned them new duties. This, however, the gentleman from Virginia calls wounding the Constitution, and proceeds to say, you did destroy two courts, and we will destroy sixteen. What, sir, will he tell us that our hands are red with the blood of the Constitution, to justify his imbruing his? Because he thinks we then violated the Constitution, will he now murder it? Sir, it was by sounding the alarm about meditated violations of the Constitution, and by gross misrepresentations of our intentions, and reiterated charges of not respecting the Constitution, that public opinion was vitiated, the public mind misled, and the administration of our Government placed where it now is. But almost in the moment of changing, when the present Administration is in its gristle, it assumes the attitude of a gladiator, attacks the Judiciary, violates the rights of the judges, and says to us, you set the example. Sir, had we set them the example, it was a bad one, and it does not become them to follow it; but we never gave any such examples; we always revered the Judiciary as the bulwark of the Constitution, and considered the rights of the judges as the rights of all the people of America. It is said by the gentleman from Virginia, that our devotion to the Judiciary establishment makes us wince at any attempts to strip off some of its superfluous and expensive trappings, and that we will not part with the Corinthian and Composite pillars which have been added for its decoration.

Sir, the Judiciary is, in the fabric of the Constitution, not a Corinthian pillar, not any ornament added by Congress. It is, sir, the grand Doric column; one of three foundation pillars, formed, not by Congress, but by the people themselves; it binds together the abutment, is laid in the foundation of the fabric of our Government, and if you demolish it, the grand arch itself will totter and the whole be endangered. We are asked by the gentleman from Virginia if the people want judges to protect them? Yes, sir, in popular governments Constitutional checks are necessary for their preservation; the people want to be protected against themselves; no man is so absurd as to suppose the people collectively will consent to the prostration of their liberties; but if they be not shielded by some Constitutional checks they will suffer them to be destroyed; to be destroyed by demagogues, who filch the confidence of the people by pretending to be their friends; demagogues who, at the time they are soothing and cajoling the people, with bland and captivating speeches, are forging chains for them; demagogues who carry daggers in their hearts, and seductive smiles in their hypocritical faces; who are dooming the people to despotism, when they profess to be exclusively the friends of the people. Against such designs and artifices were our Constitutional checks made to preserve the people of this country. Will gentlemen look back to the histories of other countries, and then tell us the people here have nothing to apprehend from themselves? Who, sir, proved fatal to the liberties of Rome? The courtier of the people; one who professed to be "the man of the people," who had willed his fortune to the people, and had exposed his will to the public eye; a man who, when a Crown was proffered to him, shrunk from the offer, and affectedly said, it did not come from the people. It was Julius Cæsar who prostrated the liberties of Rome; and yet Cæsar professed to be the friend of Rome, to be in fact the people. Who was it, that, in England, destroyed the Representative Government, and concentrated all its powers in his own hands? One who styled himself the man of the people; who was plain, nay studiously negligent in his dress; disdaining to call himself Mister, it was plain unassuming Oliver; Oliver Cromwell, the friend of the people, the protector of the Commonwealth. The gentleman from Virginia says he would rather live under a despot than a Government where the judges are as independent as we would wish them to be. Had I his propensities, I, like him, would fold my arms and look with indifference at this attack upon the Constitution. It has been my fortune, Mr. Chairman, to have visited countries governed by despots. Warned by the suffering of the people I have seen there, I am zealous to avoid anything which may establish a despotism here. It is because I am a republican in principle and by birth, and because I love a republican form of Government and none other, that I wish to keep our Constitution unchanged. Independent judges, at the same time that they are useful to the people, are harmless to them. The judges cannot impose taxes; they cannot raise armies; they cannot equip fleets; they cannot enter into foreign alliances: these are powers which are exercised without control by despots; and as the gentleman from Virginia does not hold despots in abhorrence, he and I can never agree in our opinions on Government.

Whether another honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has derived all the service from his sling and his stone he had expected, or whether he feels acquitted of his promise, and now thinks himself capable of prostrating the Goliath of this House, armed cap-a-pie with the Constitution of his country, I cannot conjecture. Whether he has discovered the skill and the prowess of David, or whether he is likened to him only by the weapons he wars with, it is for the Committee to judge; for myself I must say, that his high promises had excited expectations which in me have not been realized, and when the gentleman sat down I was sorry to find my objections to the bill on your table undiminished. I say sorry, for I can lay my hand upon my heart, and in the fullness of sincerity declare, there is nothing I desire more anxiously than to be convinced by gentlemen that this measure is not unconstitutional. It is not competent for us to decide where the power of judging shall be placed, as is supposed by the gentleman from Virginia, who says the only question is where this power shall be placed. Sir, the true question is where was this power placed by the Constitution? And the honest answer will be, that it was obtained to the Judiciary by the will of the people; their power is paramount to that of the Legislature, and revocable only by the authority that gave it. In deprecating the adoption in this country of the common law of England, which was brought to it by our ancestors, and the principles of which are the fundamental maxims of our liberties, the gentleman from Virginia has attempted to show the inconveniences resulting from its uncertain rules, and has noticed the case of Williams, which occurred in Connecticut. Sir, I am surprised that a gentleman so correct as he generally is, should have fallen into the inaccuracy he has. The case of Williams is a notorious one, and it was not a prosecution at common law. The history of it is, that when General Pinckney was at Paris he learned that some of the privateers which were then cruising against the American commerce were commanded by Americans. As soon as this information reached Congress, they passed a law to prohibit our citizens from going into the service of any of the belligerent Powers. Williams continued to command a French privateer and he had captured many of our vessels; he was afterwards brought into Connecticut, and there tried and punished; not under the common law, as the gentleman from Virginia supposed, but under our statute, under the law we passed in 1798.

The gentleman has asked whether, if we had created an army of judges, and given them monstrous high salaries, it would not be right to repeal the law; that if the power exists to repeal any law which might have passed on this subject, it might not now be used? and has been pleased to say, we would have created more judges and given them higher salaries, if we had not wanted nerves; and tells my honorable and learned friend from Delaware that we were restrained by the same feebleness of nerve which induced us at the Presidential election to put blank votes into the ballot box. Sir, my friend from Delaware does want that sort of nerve that some gentlemen now discover. Although he is as brave as he is wise, yet in living without fear he will live without reproach, and never make himself liable to the charge of prostrating the Constitution of his country; for such a work it is true he has no nerve. The observations of one honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) being now reiterated by another respecting the course of conduct we pursued at the Presidential election, shows that time has not abated the resentment of Virginia which we excited by our not voting for the Virginia candidate. Permit me here to declare, sir, that in reviewing all my public conduct, I can discover no one act of which I am more satisfied than my having put a blank vote into the ballot-box. Much has been said on this subject. My friend from Delaware and myself have been denounced by the jacobins of the country; at their civic feasts, and in their drunken frolics, we have been noticed. European renegadoes, who have left their ears on the whipping posts of their respective countries, or who have come to this country to save their ears, have endeavored to hang out terrors to us in the public prints; nay, sir, circular letters have been diffused through the country, charging us with the intention of preventing at one time the election of a President, and at another with the design of defeating the vote of the Electors and making a President by law. This was all a calumny, and as it relates to the South Carolina delegation, I declare they had no intention of defeating the public will; they never heard of any project for making a President by law; they had but one object in view, which they pursued steadily as long as there was any prospect of attaining it. The gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from New York had an equal number of votes; we preferred the latter; we voted for him more than thirty times, but when we found our opponents would not unite with us, and seemed obstinately determined to hazard the loss of the Constitution rather than join us, we ceased to vote; we told them we cannot vote with you, but by ceasing to vote, by using blank votes, we will give effect to your votes; we will not choose, but we will suffer you to choose. Surely, Mr. Chairman, there was nothing in all this which had any aspect towards defeating the public will. Why I did not prefer the gentleman who ultimately was preferred, has already been mentioned. This is a subject on which I did not expect to be called upon to explain; but the gentlemen from Virginia have called, and it was necessary to answer. Permit me to state, also, that besides the objections common to my friend from Delaware and myself, there was a strong one which I felt with peculiar force. It resulted from a firm belief that the gentleman in question held opinions respecting a certain description of property in my State, which, should they obtain generally, would endanger it, and indeed lessen the value of every other. Following the example set by his colleague, the gentleman from Virginia has bestowed much censure on the past Administration, and made it a serious charge against them, having appointed under this law a gentleman of Maryland, who he says was not with us formerly, but unfurled his standard in the service of his King, and fought against his countrymen, whom he then deemed rebels. I did not expect, Mr. Chairman, to hear this observation from one of the friends of the Executive. Since the fourth of March last, I thought philosophy had thrown her mantle over all that had passed; that sins were to be forgotten and forgiven, and to prove the sincerity of this forgiving spirit, sinners were to be distinguished by Executive favors. One would have thought so in reviewing Executive conduct; where persons had been imprisoned and fined under our laws, they we know were released; where fines had actually been paid, the officers of Government had been ordered to return them, and not only Tories had been appointed to office, but old Tories, rank old Tories, who had been banished. The present collector of Philadelphia, for the internal revenue, has been appointed since the fourth of March last, and although he never, like the gentleman alluded to, shivered lances in the service of his King, yet he was actively employed in the more safe service of giving information to the British Generals, and marching before Sir William Howe, decorated with laurels, conducted him into the metropolis of his native State. Sir, there are many instances of this kind. Have gentlemen forgotten the young Englishman who was so busily employed here last Winter during the Presidential election, that in seeing him one would really have supposed him not only a member of this House, but, like him of Tennessee, holding an entire vote at his command? This youngster was sent out here by some merchants in England to collect debts due to them in this country, and his father, whose Tory principles carried him from America early in the Revolution, is now subsisting on a royal pension; and this young man has been appointed our Consul at London, and the former consul, a native and staunch American, whose conduct had been approved by merchants generally, has been turned out to create a vacancy. The gentleman from Virginia has repeated the observation of his colleague, that the people are capable of taking care of their own rights, and do not want a corps of judges to protect them. Human nature is the same everywhere, and man is precisely the same sort of being in the New World that he is in the Old. The citizens of other Republics were as wise and valiant and far more powerful than we are. The gentleman from Virginia knows full well, that wherever the Roman standard was unfurled, its motto, "Senatus Populusque Romani," proclaimed to a conquered world that they were governed by the Senate and the people of Rome. But now, sir, the Roman lazzaroni, who, crouching at the gates of his Prince's palaces, begs the offals of his kitchen, would never know that his ancestors had been free, nor that the people had counted for anything in Rome, or that Rome ever had her Senate; did he not read it on the broken friezes and broken columns of the ruined temples, whose fragments now lie scattered over the Roman forum!

Sir, the mournful histories of the Republics of Rome and Greece are not the only beacons which warn us of the danger of instability and innovation. All Europe was once free. But where now is the Diet of Sweden? Where are the States of Holland and Portugal, and the Republics of Switzerland and Italy? The people of those countries were once free and happy, but their Governments, for want of some protecting check, some inherent principle to defend themselves, have all been subverted; they have all travelled the same road; it is as plain as a turnpike; it is pointed out by the ruins of other Republics; everywhere the same causes have produced the same effects. The Government gets into the hands of theorists, and they make inroads on the Constitution, perhaps with honest views; but these innovations are precedents to sanction subsequent innovations of men with bad views, and despotism succeeds to anarchy. This is what we learn from every page of history. Let us profit by these monitions; let us take experience as our guide. We all have one common interest in this Constitution, let us then leave it untouched; if you touch, others will ruin it; what has happened elsewhere will happen here: these gentlemen are not masons in politics and government; they cannot build up again; they are mere sappers and miners, and if they pull down this mild Government, those who come after them will build up a despotic one. If you will not reject this measure, postpone it for a year; the people want no change of our Constitution, give them but time, and my life on it they will say so. The President will respect public opinion; give time for its expression, and the President will subordinate his desire to destroy, to theirs to preserve. Is there no ground upon which gentlemen will meet us and compromise? If the remnant of the Army is disliked, we will abolish it; if a further reduction of our little Navy is desired, we will reduce it; we will join in abolishing the internal revenue; sir, indeed, there is no sacrifice we will not make to prevent the sacrifice of this Constitution. Gentlemen say the Constitution will live. Sir, it may last our time, but it will drag out a miserable existence after receiving this wound; it will be mortal; inflict it, and you doom it to ruin: like the best and most lovely part of God's creation, violate, and you destroy it. As has been observed in the House above, by a countryman and honorable friend of mine, it will be with this Constitution as with a confined fluid, if a drop of it escapes, the leak through which it steals will soon become a breach by which the whole will pass away. This bill is an egg which will produce a brood of mortal consequences. Although the blow aimed at the Constitution will not immediately destroy, the injurious effects will be immediately felt; it will soon prostrate public confidence; it will immediately depreciate the value of public property. Who will buy your lands? Who will open your Western forests? Who will build upon the hills and cultivate the valleys which here surround us? He must be a speculator indeed, and his purse must overflow, who would buy your Western lands and city lots, if there be no independent tribunals where the validity of your titles will be confirmed. Have gentlemen forgot the sales of public lands made in France? The national domain was sold for assignats; after they had been all sold and one instalment was paid, the terms of payment were changed, and the purchasers were obliged to pay in specie or relinquish the lands. Sir, look at home and we see examples to prove the necessity of an independent Judiciary. Have we not seen a State sell its Western lands, and afterwards declare the law under which they were sold made null and void? Their nullifying law would have been declared void, had they had an independent Judiciary.

Whenever in any country judges are dependent, property is insecure. An honorable gentleman from Kentucky says, he does not want to seek examples across the Atlantic. Sir, is this wise? Are we to shut our eyes to the light of history and turn away from the voice of experience? Sir, the untutored Indian marks on his tomahawk great events as they pass, and argues what will happen from knowing what has happened; and shall we travel on without noticing the fingerboards erected by historians for our security? The gentlemen censure our having noticed France, and read a passage from a speech of our illustrious WASHINGTON, where he called the French a great and wise people. What has been the fate of this gallant people? Where is their constitution? We have seen Lafayette in the Champ de Mars, at the head of fifty thousand warriors, who, with one hand grasping their swords and the other laid on the altar, swore, in the presence of Almighty God, they never would desert their constitution. Through all the departments of France similar pledges were given. Frenchmen received their constitution as the followers of Mahomet did their Koran, as though it came to them from Heaven. They swore on their standards and their sabres never to abandon it. But, sir, this constitution has vanished; the swords which were to have formed a rampart around it, are now worn by the Consular janissaries, and the Republican standards are among the trophies which decorate the vaulted roof of the Consul's palace.

Respecting the expediency there was for passing the law which gentlemen now seek to repeal, I shall say nothing, as my honorable friend from Delaware has entered into a most ample detail of it. Indeed, sir, he travelled through so extensive a field of inquiry respecting the unconstitutionality of the repeal, as well as of the expediency of having passed the law, that he has greatly narrowed the ground for all who follow him; his range was commensurate with the extent of his mighty mind and with the magnitude of the subject; a subject, sir, let me tell the gentlemen, that is perhaps as awful a one as any on this side the grave. This attack upon our Constitution will form a great epoch in the history of our Government. In the important changes we read of in the systems of other Governments, we find some public benefit to have been intended; something plausible at least was offered in justification. But here, "when we are in the full tide of experimental success," a revolution commences without any necessity of pretence. It is not to be presumed that the Executive has been incited to this by the paltry consideration of saving thirty thousand dollars. He has proved by his expenditures, since the fourth of March, that our nation is not in great want of money. The fact is, sir, that so good was the management by the past Administration of our fiscal concerns that our Treasury overflows with money; to this cause may be ascribed some of the great expenditures made during the recess, and which to me appear to have been perfectly useless; but perhaps they were not so. Although the Senate, last year, appointed a Minister to France, immediately upon its rising the President appointed another honorable gentleman (who now sits near me) Envoy to carry over the treaty; although the French had called in their cruisers, and for us it was a time of profound peace, this gentleman was sent over in a man-of-war, at an enormous expense. If gentlemen will look at the printed report of the Secretary of the Navy for the last year, of money necessary to be appropriated, they will read, in page fifty-two, that the expenses of the ship Maryland are estimated, for a year, at $37,269 77. The Maryland was seven months in carrying our Envoy, waiting his orders, and returning to America; and for seven months the expense of this ship would be twenty-three thousand four hundred and seven dollars. Perhaps all this was necessary on the part of the Executive. I barely state the fact. Another which I will notice is, that without waiting for the final ratification of the treaty, or for Congress to make appropriations for its fulfilment, the Executive had the ship Berceau repaired, to be delivered up to the French Government, at the enormous expense of thirty thousand dollars. Besides this, the officers were paid, when at Boston, six dollars per day. How does all this agree with assailing the most precious part of our Constitution to save a little money? But if I am under any delusion, and we are not rich; if we want to save, and must save money, let us turn to something else; let us begin with ourselves. The Speaker of this House receives twelve dollars a day, give him six; we receive six, let us be content with three: on our side we cheerfully agree to this reduction. If gentlemen will look at the catalogue of expenses, under the head of "Legislature," they will find a number of items which, if summed up, will amount to $193,470; let us retrench, as I have proposed, and save to the nation one half of this sum; we will, in doing so, save nearly $100,000 a year.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

Sir, gentlemen may depend upon it the people of this country are too intelligent to ascribe this measure to the mere desire of saving a little money; they will view it as the vengeance of an irritated majority. I conjure gentlemen to celebrate their victory by more harmless sports. Let them triumph over us, but not by immolating the Constitution; let them beware, that in erecting a triumphal arch for the celebration of their success, they do not dig a grave, and decree funeral rites for our Constitution. I repeat again, that this is not a way to save money. If saving really be the object, let our opponents procure it by more gentle means. To attempt saving a little money by injuring the Constitution, would be like taking from the foundation to patch the roof; like digging up for use the roots of a tree, instead of lopping off the boughs. To the confidence inspired by the independence of our judges are we indebted for much of our national prosperity.

Pass this law and the tribunals in America will be like those of France, as described by the most brilliant scholar and sagacious statesman of the age. On the subject of the French judges, Mr. Burke has said: "In them it will be vain to look for any appearance of justice towards strangers; towards the obnoxious rich; towards the minority of routed parties; towards all those who in the election have supported unsuccessful candidates. The new tribunals will be governed by the spirit of faction." I feel myself much honored, Mr. Chairman, by the great attention the Committee have given to my observations. They have, I fear, exhausted all your stock of patience. I find they have exhausted all my strength; but the magnitude of the subject will, I trust, be an apology for their length. Permit me here to express my sorrow at hearing the declaration of an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GREGG,) who yesterday, after joining in the call for the question, rose, and said it was useless to continue the debate, as the minds of the majority were fully made up. It seems the gentlemen are not open to conviction, and that they have determined to violate the sanctuary. Myself and my friends will not, however, be deterred by this menace. We have always been the sincere friends of this Constitution, and we will attempt its defence as long as we have the means of making it. We will struggle to the last; if we cannot command success we will endeavor to deserve it. If the friends of the Constitution are subdued by numbers, the Ministerial phalanx, in bursting into the temple, will, I hope, find them all at their posts; they will be in the portico, the vestibule, and around the altars, grasping, grappling the Constitution of their country with holds of death, and with nollumus mutari on their lips.

Mr. DAWSON.—When we are told, sir, that we are about to pass a law which violates that Constitution which we have all sworn to support; when this is echoed over and over again from every quarter of this House, I can no longer, sir, indulge that disposition which I have to be silent; and I now rise to enter my protest. When we are told, sir, that we are about to adopt a measure which will endanger the peace and happiness of our country, it behooves us to summon all our wisdom, to investigate the subject with all deliberation, and to ascertain clearly those great principles which, while they guard our Constitution, secure the rights, the liberties, and property of the people. Such, sir, is the language which we have heard for the last ten days from gentlemen on the other side of the question, and such, sir, is the course which has been adopted by us. I believe, sir, that there never was any subject in any country, and at any time, more ably discussed than this has been in the other branch of the Legislature. I believe, sir, that few subjects have been more fully investigated than this has been in this House. Sir, the arguments used by an enlightened and venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, on my right; by an honorable gentleman from North Carolina, on my left, and by several of my colleagues must still be fresh in the recollection of every gentleman of this Committee. Permit me to say, that their conclusive strength has not been impaired by anything which has fallen in reply, nor do I mean to enfeeble them by any observations of mine, either as to the expediency or constitutionality of the measure.

Sir, in a field extensive as this, it is more than probable that some gleanings do still remain; the collection of those I shall leave to other gentlemen, more ingenious and more industrious than myself, and will beg leave to reply to some of the observations of a collateral nature, which have just fallen from the gentleman from South Carolina. Think not, Mr. Chairman, that I mean to notice those which may be considered of a personal nature; the respect which I have for you, for this Committee, and for myself, all forbid it; there are others to which I will advert.

The dreadful picture which has been drawn by that gentleman of the situation of our country, should we pass this bill, will for a long time haunt the recollection of every gentleman of the Committee, and, if true, disturb the peaceful slumbers of that honorable gentleman. Whether he has drawn the picture to the life, or whether it is too highly colored, it rests with this Committee to determine. To a gentleman, sir, of his fancy, of his imagination, the task was easy, and I may add, it was a very unnecessary one. It is admitted by us, that the Constitution of our country is the ark of our covenant; the rock of our salvation, on which political storms and the rage of party may beat, and subside. This is the doctrine for which we have always contended; which we support on this day; and could the friends of this repeal be taught to doubt the constitutionality of the measure, I am bold to say, they would immediately withdraw their support. Nay, sir, for myself, I avow, that was I not persuaded that the public good and the public will do imperiously command the repeal, sympathy and a regard for the feelings of men, who have been invited into office by a public act, and sanctioned by a public appointment, would induce me to oppose this bill. But believing as I do, that the public will and the public good do command the repeal, and that the Constitution of our country does not forbid it, I shall vote in favor of the repeal, and lend to it my feeble aid.

Mr. Chairman, in the course of this debate, a new character has been introduced, and has occupied much of our attention; it was presented to us by the honorable the mover of the amendment from North Carolina; it has been invoked and pretty freely used by his neighbor, who has just sat down. It is a spirit, sir. Mr. Chairman, you will confess, that there is some difficulty in meeting an opponent of this sort, and in answering arguments drawn from this source. I believe it best done by declaration. For myself, then, I declare that spirit of which we have heard so much, that spirit of innovation which gentlemen so highly deprecate, is that spirit which I adore.

It is not, Mr. Chairman, that spirit which, fearful of itself, gave to us an Alien and Sedition law, thereby driving the invited stranger from your shore, and rendering each neighbor suspicious of the other.

It is not that spirit, sir, which, in defiance of a positive injunction of our Constitution, placed a gag on our press, to prevent an investigation of its own proceedings. It is not that spirit, sir, which threatened a transportation of your citizens to their enemies, and the humbling of them in dust and ashes, because they dared to express their sentiments on their own concerns. In fine, sir, it is not that spirit which, by the creation of useless and expensive establishments, loaded your citizens with taxes and stained your country with insurrection. No, sir, it is the counter spirit! It is that spirit which places confidence in our fellow-citizens, and fears not the machinations of those who may visit us; which pronounces freedom to religion; freedom to the press; which restores economy in your public expenditures, thereby rendering to labor its full reward. It is that spirit, sir, which has required the repeal of the obnoxious laws I have mentioned, and of many more; and which now commands the repeal of this law; it is the voice of the people!

But, sir, gentlemen, not content with hunting down that spirit in this country, have, in the whirlwind of their fury, crossed the Atlantic and sought it in a far distant world. Sir, the time has been, nor is it far distant, when it was the rage, the fashion of the day to pour forth abuse on every act of the French Republic, from the commencement of the revolution; and, perhaps, sir, the aggressions of that nation on us might seem some justification. Often, sir, have I heard in this House woful lamentations for a murdered King, as gentlemen were pleased to call him. Often have I seen their warmest sensibility excited for the violated sanctity of the Holy Father, as they were pleased to term him. Whatever might have been the passions of gentlemen at that day, I did hope that they would have subsided at this, when we have made a peace with that Republic; and, let it here be impressed on the minds of every gentleman of this Committee, a peace on the very terms which the political friends of these gentlemen were pleased to prescribe; terms, which thus prescribed, have already brought many petitions to your table, and will, I fear, draw much money from your Treasury.

How far observations of the nature of those to which I have alluded, comport with the dignity of the National Legislature; how far they give respectability to our proceedings, or policy to our Government, I will leave to those gentlemen who use them to determine, and will notice some of the remarks which fell from the gentleman from Delaware.

Sir, that gentleman, in vindicating the Judiciary of the United States, has been pleased to whirl his censures against the Executive department; by the first, he declares, that there has not been a single act of persecution, to his knowledge, though many by the latter; that observation has been answered by one of my colleagues, and need not now be adverted to by me. I will only express, that I feel much pleasure at that gentleman's tender regard for these persecuted individuals. But the gentleman has not been content in censuring the conduct of the Executive; he has come upon this floor and cast out suspicions, at least, on the conduct of many gentlemen, who were members on a very memorable occasion. Sir, when these observations were made, I own to you, they did excite my astonishment; I did not expect them from that quarter. It is known to every gentleman of this Committee, that that gentleman represents a State, and that he always is a very efficient member on this floor. It will be remembered by many now present, that on a very memorable occasion, which, with him, I do believe the people of this country will long remember, that gentleman took a very distinguished, zealous, and persevering part. By a reference to your Journals, it will be found that it was not until the 17th day of February, when, on the 36th ballot, Thomas Jefferson was declared to be elected President of the United States; on inquiry, I find that, on the said 17th day of February, James A. Bayard was nominated Minister Plenipotentiary to the French Republic. Nay, I find more, that this nomination, although not handed to the Senate until the 17th, was dated the 13th, two days after we went into conclave; and was not confirmed until the 19th, two days after we came out. Sir, in making this statement, I mean not to impeach the motives or the conduct of the gentleman from Delaware; the high opinion which I entertain of his political morality, and the regard which I owe to truth and to candor will preclude it; neither do I mean, in making the application, to follow the example which he has set me, and to use towards him, although present, the terms which he has been pleased to use towards others, although absent; the respect which I owe to myself will forbid me to do that. I mean not to say, as he does, when speaking of our Minister at the Court of Spain, that I am yet to learn that Mr. Bayard is a man of talents, and who has rendered services; neither do I mean to consider his observations as injuring the reputation of my valued friend from New York; but I mean to say what I do believe, that, had the present President approved of that nomination made by the last, the persecuted veteran would not have received the sympathy of that gentleman, on this floor, at this day; nor should we daily have heard fulminations against the Chief Magistrate of our country, and philippics against men pre-eminent for their talents and virtues.*

Yes, sir, the gentleman has issued a dreadful fulmination, indeed; he has told us "that the day will come, he trusts in God it will come, when our Chief Magistrate will be responsible, when he will answer for his conduct." I was somewhat at a loss, and I still am, to know what the gentleman meant by this ejaculation; did he mean it as mere declamation? This I can scarcely think. Did he mean it as a discharge of that gall which may canker near his heart? If he did, I sincerely congratulate him on his deliverance. Or did he, in a more benevolent spirit, mean to express a hope, that our Chief Magistrate will live until that day when he shall be responsible to the people in that way which the Constitution points out? If this was his meaning, I most devoutly join him in his prayer; and on that day I believe it will be found, that the giving of information to the nation on the state of the Union; that the giving of information to this House, on a subject which he has thought proper to recommend to our consideration, will not be read among his political crimes. Perhaps, though, Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman meant something else; perhaps, he meant to say, that the President of the United States ought to be impeached for this his conduct; if this was his meaning, that gentleman knows full well that the door is open, that the Constitution points out the mode to him, nor do I doubt his zeal to adopt; the Chief Magistrate of your country will advance to meet it; and I am bold, sir, to believe, that while he shall pursue that line of conduct which has heretofore marked his administration, it will be as difficult to establish a tribunal to rob him of the honors which his fellow-citizens have thought proper to confer on him, as it was to erect one to prevent his taking possession of them.

Sir, it is with pain I heard some observations during this discussion, to which I turn with reluctance, but which seem to demand a reply. Gentlemen, while they reprobate one spirit, seem to be possessed of another, a more evil one. We have heard of groans, sighs, and tears, over our prostrated Constitution; we have heard of disunion, civil war, and of blood. A whole host of the evils of the enemy to mankind have been conjured up to arrest the havoc of the assassin, as they are pleased to call us.

I demand to know, sir, what gentlemen mean by observations of this kind; are they addressed to our fears? I trust, sir, they know us too well to believe that an appeal of that sort can have any impression, while we are pursuing what we deem the public good. And yet, sir, I am at a loss to conjecture, for what other purpose they could be made. Whatever that purpose may be, I deem it proper for me at this time to declare, and in making this declaration I believe I shall speak the sentiments of all those with whom it is my pride to associate, that we consider the Constitution of our country as the greatest of all good, and the wilful violator of it, as the greatest of all traitors; that we mean to administer it according to its fair construction, regardless of the clamors of others; that we view a disunion of the States and civil war as the greatest of all human calamities, which are so far hidden in the veil of futurity that no eye can penetrate them, or mind think of them without horror; that we mean, sir, to guard our Constitution and to cherish our Union. But, sir, should the awful day, which Heaven avert! ever arrive, when, by the folly of some and the madness of others, this fair fabric, the world's best hope, shall be endangered; when a discontented minority of this House, or a discontented member of a minority shall join the standard of the judge in opposition to the law, and thereby destroy the peace of our country; I say, sir, should that day ever arrive, I trust with confidence that the friends to the bill before you; the friends to the Constitution of their country, conscious of the integrity of their views and the soundness of their principles, will be found as ready to meet danger, and as firm in supporting what they consider the true interest of their country, as their vaunting opponents.

* Upon a subsequent day, Mr. Dawson stated, what he considered due to the gentleman from Delaware and to his own character, to declare, that he never personally knew any act of the gentleman from Delaware manifesting his willingness to continue as Minister to the French Republic under Mr. Jefferson; that whatever impressions of that kind had been made on his mind by others, were now removed by the positive assurances to the contrary, made by Mr. Bayard to him.

I solicit your pardon, sir, for these hasty and incoherent observations; they have been called forth by what fell from the gentleman from South Carolina, and by a recollection while up, of some of the many observations made by the gentleman from Delaware. I will close them, sir, in reply to the wish of the gentleman, who has just sat down, for a delay, by offering my congratulations to you, sir, and to this Committee, on the time and circumstances under which this great question must be met, and must be decided. Whatever that decision may be, I devoutly hope that it will promote the good of our common country. Whatever that decision may be, it will not be considered as the result of our fears, nor will the friends to the repeal be charged with an improper hostility to the present Administration. The days of terror and alarm are past, and I trust for ever. No longer does the sound of foreign invasion and domestic treason assail our ears, and serve as arguments for the violation of the Constitution of our country. No longer, sir, do the dangers of the commonwealth authorize infringements on that sacred instrument; peace and confidence are restored, and while the friends to the repeal rejoice at this state of things, while they mean not to violate the Constitution of our country, they mean to prevent a useless expenditure of public money, and to guard against an increase of Executive power, whether that power shall be continued in the hands of the present Chief Magistrate, or transferred to some other person.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—Mr. Chairman, I make no apology for entering upon the discussion of the subject now before the Committee, because I have considered the first section of the bill on your table, and which the motion of my honorable friend from North Carolina proposes to strike out, as implicating not only the dearest interest of the people of this country, but directly prostrating the fairest feature of the Federal Constitution. And I believe it to be the duty of every man, every friend to the Constitution, who has a right to be heard on this floor, to raise his voice against a measure so ruinous and destructive.

I do not however expect, nor am I indeed vain enough to imagine, after the extensive and critical view which has been taken of the subject, that it will be in my power to add much to what has been already urged. This consideration however presents to my mind no objection to the claims of being heard; for although the arguments of my friends remain unanswered, yet upon an occasion so important as the present, I deem it proper that these arguments should be repeated over and over again, that no gentleman may hereafter say, when the passion of the moment has subsided, that the objections to this measure were not sufficiently urged and explained.

This subject has presented to every gentleman who has examined it, two questions for consideration: First, can the Legislature by the Constitution destroy the judges of the circuit courts by repealing the law which authorized their appointment?

Second, admitting the power to exist; is it expedient to exercise it upon this occasion? I shall not attempt to deviate from this natural arrangement, but in the beaten track of those who have gone before me pursue the same objects.

The first of these questions is by far the most important, and if decided one way, will necessarily preclude all examination into the other; for if Congress cannot, without a violation of the Constitution, destroy the judges as proposed by this bill, it is useless to inquire into the expediency of doing it, for nothing can be expedient which is repugnant to the Constitution.

But the great importance of this question, and the necessity of considering in some stage of the discussion the comparative merits of the two systems under which the courts have been organized, will be my apology for taking the same course which gentlemen have taken before me, and directing my remarks in the first place to what has been called the expediency of the measure.

The mere expediency of maintaining the system under which the courts were organized by the law of the last session, must depend on a comparative view of the provisions of that law, with the system which the present bill proposes to revive. And here I must be permitted to say, that the provisions and effects of the two systems were, a few days ago, so fully examined, and completely stated by my friend from Delaware, that it is impossible the subject should be at this time misunderstood: indeed, sir, no gentleman can misunderstand it, or resist that conclusion which has been drawn by my friend in favor of the law of the last session.

The defects of the former system under which the courts were organized had been obvious for many years, and during the whole period within which the last law was under consideration, no gentleman attempted to defend it; it was then well understood, and universally admitted, that under the old arrangement, the Judicial power could not accomplish the objects for which it was designed; and the necessity of a change had become too apparent to be denied: the only question which then divided the opinions of those who were disposed to execute with good faith the provisions of the Constitution in relation to the Judicial power, was, whether it was proper to adhere to the principle of the old system, and fill up the outline which had been drawn by adding to the judges of the Supreme Court, or, leaving those judges to their proper jurisdiction, to organize a new circuit court with adequate powers.

The great and prominent defects of the old system, and which have been so fully pointed out upon this occasion, were not only understood but acknowledged. The absurdity of placing the same judges in the court of appeals to decide in the last resort upon judgments rendered by themselves in the courts below, was seen and felt. The effect of associating a district judge with a justice of the Supreme Court upon the circuits, could not escape the most cursory observer; and experience had confirmed the opinion, which has been long entertained, that such an association was unnatural, and whilst it destroyed the dignity of the district judge, necessarily lessened the respectability of the court itself.

The constant changes of judges from one circuit to another was also found to embarrass the business of the courts, and particularly in matters of form and practice: and the immense extent of country through which the judges were obliged to travel on the circuits; the accidents to which they were exposed, and the failure of courts, not only within the recollection of the members of the House, but proved by the laws which had been passed to revive the suits which had been discontinued from these causes, all united to satisfy gentlemen at that time that a new arrangement was indispensable. Indeed, sir, every gentleman, who has been in the least acquainted with our courts, must have seen the great delays and vexations which have arisen to suitors from the causes which have been mentioned; and that in many cases those individuals who were entitled by the Constitution to trials in the national courts, and were desirous of obtaining them, were compelled to seek for justice in the State tribunals.

There is no axiom better understood in this country than that a delay of justice is a denial of it; and whilst the old arrangements existed, although you proffered justice to your citizens and to foreigners who demanded it in your courts, yet in effect, by the embarrassments and delays to which that arrangement exposed them, justice was but a name; it was a mockery, from which they were compelled to run away with disgust.

It is true, that there was a description of persons within the United States, and perhaps within the walls of this House, who were disposed to prostrate in effect the national courts, and transfer to State judiciatures the whole Judicial power. To persons of this description it is obvious that every proposition which was calculated to improve the organization of the Federal courts, would be highly displeasing, because they knew full well that whenever the national courts should be so organized as to offer to suitors speedy and certain justice, the business of those courts would be increased, their influence and their character more highly respected. But the wishes of those gentlemen did not prevail. It was then believed, and the same opinion must always prevail with all well informed men, that a reputable and independent national Judiciary is equally necessary for the preservation of the Government, and the fair execution of the Constitution. The absurdity of relying on State justice for the execution of our penal laws, or the laws which relate to revenue, cannot be overlooked; and in respect to private suits, it is well known that the Constitution has guarantied to citizens of a certain description, the right of trying their causes in the national courts; and you cannot, without a violation of rights, turn over these suitors to a Virginian chancellor, with his three thousand causes on the docket.

We are not yet to learn that the State courts are not the best tribunals for the trial of causes in which the nation or foreigners are concerned. The paper money systems of some States, and the breach of treaties in respect to the collection of debts in others, taught the framers of our Constitution a conclusive lesson on this subject, and they have wisely provided for the establishment of national courts, where these evils may be avoided, and made it our duty to provide for their efficient organization.

Again, it is idle to disguise the opinions which are entertained of State judiciatures by persons who have a right of trial by the Constitution in your national courts. Sir, they have no confidence in some of those judiciatures; and when they look at the delays which have always attended justice in many of them; when they see themselves liable to be thrown into a court of chancery, and compelled from the mass of business alone to wait eight or ten years for a trial, their confidence cannot be increased. To these persons, and to all those who may be charged with offences against the nation, the Constitution has secured the existence of national courts, and it is a gross evasion of the Constitution to leave the organization of these courts materially defective. It cannot, upon this occasion, become a question of any importance whether your courts are more or less expensive than State courts. The people have not left this question in our hands; they have declared by their Constitution that the courts shall exist; they have said that confidence is not, and ought not, to be reposed in State courts for the decision of national causes, or causes of a civil nature, between citizens of different States; they have left nothing upon this subject for us to do, or to decide, but what relates to the form of organizing the national tribunals.

All arguments, therefore, which are calculated to prove either the merits or defects of State judiciatures are irrelevant to the present question. The Constitution having declared that the Judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in inferior courts, and that the jurisdiction of these courts shall extend to a great variety of causes, it only remains to organize them in such a form as to render justice speedy and certain. And this the people have a right to demand at our hands. The parties in civil actions are entitled to tribunals where justice will not slumber for the want of judges to decide. The unfortunate who are accused of crimes, and the people who are interested in public prosecutions, have an equal right to require that the innocent, when accused, shall be speedily tried and acquitted, and that the guilty shall be as speedily condemned. The arguments, then, which relate to the purity of State justice, ought to be laid entirely aside, and gentlemen on both sides of the House ought to admit that the Legislature must provide for such an organization of the courts as will secure the speedy and certain administration of justice; and the question will again return, was the organization of the circuit courts, and which is to be revived by the present bill, adequate to these objects?

After all that has been said, after the experience of ten years, I might safely appeal to gentlemen to decide whether that system was calculated to accomplish these objects? Sir, there is not a gentleman on this floor who can lay his hand on his heart and pronounce so preposterous an opinion. Indeed, some gentlemen have admitted, and particularly a gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. SMITH,) who was up yesterday, that the old system was obviously defective, and ought to be changed, but that gentleman had not the goodness to inform us what changes he would propose to remedy these obvious defects. If gentlemen are really desirous of improving the system, why do they pursue the path of destruction? They admit the defects of the old system; they must admit the advantages of the new one, and yet they hasten forward to destroy that which is good, and to revive that which is bad, without proposing a single improvement to render it tolerable. Sir, this does not look like a disposition to improve our judicial arrangements, it looks more like a determination to prostrate our national courts in the dust, and to elevate the judicatures of States on their ruins.

It has been said in the course of this discussion, that the old arrangement might be improved by adding to the judges of the Supreme Court. This proposition has been repelled whenever it has been urged. It may not, however, be improper at this time to observe, that such an arrangement would be exposed to most of the absurdities and inconveniences which attended the old arrangement itself. The unnatural association of supreme and inferior judges on the same bench would continue the same. The absurdity of a judge sitting in an inferior court and deciding causes on one day, and reversing his own judgments the day following, in a supreme court, is not removed. The shifting of judges from one circuit to another at every term, and the consequent want of identity in the circuit judges, remains as the old system has left it. The certainty of courts may be somewhat increased, but the geographical extent of the country is not diminished, nor can the circuit duty be lessened, provided you send two justices of the Supreme Court into each circuit. And, after all, what will you gain by such an organization? As to economy, which is so much the order of the day at this time, you will not promote it in any essential point; the salaries of your new judges will amount nearly to as much money as the salaries of your present circuit judges, and the expense of holding courts will be precisely the same. That uniformity of decision, which is so necessary throughout the United States, will not be materially promoted by this arrangement; because the provision already made for that object, by writs of error and appeals to the Supreme Court, will preserve that uniformity in every point, which is not a mere matter of form; and, in respect to the forms of business, it is of little importance whether the forms of one or the other part of the country are preserved, provided the principles of decision are the same. There is, however, one object which will be gained by the proposed arrangement. You will gain a great accession of numbers to the Supreme Court, and you will make that tribunal in which the justice of the country is to reside, to resemble a popular assembly, and liable to those party agitations which are so uniformly found in every large assemblage of men.

Some gentlemen, however, have said, that without increasing the number of judges in the Supreme Court you may render the sessions of the circuit court more certain, and identify the judge upon each circuit, by dividing the United States into as many circuits as you have judges of the Supreme Court, and attaching one of the judges of the Supreme Court permanently to each circuit. Sir, of all possible expedients, this, in my opinion, is the worst, for, without removing the most formidable objections to the old system, it absolutely renders the decision of causes impracticable. If the judge of the Supreme Court, and his associate, the district judge, shall differ in opinion upon any cause which comes before them, there can be no decision; and justice becomes more uncertain (if possible) than in the court of a Virginia chancellor.

On the whole, said Mr. G., the gentlemen who advocate the present bill have proposed no substitute for the system which it is calculated to abolish, and whilst they admit the necessity of courts, and the defects of the old system, they cannot in this hasty manner prostrate an useful institution, erected in obedience to the Constitution, on any principle of decency or patriotism. It is certainly true that no exertions have been spared by the Executive power to prove the inutility of the present circuit courts, and the novel expedient has been gone into of sending into the Judicial department for a report of all the causes which have been returned to the national courts, and from these reports, the President has sent to this House the document number eight. Sir, many of the errors which that document contains have been already exposed, and I have not troubled myself to investigate them further, because I have considered the document itself of no importance. I will however observe, that if my information is correct, in relation to returns from the circuit court of Connecticut, and I presume it must be, because it is derived from the clerk of that court, the return on your table is not the return which was sent to the Executive from that circuit. That return included the names of the parties in each action now depending, and if it had been sent to us un mutilated, it would have appeared whether the aggregate of causes had been truly extracted, and it would likewise have appeared who were the defendants in that court, from what class of citizens the President had made the late Executive appointments in that State, and who the persons were, who are now probably afraid of federal justice. But, sir, this document, imperfect and erroneous as it is, still proves (if, indeed, it proves any thing) the necessity of these courts; it proves that much business has been transacted in the national courts, and that much remains to be done. But if the business was much less than it really is, could that consideration afford any conclusive argument against the existence of the courts? This, I believe, is the first time that the utility of courts has been tested by the number of causes depending in them. In a country so commercial as this is, and embarked in so many enterprising pursuits, in which foreigners are concerned as well as our own citizens, it is impossible to prevent the existence of disputes; and if a small number of suits only have been carried into the courts for decision, it proves either that the courts were so badly organized that justice could not be obtained in them, or that justice has been so well administered, that men have been induced to do justice to each other without any appeal to the courts.

But this inquiring into the number of causes depending or tried in the courts, tends more to embarrass the question than to guide the judgment in its decision. It is not important to be informed how much business has been or may be done in the courts; it is sufficient to know that the existence of national courts is not only necessary, but expressly required by the Constitution, and that they must be so organized as to render justice speedy and certain to every man who has the right to apply for it; and whilst it is both provided and admitted that the old arrangement could not secure this object, and that the new one has greatly promoted it, it must necessarily result that a determination to destroy the one and restore the other, can only arise from a spirit hostile to the judicial power of the Union.

I will, however, detain the Committee no longer upon this part of the subject, but call their attention to the great question which has grown out of the present question; I mean the Constitutional right of the Legislature to destroy the judges by repealing the law which regulated the mode of their appointment. And here I ask the liberty of observing, that I feel no terror in approaching this interesting question. Its importance can only animate us in the inquiry, and stimulate our exertions in the defence of truth and the Constitution. Nor am I intimidated by any arguments which have been urged in support of this novel claim of the Legislature, because those arguments, in my judgment, have been as often refuted as they have been urged.

With the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES,) I believe that the power of the Legislature must be ascertained by the words of the Constitution itself. With that gentleman, I think that this instrument is expressed in clear and unequivocal language. And he cannot admire with more ardor than I do the wisdom of the sages who formed it, or the provisions which it contains. Indeed, sir, I admire not only the provisions of the instrument, but the order and arrangement in which it is expressed. And I fully believe, if gentlemen will attend to the order as well as the provisions of it, they will find themselves less embarrassed in the expositions which they must pronounce.

Sir, the framers of the Constitution have kept every object which it contemplates perfectly distinct; they have blended no two subjects together; each point is settled by itself, and never embarrassed by involving the definition of other points or other powers under the same head. This order and symmetry will be apparent, when gentlemen turn to the Constitution. It will be there found that the first article relates exclusively to the Legislative department. The mode of election, the term of service, and the power of the Legislature, are there fully and clearly defined; and it will be found that there is not a section in the article, nor a sentence, which delegates power to any other department, nor can there be found in any other article an expression which conveys an atom of power to the Legislature. The second article, pursuing the same order, treats exclusively of the second department, and does not include a word which does not relate to the Executive power. The third article, with the same precision, is confined to the Judiciary department. The fourth relates to the authority of the States, and the duty and power of the National Government, both as it regards States and public property. The fifth article provides for amending the Constitution. The sixth defines the duty of Government in relation to debts, and the effect of the Constitution and laws made under its authority; and the seventh prescribes the mode of ratification.

To investigate, then, the powers of the Legislature in relation to the Judicial power, I must beg the attention of the Committee in the first place to that part of the first article which relates to this subject. And here it will be found that there is not an expression in this article, or in any part of the Constitution, which delegates to Congress any power on this subject but what is contained in two sentences in the eighth section of this article: The first declares that "Congress shall have power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court;" the second, "to make all laws which shall be necessary for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof." By the first of these provisions Congress are clothed with unlimited power in the erection of inferior courts, both in respect to the number and their jurisdiction; and if this power had not been limited in other parts of the Constitution, it is certain that the jurisdiction of those courts, both in criminal and civil causes, might have been extended to every case which could possibly arise in any State or within the United States. And, if gentlemen please, under this general and unlimited delegation of power to erect courts, Congress might not only create and abolish courts and judges at will, but might limit the tenure of office to a term of years, to be held at the pleasure of the President or any Executive officer of the Government. It is under the authority of this part of the Constitution that the inferior courts have been established, and it is apparent that the power given to the Legislature by these general words is not only broad enough to cover all the ground demanded, but much more; and for myself I shall readily admit that, unless this power has been limited by the subsequent parts of the Constitution, Congress may at this time do what they please with courts and judges. Under the second provision which I have cited, Congress were authorized to pass the law organizing the Supreme Court and establishing the salaries of the judges of all the courts, and to pass all laws which were necessary to give complete efficacy to the Judicial power.

H. OF R.

Judiciary System.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

I will not detain the Committee by examining the particular provisions of the second article, because that relates exclusively to the Executive power, and is not materially connected with this subject, but will pass to the consideration of the third article, and to which I now beg the particular attention of the Committee.

The third article of the Constitution does not delegate any power to the Legislature; its object is to make a disposition of the Judicial power, to limit and to define it; these are the great objects, and the article has provided for them in the following manner: By designating the courts in which the Judicial power shall vest; by securing to the judges a tenure of office commensurate with good behaviour, and a compensation for services which cannot be diminished; by defining the jurisdiction which the courts shall exercise; the mode in which trials shall proceed, and the facts which shall constitute certain crimes.

The courts in which the Judicial power shall vest are designated by the following words: "The Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." It is evident, both from the subject-matter of this article and the expression which I have repeated, that the framers of the Constitution only intended in this place to dispose of the Judicial power; and to authorize the erection of courts by Congress. The words "in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," were never intended to convey a power to Congress to establish such courts, because that power had already been given in the first article of the Constitution, to which I have before directed the attention of the Committee, and no surplusage can be found in the instrument, and because the object of the expression being to vest the Judicial power in certain courts, the subject-matter does not admit of any such construction. The expression then plainly intends nothing more nor less than this: the Judicial power shall vest in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress under authority of the first article of the Constitution shall establish. It is further to be remarked, that the expression presupposes the existence of a Supreme, and of inferior courts, and the article contains no imperative language commanding the organization either of the one or the other. The provisions of the article likewise require as much the existence of inferior as a Supreme Court, because the words which define the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, giving that court an appellate jurisdiction in certain cases, cannot be satisfied without the existence of inferior courts, from whose decisions the appeals may be taken; and the expression itself, declaring that the Judicial power shall vest in a Supreme and inferior courts, necessarily divides to the inferior courts a portion of that power, and renders the existence of such courts necessary for the reception of the power thus delegated.

The inference which I draw from these considerations is, that the Supreme and inferior courts are creatures of the Constitution, and not of the law; their existence having been rendered necessary for the reception of the Judicial power, by clear and unequivocal language; that the judges when appointed, are of course equally creatures of the Constitution, and hold their offices under that instrument in as full a manner as the President himself.

It is true that neither the inferior or the Supreme Court could have been organized, and the judges appointed, without a previous law regulating the mode of performing the operation; and it is equally true, that neither the Representatives on this floor nor the President himself, can at this time be appointed without the aid of a law apportioning the representation in one case, and directing the meeting of Electors in the other. Indeed, sir, at the commencement of the Government it was impossible, and still remains so, to obtain the appointment either of President, Senators, or Representatives, without the aid of State laws; but the man must be wild indeed, who imagines that these officers are not the creatures of the Constitution because their mode of appointment has been regulated by law, and in my judgment the man must be equally deranged who imagines that the courts and the judges are not the creatures of the Constitution because the mode of their organization and appointment has been regulated in the same manner. The truth is, that the Constitution has required with great precision the existence of a President, of Senators, of Representatives, and of judges, and in every case left the mode, and in the cases of Representatives and of judges, the number to be regulated by law. And after your law has passed and the appointments have been made, all these officers hold their offices under the Constitution, and you may as well remove the President, the Senators, or the Representatives, by repealing the law which directed the mode of their elections, as to destroy the judges by repealing the law which regulated their number, the mode of their appointment, or their jurisdiction. Sir, the principle can never be admitted; but the reverse is true, that all these officers, having been once appointed, must remain in office during the term, and under the conditions which the Constitution has prescribed. This then brings me to the second object of the third article, and to inquire by what tenure the judges are to hold their offices, or, in other words, how long is the judge to remain in office, having been once in under the Constitution?

The words of the Constitution are, the "judges both of the Supreme and the inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour." To my mind no language can be more clear and explicit than this is. "The judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour;" indeed it is difficult to explain the expression in terms more certain or explicit than these are. Ask the merest school-boy who runs through your streets, how long is a judge to hold his office, who is to hold it during good behaviour? And he will reply, without hesitation, that he must hold it as long as he behaves well; he must hold it for life, if he does not misbehave during that term.

It is, however, our misfortune, in this rage for innovation, to find that language and those terms which but a few years ago were not only clear and explicit, but well understood, tortured from their obvious meaning; and we are compelled to follow gentlemen through their novel expositions, and endeavor to restore the terms and expressions of our language to their former import.

Gentlemen appear, however, to be aware, that it would at this time be rather too bold to deny the ordinary effect of the "good behaviour," but they contend that there is a latent meaning in those words when applied to the Constitution, which has lately been discovered, and which, as I suppose, cannot be easily discerned by those whose minds have not been illuminated by the new philosophy. And if I understand the purport of this discovery, as explained to us, it is, that although the Constitution absolutely requires "that the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour," yet that nothing is intended by this, but that the judges shall hold their offices against the power of removal in the President; and one gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) has gravely attempted to support this strange exposition, by saying that the term "hold," used in this part of the Constitution, warrants the construction that the term "hold" implies tenure, and tenure implies not only a person holding, but a person or body under whom held; that the expression the judges "shall hold their offices during good behaviour," necessarily and only implies, that they shall hold against the person or authority appointing, so long as they behave well; and as the second article of the Constitution has designated the President to appoint judges, with the advice of the Senate, and to commission them, it follows that the judges do hold their offices under the President, and are only secured by the Constitution against his power of removal so long as they behave well, being still liable to be destroyed by the Legislature in the manner now proposed.

Much credit is undoubtedly due to the gentleman from Virginia for the novelty of his exposition, but I must be permitted to say that the gentleman has fallen into an error in two essential points—he has, in the first place, entirely mistaken the import of the word hold; and, secondly, his construction, if the same had been correct, could not apply to the present question. Sir, the term hold does not imply, in a legal, political, or ordinary sense, a person holding and a person or body under whom held; it implies nothing more nor less than absolute possession; and to hold is to possess, to occupy, to enjoy; and the tenure by which a thing is held, or the condition annexed to it, must be defined by other words. Whatever I hold I possess, and whether it is the gift of a friend, the fruit of my personal exertions, or a loan for a term of years, it is nevertheless absolutely held, possessed, and enjoyed. So in the present case, the judges are to hold their offices during good behaviour, that is to say, they shall absolutely possess, occupy, and enjoy their offices so long as they behave well, against every power of removal. The gentleman's exposition then, having been founded upon the misconstruction of a single term in the Constitution, has altogether failed at the threshold, notwithstanding the promise of that gentleman to illumine our minds by the clearness of his logic.

But if the definitions of the gentleman had been correct, they could not have been applied to the present question. Admit, for the sake of the argument, that the term hold implies all that the gentleman contends for, it does not follow that the President is the person under whom the office is held; on the contrary, it is impossible for the gentleman to establish his assertion, without investing the President of the United States with all the prerogatives of the British monarch. Sir, it is true, that the King of England is the fountain from whence all the honors of that government flow, and of whom all offices are supposed to be held; but I thank God, notwithstanding the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia, that is not the case in this country; the President is not the fountain of honors with us; the offices of government are not held under the President, but of the people, and the President himself is as much the agent of the people as any subordinate agent in the nation, and his acts, when performed within the pale of the Constitution, are the acts of the people, executed by their agent. Admitting, then, that the judges hold their offices under a superior power, and it is certainly true that they do hold under the Constitution, and of the people, although the term hold does not imply it, yet a consequence directly the reverse of that contended for by the gentleman from Virginia, will follow; for, according to that gentleman, the expression, that the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour, being a limitation of the power of removal, in a body under whom the office is held, and these offices being held under the Constitution and of the people, it necessarily results, that the people themselves cannot, either in person or by their agents, remove the judges, so long as they behave well, without a change of the Constitution.

Again, the gentleman from Virginia might as well contend that the judges hold their offices under the Senate or the Legislature itself, as under the President. The Legislature pass the law which regulates the mode of appointment; the Senate concur in the nominations of the President, and in this form all have an agency in the appointment of judges, and the judges hold their offices under the Legislature, the President and the Senate, and, consequently, the restriction upon the power of removal applies as well to the Legislature as to the President.

There is another strange position which has been advocated upon this occasion, and which deserves some attention, because it has been often repeated. It is that, although you cannot remove the judge from the office, you may remove the office from the judge. To this extraordinary assertion I answer, that the words of the Constitution admit of no such construction. The expression being, that the judge shall hold his office during good behaviour, necessarily implies and secures a union of the office and the officer, so long as the officer shall behave well, and a removal of the office from the judge destroys as effectually this union as the removal of the judge from the office could do. Gentlemen admit that the judge cannot be removed from his office, because the Constitution has united the officer and the office together, and declares that the union shall remain inviolate so long as the judge behaves well; and yet, strange to tell, you may destroy this union at a stroke, by destroying the office itself! I request gentlemen to review this assertion, and to inform the Committee what possible difference there can be, in effect, between removing the man from the office and the office from the man. If constructions of this kind can be admitted, there is not a crime which was ever perpetrated by man, which cannot be justified. Sir, upon this principle, although you may not kill, by thrusting a dagger into the breast of your neighbor, yet you may compel your neighbor to kill himself by forcing him upon the dagger; you shall not murder, by destroying the life of a man, but you may confine your enemy in prison, and leave him without food, to starve and to die. These may be good distinctions in the new system of philosophy, but they can never be admitted in the old school. I will not, however, consume the time of the Committee by any further remarks on the extraordinary distinction which has been taken between the power of removing a judge and that of removing an office. If such distinctions can gain credit in this Committee, it is idle to attempt to repel them.

Although it is in my power to discern any difficulty which can arise in the construction of the Constitution upon this subject, yet, as I am bound to imagine that some doubt does exist, because gentlemen declare so, I will now take the liberty of referring gentlemen to a source of information, from whence they may ascertain the precise effect of those words in the Constitution which relate to the tenure of the office of the judge. I mean the construction which was put upon the Constitution by those who framed it, and by the contemporary writers of the day, who treated of this subject whilst the Constitution remained before the State conventions for their adoption. The meaning of the words must, in the nature of things, be at first arbitrary, but it would be madness to admit that the power of changing their meaning remains equally so, after they have been introduced, with a precise meaning, into a written instrument.

Fortunately, for our present purpose, the tenure by which the judges of our national courts were to hold their offices, was an object of too much importance to escape the critical examination of the friends and enemies of the Constitution, and it is a fact no less important than true, that the construction which we contend for, was at that time given by the writers of all parties and of all descriptions, without an exception to the contrary. Sir, the people of this country have been long attached to an independent Judiciary; they draw their attachment not only from the thing itself, but from the principle of the British Government, from whence we have drawn so many of our political opinions, and from the evils actually experienced by many States under their colonial governments for the want of an independent Judiciary. These circumstances will account for the critical attention which was paid to this part of the Constitution in its formation and adoption.

The extent and meaning of the terms during good behaviour, have not only been ascertained by contemporary writers, but antecedent to our Constitution. The statute of England, which has been already alluded to, is one of these authorities, and proves directly the converse of that which has been supposed. That statute declares that the judges of England shall hold their offices during good behaviour, providing, however, that they may be removed by the King upon the joint application of the two Houses of Parliament. Now, sir, no gentleman can be so ignorant as not to know, that the exception of this proviso in this statute proves the rule; it proves that the authority given to judges to hold their offices during good behaviour would have completely placed them beyond the reach of King, Lords, and Commons, so long as they behaved well, and so long as the statute continued, if the proviso had not limited the effect of the general words.

In respect to the contemporary writers, I will first mention the author of the Notes on Virginia, an authority which I presume gentlemen on the other side of the House will respect. The writer of those Notes has published a constitution drawn up by himself for the State of Virginia. This form of a constitution, although never adopted by that State, yet serves to prove what was, in the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, the extent and meaning of the words, "during good behaviour." In that constitution, Mr. Jefferson provides that the judges of the higher grades of courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, but in the inferior courts they shall hold their offices during good behaviour and the existence of the courts. I ask gentlemen why this mode of expression was introduced in relation to the inferior courts? Why, sir, but for the reason which gentlemen must be blind if they do not see; because the tenure of office during good behaviour was so broad and extensive, that the judges once in under that tenure would hold their offices for life if they behaved well, beyond the power of the Executive or Legislature to remove or destroy them; and in order to enable the Legislature to remove the judge, or, if gentlemen please, to remove the office, and limit the general words, it became necessary to provide that the existence of the judge should only be commensurate with the court, thereby giving in effect a power to the Legislature to destroy the judge by abolishing the court in which he was to act.

The periodical papers of the day under the signature of Publius, which it is now well known were written by some of the ablest men of this or any other country, and by those who were members of the General Convention, and were published for the purpose of explaining and recommending the Constitution to the people of the United States before its adoption, contain the same exposition of the tenure of the office of judge, and place the judge equally beyond the power of the Executive and the Legislature.

The decisions and legal opinions of the State judges of Virginia, upon those parts of their constitution which relate to this subject, go to the same point. The same expressions in the State constitutions themselves, and the application of that language to the question, in those States where the Legislature appoint the judges, prove that the limitation of the power of removal applies as well to the Legislature as to any other department.

The debates in all the State Conventions for adopting the Constitution, and particularly in the Convention of Virginia, in which this subject was fully explained, both by the friends and the enemies of the Constitution, can leave no doubt in regard to the construction at that time given to the words which define the tenure of the office of judge.

Indeed, sir, I challenge the gentlemen who are opposed to the construction now contended for, to produce a sentence from any contemporary writer of reputation, which is opposed to the correctness of our construction. Nay, sir, I go further, I challenge the gentlemen to produce a paragraph from a newspaper of that day, which impugns the exposition now supported. And permit me to observe this subject was as interesting at that time as it is now, and was as well understood.

There is moreover a further authority to this point, which ought to be considered as conclusive; it is the authority of the Convention itself. Upon this great question of rendering the judges independent of the other departments, it was thought by some, that they ought not to be made completely so, and a proposition was brought forward in the Convention to authorize the removal of the judges by the President, upon the joint application of the two Houses of Congress, and this proposition was deliberately rejected. Sir, it is impossible a proceeding should more clearly expound the intention of the Convention, than this has done; an intention which cannot be mistaken, of placing the judges beyond the direct or indirect power of the Legislature.

Sir, it is perfectly apparent that the meaning of the expressions of the Constitution which relate to the subject, were fixed and well understood, both by the Convention and those who adopted the Constitution; and I ask gentlemen before they press forward to a decision, to examine whether it is proper? Whether it is competent for us at this time to set at naught the constructions which were then given? Sir, where are we to stop? What security have we, that every feature of the Constitution will not be defaced by some new definition of words and expressions? Our fathers and our brothers who formed and who adopted this Constitution, thought they understood its provisions and its effect; but alas! they were ignorant and blind, and knew not the import of the instrument which they subscribed.

Sir, if Congress can set aside these solemn and settled constructions, there is not a provision in the Constitution too sacred to escape the rapacious hand of the Legislature. A majority may hereafter say, that two really means ten, and the members of this House shall hold their seats for ten instead of two years; or that four means twenty, and that the President shall continue in office for that period of time.

An independent Judiciary is the greatest object which can be obtained by any Government; on this depends the property, the lives, and the liberties of the people. It was the fairest feature which the Constitution presented for our acceptance; strip it of this; let it be the settled construction of the Constitution, by a final decision of these courts who must pronounce on your law, and I will unite with my friend from North Carolina in declaring, that I will not heave a sigh, or drop a tear for its loss forever.

Sir, if your Constitution is to be blown about by every wind; if it is to be curtailed or enlarged, as the caprice or the ambition of every new man shall desire, there is no security to be derived from it. Your experience will only confirm what many sagacious men have predicted, and all wise men have feared, that a Constitution upon paper can never endure; that the ingenuity of man will be continually exerted to pervert its meaning; to make it a nose of wax, to turn it in every direction, as the convenience of the moment or the projects of a faction shall require. Sir, let us not by our conduct verify these predictions; let us not leave behind this melancholy lesson to the world; if we love the Constitution, if we honestly wish to preserve it, we must admit of no new sophisticated expositions; we must not only support it, but we must support it in the constructions given to it at its adoption. Sir, if you transgress these bounds, you are afloat upon an ocean which has no limits; innovate but in one essential point, the constructions then given, and a few short years will prove that the rapacious hand of power will not leave a vestige of the mighty fabric.

The strong inducements which presented themselves to the Convention to render the Judicial power independent of the Legislature, furnish a further argument in favor of our construction; for although I admit that this argument cannot be conclusive, because it is not so much the inquiry what the Constitution ought to be, as what it really is, yet if any doubt in fact hangs over the language, it is fair to ascertain the meaning by recurring to what must have been the wish and intention of those who formed the instrument.

The power given to the courts to pronounce on the constitutionality of laws would be entirely defeated, in those times when the exercise of that power becomes most necessary, if the judges are not placed beyond the power of the Legislature. The idea of giving this power to the courts, and at the same time of leaving the courts at the mercy of that department over which the power is to be exercised, is rather too absurd for gentlemen, even in these days of extravagance; and gentlemen, aware of this, have had the confidence to deny that this power resides in the courts. Sir, upon this point, it is not necessary to say, that these declarations are opposed to all former opinions and decisions. It is well known to every member of this Committee, that the right of the courts to decide on the constitutionality of your laws, has been recognised in your laws themselves; has been exercised by the courts; your laws have been pronounced unconstitutional and void, and that decision has not only been acquiesced in by the Legislature, but the act itself has been removed from your code of statutes. Nor is this principle peculiar to your national Government; it exists, and is exercised under every State Government, where the powers of the Legislature have been limited by a written Constitution. The principle not only exists, and results from the nature of this Government, but is provided for by the terms of the Constitution itself. The words declare that the Constitution shall be the supreme law, and the judges are not only bound to respect it as such, but have sworn to support it, and they would be guilty of perjury if they should knowingly decide for the execution of an act which the Constitution did not warrant. Nor can any embarrassment result from the execution of this principle; the judges must pronounce upon your laws generally; they find two statutes in your law book which are repugnant to each other; they must decide which of the statutes shall bind: they find the law of the Constitution and the law of the Legislature clashing with each other; they know the first is paramount, and limits as well the power of the Legislature as the power of the court, and they must decide either that the law of the Constitution or the law of the Legislature is void. In such a case there is nothing left to discretion, the Constitution is peremptory and commands the obedience of every department.

If this power of checking the unconstitutional acts of the Legislature is necessary, where can it reside with so much propriety as in your courts? This department, from its nature, must be filled with men of learning, wisdom, and moderation. It possesses none of the prerogatives which can be dangerous to public liberty. It commands neither the wealth nor the force of the nation; its province is to pronounce upon the law; to declare what is right and what is wrong. And that this power ought to reside somewhere, cannot be doubted by any man who sincerely wishes to perpetuate our form of Government.

Sir, if there is no power to check the usurpations of the Legislature, the inevitable consequence must be that the Congress of the United States becomes truly omnipotent. All power must be concentrated here, before which every department and all State authorities must fall prostrate. Admit this principle, and nothing can resist the attacks of your national laws upon our State sovereignties. Here is an end of your Federal Government. A consolidation of the States is the immediate effect, and in a few short years these sovereignties will not even obtain the name.

But a further effect will result from this principle, which, in my opinion, is still worse than that which I have described. All the authority which unlimited power can exercise, must not only be concentrated in the Legislature, but must ultimately fall into this House, where numbers and predominating influence must swallow up the other departments, and in this mode there must be erected a despotism as terrible as it is powerful. It is the despotism of one hundred and six men, clothed with unlimited power, and liable, from its organization, to all the passions and all that fluctuation which can ever agitate a popular assembly. From such a despotism I pray God to deliver this country, and entreat gentlemen to stop in that mad career which leads inevitably to this result.

I have now gone through with the general remarks which I deemed proper to submit to the Committee upon this subject, and might perhaps with propriety dispense with all further observations; but some of the arguments which have been urged in support of this measure, have not been particularly noticed; and, upon an occasion so interesting as this, I shall be excused for calling the attention of the Committee to those which now occur to my recollection.

Before I enter however into a particular consideration of the arguments of gentlemen, I take the liberty of saying that gentlemen in this House, whatever may have been done in another place, have placed this question in one respect upon its true ground; they have made no distinction between the authority of the Legislature over the judges of the supreme and the inferior courts. All their arguments have gone to prove that no such distinction can exist. Indeed, sir, it is impossible to perceive the shadow of a difference. The judges both of the supreme and the inferior courts are equally creatures of the Constitution, and the mode of appointment in both cases has been regulated by law, and if you can destroy the judges of the inferior courts by repealing the law which limited their number, and directed the mode of appointment, you may destroy the judges of the Supreme Court by repealing the law which limited the number and organized that court. I wish it then to be as perfectly understood in every part of this country, as it is in this House, that the principle contended for by the supporters of the bill goes equally to the destruction of the judges of the supreme as of the inferior courts.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

One argument, which has been urged in support of this bill, has been that the law of the last session, which it contemplates to repeal, was in itself unconstitutional, and for that reason ought to be repealed and removed out of the way; and a gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. DAVIS) has referred us to the second section of that act, as proof of this assertion, and appears to imagine that the authority given to the Supreme Court to issue certain writs cannot be warranted by the Constitution. Sir, without entering into an examination of the Constitutional authority of the Supreme Courts, to issue the writs which have been enumerated, I take the liberty of referring the gentleman from Kentucky, to the last part of the section of which he complains; he will there find that the power of the courts to issue the writs is confined to cases where it becomes necessary to issue them for the exercise of its jurisdiction, and that they shall be only issued agreeably to the principles and usages of law; and I believe that the gentleman from Kentucky himself will scarcely assert that an authority to issue writs under such limitations, is not warranted by the Constitution.

Gentlemen have also referred us to those parts of the law of last session which abolish the old circuit courts, and the district courts of Kentucky and Tennessee, and appear to imagine that, by abolishing these courts, the judges who were authorized to hold them were destroyed. Sir, those gentlemen who have called our attention to this point, appear to have fallen into a mistake, which has been very common with gentlemen of a certain description; they have pursued a theory and overlooked the fact. What judges were destroyed by abolishing the old circuit courts, and the district courts of Kentucky and Tennessee? I inquire for the fact. Sir, gentlemen will find that no judge was destroyed by the putting down of these courts. By whom were the old circuits held? If gentlemen do not know, I will inform them, that those courts were held by a judge of the Supreme Court, and by a district judge, and gentlemen cannot be so ignorant as not to know that the judges of the Supreme Court and the district judge remain in office, notwithstanding their services in the circuit court have been dispensed with. Besides, those judges were never appointed or commissioned to be judges of a circuit court; they hold but one commission, and that commission in the first case, is as judge of the Supreme Court, and in the second, as district judges; and the old law, in assigning to these judges their duties, required that they should at stated times associate together, and hold a court, which was denominated a circuit court, and no man ever doubted the power of the Legislature to enlarge or diminish the jurisdiction of a judge, so far as it could be done without invading his independence. The fact, then, in respect to the old circuit courts, is opposed to the theory. No judge has been destroyed by the act of the last session, and in respect to the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee, the fact is precisely the same, for although the courts which these judges were authorized to hold under the old law, were dispensed with by the new law, yet the judges remain as they always were, judges of the United States, under the name of district judges, and the jurisdiction which they formerly exercised in most respects is to be performed by associating with the circuit judge of the sixth circuit, and holding courts to be denominated circuit courts for that purpose.

The difficulty into which gentlemen have fallen, appears to arise from confounding the terms court and judge together; they appear to suppose that these terms are synonymous, whereas no two terms can be more distinct in their significations. A court is not a judge, nor is a judge a court. A judge is a public officer clothed with judicial powers. A court is a place where justice is administered, or an assemblage of judicial officers, organized for the exercise of judicial powers. The term court has a variety of significations, but never can be construed to mean a judge; a judge may be authorized to hold a particular court, but it would be absurd to say, that because his authority to hold that court was taken away, that the judge himself no longer existed. Sir, if gentlemen did not perplex themselves with unfounded theories, there would be no difficulty in this part of the subject. It is admitted by all parties that the jurisdiction of judges may be varied as often and to any extent which the Legislatures deem expedient, provided, in doing this, you preserve inviolable the independence of the judge. The Legislatures may dispense with the attendance of judges in old courts, and require their attendance in new courts, at will. This, and this alone, has been done in the case under consideration, and the existence of no judge has been affected. It may be further remarked, that our judges are in a strict sense judges of the United States, and the names which may be given to them, whether taken from the courts in which they are to act, or the country in which they reside, has no connexion with their judicial powers; and being judges, by whatever name they are called, their jurisdiction may be varied; the places for holding the courts may be changed and their associates varied, as the necessities of the country shall, in the opinion of the Legislature, require; keeping, however, always in view the substantial independence of the judge. It was on these principles that the authorities of the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee were extended. Those judges were originally confined to their respective districts, but the law of the last session required their attendance in the adjoining districts, where they were to associate with the circuit judge, and exercise the jurisdiction which had been given by law; and to compensate them for those additional services, the same law provided an increase of salary.

A further argument has been urged in favor of this claim to destroy our judges, which is founded on the following general assertion, that the power to create necessarily includes a right to destroy.

In answer to this assertion, I take the liberty of saying, that it is neither true in fact, nor can it be applicable, if true, to the present question. A power to create does not include a right to destroy. This may be proved by stating a great variety of cases, but I will confine myself to the Constitution, and select one or two provisions, about which there can be no dispute. The Legislature have power to fix the compensation of the President, but they cannot vary it during the term of the incumbent. The Legislature have power to fix the salaries of the judges, but they cannot diminish those salaries whilst the judges remain in office. The truth, then, is, that the right to destroy does not depend on the power of creating. In many cases the right to destroy must depend on the immutable principles of morality. In civil transactions it will often depend upon the stipulations of a contract, and in the business of legislation it will depend entirely on the nature and limitations of your Government. So that the inquiry will still return, does the nature and limitation of our Government give to the Legislature a right to destroy the judges?

Nor could the assertion apply to the present question, if it had been true, because the judges were not created by the Legislature, but by the Constitution—the mode of appointments, &c., having been only left to the Legislative department.

One further general assertion has been made, from whence gentlemen have thought proper to derive arguments in support of their claims. It is, “that ours is a Government of responsibility, and that the departments are responsible to each other.” This assertion is undoubtedly true, but the logic must be novel indeed, which can force this principle to bend to the purposes designed. The theory of our Government certainly embraces the principle of responsibility, but it is precisely that responsibility which is delineated in the Constitution. The members of each House of Congress are responsible to their respective bodies, and may be expelled whenever two-thirds of the members of that House to which the individual belongs shall think proper to exercise the power of expulsion. The Legislature itself is responsible to the Judiciary department for the constitutionality of its acts, and those acts, as has been already shown, may be declared void, if they are not warranted by the Constitution, and the members of the Legislature are responsible to the people upon the returns of every new election. The President himself is responsible upon an impeachment before the Senate, and upon a conviction by the sentence of two-thirds of that body, he may be removed from office, and he is again responsible to the electors at the end of four years. The judges also are responsible upon impeachment, and may in the same manner be removed from office, whenever they shall be found guilty of misdemeanors, by two-thirds of the Senate. When we speak, then, of the independence of our judges, we intend only that Constitutional independence which places them above the power of any department to remove them, except upon impeachment.

Under this general scheme of responsibility, one gentleman has gone so far as to say, that the judges are responsible to the Legislature under the power given to appropriate money for the payment of their salaries, and if we do not like the judges or think the salaries too high, we may refuse the necessary appropriations. Sir, I will not insult the understandings of the Committee by answering this argument; and I only mention it at this time to express my astonishment, that a principle only calculated to “stop the wheels of Government,” should at this time be renewed on the floor. If gentlemen are really determined in this form to arrogate all power to this House, it will be more manly to assume it openly and without disguise. Still, however, pursuing this plan of responsibility, a gentleman from Kentucky has told us that the judges are responsible to the people upon every new election, and whenever it shall appear by the result of the elections, that the people are opposed to the political opinions of the judges, they are, as I suppose, to be tumbled from their places, and the seats of justice are to be filled with men whose minds will bend more easily to the will of the prevailing faction. On what page of the Constitution the gentleman from Kentucky has found this alarming principle, it is impossible for me to say. I can, therefore, only declare that, in my judgment, it is subversive of every provision in that instrument, and must convert the courts into revolutionary tribunals, and render them the mere agents of a prevailing faction to execute vengeance on their political opponents.

A further argument has been urged to prove the dependence of judges on the Executive power, and that the limitation in the Constitution upon the power of removal, applies only to the President, drawn from a principle which exists in all monarchical governments; that principle is, that the Judicial authority is only an emanation from the Executive power, and a branch of it. Sir, gentlemen who have repeated this principle appear to be insensible that it has no application to the form of government in this country. In unlimited monarchies, it is true, the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judicial powers, are all united in the same person. The monarch makes the law, decides upon it, and carries it into execution. This constitutes the essence of despotism. In limited monarchies, such as that of England, the Legislative power is at this time in reality separated from the Executive; and, although the Judicial power remains still nominally united to the Executive, and was so in fact before the Revolution, yet, in effect, the act of Parliament, which renders the judges independent, has separated this department from the Executive power; and, in this country, pursuing the great object of rendering the three departments of government independent of each other, we have, as well in our National as State constitutions, provided that these departments should not depend upon or be subordinate the one to the other. The theory of our Government supposes that the department which enacts the law should neither expound it or carry it into execution; that the department whose province it is to expound the law, should not be entrusted with its execution. By assigning to each department in this form its distinct duties, and establishing the independence of each, in the exercise of its appropriate functions, we have attained, if the principle is preserved, more security against the power of oppression, than any nation ever enjoyed. The Legislature may pass unconstitutional laws, depriving the people of rights which the Constitution has guaranteed; but these laws can never be executed so long as an enlightened and independent court remains to expound them.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

The ambition of an unprincipled First Magistrate may desire the ruin of individuals who are opposed to his ambitious projects; but the vengeance of Executive power can never reach the man of virtue, so long as he is protected by the courts of his country. Gentlemen, then, who attempt to engraft upon our Constitution the theory of monarchies, ought to learn that they do not apply to our form of government, and that the expression of the Constitution which was designed to give independence to the judges, could not have been designed to guard the judges against the Executive more than the Legislative power. Its object was to render the Judicial a distinct department, and to leave the judges, without the fear of removal, to exercise their legal and Constitutional powers.

Gentlemen have likewise said, that our theory destroys itself; that, whilst we are supporting the independence of the judges, we admit that they are exposed to an impeachment by one branch of the Legislature before the other, on which they may be found guilty of misdemeanors, and expelled from office; and that the fear of impeachment will operate more strongly upon the passions, render them more submissive to the Legislative will, and more effectually destroy their independence, than the power of removal claimed under the present bill. To this consideration, I answer, that a judge can only be removed upon impeachment, by the concurring voices of two-thirds of the members of the Senate; and if the period ever should arrive when a majority of the House of Representatives should become sufficiently corrupt to go into the Senate with an impeachment against a virtuous judge, and two-thirds of that body should be found base enough to support it, it will then be of little importance what becomes of your courts or your judges. The form of Government which we have established can never survive the corruption of that day; and when depravity shall have gained so strong a foothold in the Legislative department, the whole political body must be contaminated; and, instead of being the citizens of a free Government, we shall be fit only to be the slaves of a master. Sir, the Constitution, by requiring that a majority of the House of Representatives and two-thirds of the Senate shall concur in an impeachment and conviction, has secured to the judge his independence in ordinary and in violent times; but it was impossible to secure him against the convulsions of a revolution, or the more certain effects of total degeneracy and corruption.

Again, it is said that the power of the Legislature to vary the jurisdiction of the judges, and to create new courts, may be used to destroy their independence, and whilst we admit the existence of that power, we may as well admit all that the bill claims. Sir, I have two answers to give to the argument. The argument itself is drawn from a supposed abuse of power, which can never be admitted in any deliberative body, because it goes to the destruction of all power, for all power may be abused, and therefore no power ought to exist. But a consideration perhaps more conclusive is, that an abuse of power in the case stated can never take place unless attended with circumstances so violent as to appal the intrepidity of any Legislature. And again, the evil will, in some measure, correct itself. For, if you diminish the jurisdiction of your old judges, and confer their important powers on new judges, who may be taken from the prevailing sect, the consequence will ordinarily be, that your new judges, having obtained the object of their ambition, being removed by their independence beyond the power of their own party to remove them, will find it for their own interest to administer justice according to their best discretion, so that the principle of independence which we contend for, will, in its operation, correct that abuse of power, which might otherwise prove so destructive.

I have now, Mr. Chairman, noticed all the arguments which occur to me, and which have been urged in support of the present bill, and I hope shall be pardoned, if, upon this all-important occasion, I again turn back to the emphatic words of the Constitution, on which we principally rely. "The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour." If words so explicit in their meaning, if an expression so well understood by every capacity, can be construed away, by the metaphysics of the day, with much more ease may we ourselves, or our successors, remove, by construction, every barrier which limits the power of the Legislature. It is declared in the Constitution, that the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808. If this spirit of construction is admitted, how easy will it be for gentlemen to say migration or importation does not mean introduction; and that Congress may prevent the introduction, although they could not prohibit the migration or importation, and in this mode the security of the States will be entirely destroyed. Acts of attainder may not be passed; but gentlemen may hereafter say, that an act to confiscate the property of an individual, and to banish him to a foreign country, under pain of death, if he return, is no act of attainder, and within the powers of Congress. A capitation tax can only be laid by an apportionment among the States; but it may be said that a tax upon all persons able to carry arms, is no capitation tax within the meaning of the Constitution, and may be laid without an apportionment. No money shall be drawn from the Treasury without an appropriation by law; but your President may hereafter say, that this does not extend to money in the hands of collectors. In fine, there is not a prohibitory clause within the Constitution which may not be evaded, if this spirit of construction is tolerated.

Sir, do gentlemen see the extent to which they are going? Do they see in this bill a principle which goes to prostrate all State authority; which goes to demolish every department, except that of the Legislature, and to concentrate all power within these walls? Gentlemen must pardon me when I entreat them not to abandon the plain meaning of terms; if we suffer ourselves to be seduced into this wide field of conjecture and construction, your Constitution will retain no more certainty than the wind; its value will become less than the paper on which it is written.

I should now close the observations which I had to submit to the Committee upon this interesting question, had not the gentlemen on the other side of the House thought proper to involve in this debate a discussion of several topics, not necessarily connected with the subject. These topics have been urged, undoubtedly, with a view to influence the decision of this question, and, although I cannot see their application, yet I am not disposed to set up my discernment as the standard of infallibility, and shall therefore now pay due respect to the path which those gentlemen have marked out.

The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) as an apology for the extensive range which he has taken upon this occasion, has informed us that one act of the last session was but a single link in one great chain of the political measures, and for the purpose of understanding this particular measure, it became necessary to review the whole chain of political events.

The gentleman begins his remarks, by saying that two parties have existed in this country from the commencement of the present Government; the one, what the gentleman has been pleased to denominate a party of energy, and the other a party of responsibility; the first, disposed to go forward with the affairs of the Government with energy, as they deemed right and expedient, and the other only in submission to the public will. Sir, it can be no news to the members of this Committee that two parties exist in this country, nor can gentlemen be ignorant that two parties did exist in the nation at the adoption of the Constitution; the one consisting of its friends, and the other composed of its enemies; nor is it necessary for me to say how the present have grown out of these original parties. It is sufficient for my present purpose to say that the parties alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia, are characterized by prominent features, and cannot easily be mistaken. Some of these features I will describe, and leave to the decision of the Committee which party really deserves best of the community. One great feature which has characterized those whom the gentleman has been pleased to denominate the party of energy, has been their strong attachment to the present Constitution; and a determination not only to leave each department to the exercise of its proper functions, but to support them in it. Their opponents, to say nothing of their attachment to the Constitution, have on the contrary been disposed to bring all the powers of the Government into the House of Representatives, and in that way to strip the other branches of their Constitutional authorities. This was attempted some years ago in a very interesting question, which related to the British Treaty. For although the Constitution had expressly delegated the treaty-making power to the President and Senate, yet the gentleman from Virginia and his friends were determined to grasp it for the House of Representatives. Pursuing the same spirit of hostility to the other departments, the gentleman and his friends are at this time attempting to make an inroad in the Judicial department, and to bring in effect the powers of that department into this House.

Again, this party of energy was disposed to establish and support public credit, in which their opponents did not agree. This party of energy was likewise determined to defend their country against the hostile attacks of the enemy, and to support the interest, the safety, and honor of the nation; their opponents, on the contrary, were disposed to prostrate everything that was dear, to the will of the enemy. One party was disposed to build up and support, while the other were, and still are, determined to pull down and destroy. The spirit with which this determination is pursued will appear, from the allusions which have been made to the most prominent measures of the former Administration.

The public debt has been spoken of, and it has been charged as a crime that these solemn engagements, which were the price of our independence, and for the discharge of which the national faith was pledged, have been provided for by the old Administration. Sir, are we to understand that this crime is to be ultimately atoned, by wiping out the debt with a sponge? Surely the gentleman cannot intend this, and yet I can give no other solution to the remark.

The Indian war has also been alluded to in very extraordinary language, as an event which was greedily seized to enlarge the field of Executive patronage. Sir, the gentleman cannot intend to insinuate that the Indian war was excited by the Administration; the causes which produced that war are too publicly known to be forgotten or misunderstood. And has it indeed, at this time, become criminal for the Government to defend the inhabitants of our frontier from the attacks of the savages?

The gentleman has likewise told us that the depredations upon our commerce by the Barbary Powers, and by the French cruisers, was made a pretext for commencing a Naval Establishment, and in this way of extending this bugbear of Executive patronage. Sir, this remark gives me no surprise. I know perfectly well, that there is a party in this country who are opposed to our commerce and to our navy. I shall long recollect the depredations which were made upon our commerce by the French, and the difficulty with which gentlemen were persuaded to repel those depredations. I cannot forget that before they would consent to our first measure of defence, that the cruisers of France were capturing your ships within the Delaware bay. It is certainly true that the old Administration was neither the enemy of commerce, nor of the navy; and it is as certainly true that they were equally disposed to defend your citizens against Algerine slavery, and the depredations of France. And to merchants and seamen of this country, and the community at large, I am willing to refer the question, whether it was proper to surrender our commerce to the enemy, and give up our seamen to slavery, or defend both by an adequate Naval Establishment?

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

Gentlemen have complained of the haste with which the last Judiciary act was passed; but when gentlemen indulge themselves in these suggestions, they ought to examine whether the fact of which they complain has really existed. They ought to recollect that the journals of this House will decide this point, and that by these journals it will appear that this very law, in its principles, was under the consideration of Congress for two sessions; that the subject had for years been contemplated by the members of the Legislature, and that no act of the Government (unless we except the act of bankruptcy) was ever passed with more deliberation.

There was, however, one circumstance attending the passage of this law which in the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) cannot be excused: the law received the signature of the President whilst the House of Representatives were engaged in the late Presidential election. The gentleman has indulged himself, by saying that this obnoxious law was approved by the President whilst the House of Representatives were engaged in the election of a Chief Magistrate, and, influenced by the violence of party, were attempting to defeat the public will. Sir, what does the gentleman from Virginia intend by these declarations? Are we to understand that the determination is now avowed on this floor, which we have heard so often repeated beyond the walls of this House, that no man but a Virginian is hereafter to become a President of the United States? And are we indeed reduced to this, that the members of this House, when exercising the sacred right of suffrage, on one of the most important occasions which can ever arise, are to be charged with attempts to defeat the public will, because they would not consent to violate their consciences, in voting for a particular candidate merely because he lived on the other side of the Potomac? Sir, this language may perhaps accord with the sentiments of this meridian, but give me leave to tell the gentleman from Virginia, that it will not be relished by one part of the United States, and give me leave further to say that there are States in this Union, who will never consent, and are not doomed to become the humble provinces of Virginia.

Sir, I consider the question we are now about to decide, as more important than any which ever occupied the attention of the National Legislature. The Constitution has guarantied to the people of this country an independent Judiciary, but the moment the bill on your table becomes a law, that independence is gone, and your courts become the passive agents of the Legislature to execute its commands. And whatever may be said on this subject, it is impossible to prevent the members of this Committee and the people of the United States, from tracing this destructive measure back to the fountain from whence it has proceeded. Who recommended a revision of the act of the last session? Who sent us the document on which gentlemen have predicated so many of their arguments? Who, sir, but the President of the United States? on whose head must fall the whole weight of responsibility for this invasion of the Constitution.

Before I sit down, permit me once more to appeal to the intelligence, and to the patriotism of the members of this Committee. Permit me to say that there is no middle ground between a government of laws and a government of men; that the former can only be supported by an independent Judiciary, and if by the passage of this bill you destroy this only barrier, the people of the country are left at the mercy of a host of despots, whose will is law, and whose enmity is death.

Mr. MILLEDGE said, he hoped the Committee would spare him a few moments of their time, that he had no intention of saying a word on the important question before them, and meant to have contented himself by giving a silent vote; but as some remarks had fallen from the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. RUTLEDGE,) in the course of his argument delivered yesterday, respecting the removal of a postmaster in the State he had the honor to represent, that for the present he would pass any explanation by on that subject, and, as he was drawn on the floor, he conceived himself bound to make some few observations on the bill now under consideration, that his constituents might know what guided him in his vote; that it was useless on any other score; that the subject was exhausted; nor had he the vanity to suppose that anything that should drop from him would influence a single member; that from the doctrine held by gentlemen who differed from him on political points, he was one of those on that account who solemnly believed that the passage of that bill, as handed by the Senate, fixed a principle as to the Judiciary, on which, in his opinion, depended the liberty, property, and happiness of his country. He stated that, though true, it was imperative on the first Congress to establish a national Judiciary, it certainly was also true that all their plans were speculative. He said, let it be supposed for a moment that, in forming that system, they had made sixteen circuits and assigned duties to sixteen judges; that instead of two courts of appeal within the year, they had made four; that when this theoretical system had become tested by experience, it was found that the interest of the nation in that department could be as well and better conducted by having only six circuits and six judges, and by two courts of appeal instead of four. Would not Congress have the right to modify the law to meet the general welfare in that respect? It is not denied nor brought into question but that they have the power of extending the courts; then surely they have the same right to abridge. But it is said that the judges, when once appointed, hold their office during life, from the tenure of their commission being during good behaviour, and receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office; and, independent of the power that gave them existence, except by impeachment. He said, he admitted that it was true, to a certain extent, they were independent of the Executive, because his whim and caprice could never affect them; they were independent of the Legislature for they could not constitutionally pass a law to remove an individual judge or judges from office; that the Legislative power was confined to the system of jurisprudence by which the general welfare of the nation was to be consulted either to extend or abridge; that in case of abridging, and courts were abolished, the duties are taken from the judges, therefore they cannot receive compensation, for they have no service to perform; they are not independent of the law, but depending for their existence as judges on the law: when the law goes down, they tumble with it; that on the subject of the rightful and necessary independence of the judges, that so much had been said about, that it had been long his opinion that our late great and virtuous President, WASHINGTON, had surely been ill-advised when he took from the bench of judges the Chief Justice, Jay, and sent him not on a Judicial but a diplomatic errand, when it was afterwards followed up by the late Administration in sending a similar high character, on a similar errand; then it was, and not till then, that the independence of the judges became prostrated not by Legislative power, but to the Executive authority under the influence of its patronage. Mr. M. said that, on the subject of expediency, he was one of those who always thought it was the interest of the nation to lessen, by every means in its power the foreign connexions; that we are at peace with all the world except the Barbary Power, Tripoli, whose trade is war—and peace in Europe; that it was fair to presume, for those reasons, that few cases would come before the national courts, on what is called the law of nations, and that the Constitution gives a right to foreigners as well as citizens of a different State to sue in the Federal courts: that the animosities and prejudices that grew out of the war for our independence would daily abate; that the right of action in these courts should by degrees be narrowed, from a persuasion that the State courts administered justice as ample and as speedily as the national courts; that as to foreigners and citizens of different States not being able to obtain complete justice in the State courts, that argument could now have no possible weight; that, on the contrary, it always appeared to him that strangers from whatever quarter they might come, if they brought with them a good character, always met with a partial leaning of the citizens in their favor; he therefore thought that the old system, with a few amendments, was commensurate to all the objects of national jurisprudence. Mr. M. said, that he had discovered that gentlemen, throughout the discussion of this important question, had read considerably from newspapers and other writings, he hoped he might be indulged in turn; that he had been favored with extracts from two letters, sent to an honorable member of the Senate from no less characters than Governor McKean and the celebrated John Dickinson, the Pennsylvania farmer. Governor McKean's letter says:

"The vote of the Senate of the United States on the question for repealing the late Judiciary law accords with my sentiments, as it seems to have been contrived and executed rather to serve the interest of a few zealous partisans than the people at large. That a Legislature have the power at a subsequent session to repeal any act passed before, cannot admit of much doubt in a reflecting mind; the same power that creates can assuredly annihilate, where there is no Constitutional impediment; an office may be abolished when it shall be deemed mischievous or unnecessary, though the officer may not otherwise be removable, but after the conviction of some misdemeanor, and when there is no existing office, there cannot be any officer to execute it, both are nonentities."

Mr. Dickinson writes thus:

"It seems to me that there should be the clearest and strongest provisions made against any ingraftment of any elements or powers from principles of common law upon the specified, limited, delegated, defined authorities, confided by the several States to the Union; how has the understanding of united America been insulted by sophistical argumentations drawn from this source, and from the paragraph of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution to reconcile us to boundless powers in the Federal Government, (a danger against which the framers of that Constitution strove with the utmost anxiety to guard such assumptions,) which would turn judges into legislators, and trustees into usurpers. I had rather that the whole Judiciary system of the Union should be abolished than that it should exist with those dangerous pretensions, threatening perdition to our best securities against future oppressions; they will entangle us in endless labyrinths of confusion. Is it not very extraordinary that, under our Constitution, judges should declare the nation to be in a state of war, when the Legislature is silent on that momentous point?"

Such, Mr. Chairman, are the sentiments of those two venerable patriots, statesmen, and lawyers; our country can claim none higher in the possession of those qualities. What more, then, can be said on the subject? It forecloses all argument. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RUTLEDGE) had said that, in looking over a newspaper that he had before him, it appeared that even a postmaster in Georgia had been turned out of office because he was a printer, yet the person denies his being a printer. Mr. M. observed that, so far as respected himself being brought into question by the publication alluded to, he felt no hesitation to declare the part he had taken on that occasion. He said he had mentioned that the editorial part of the paper, called the Augusta Herald, was supposed to come from the pen of

H. OF R.

Mr. Hobby; that he was not the mechanical operator; that the press was generally considered to be under his control, and that that paper teemed with invective against the principal officers of the present Administration. Mr. M. further observed that, as the gentleman (Mr. R.) had passed into the State he had the honor to represent in search of matter for his argument, he begged he might be permitted, in turn, to view him a little within his own limits; he had informed the Committee that the vote he had given for President, which was a blank, he had the gratification to think was not only conformable to his own feelings, but he believed to those of the people of South Carolina. Mr. M. said, he hoped he did not misquote the gentleman. That the Committee had been favored with much newspaper information; he also sometimes read newspapers, and in one he had seen an account of the decided disapprobation of some of his fellow-citizens in South Carolina for his blank vote. He would ask that gentleman whether his country had not on a former occasion called on him within his State to exercise a similar duty, and whether he then put in a blank, or whether he voted for "a man of the people, a demagogue;" a man of plain and simple attire without a "Mister before his name—An Oliver Cromwell?" If he did, he left to the gentleman's own reflections the propriety of what fell from his lips yesterday.

FRIDAY, February 26.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Indiana Territory of the United States, enclosing certain resolutions of the grand jury of the county of Knox, in the said Territory, at a term of the court of general quarter sessions of the peace, held for the said county, in the present month, asserting the rightful claim of the Territory aforesaid to the island of Michilimackinac, and its dependencies, as an integral part of the said Territory, in opposition to the claims of the Government of the Northwestern Territory to the same; which were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. DENNIS, and Mr. DICKSON; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

No occasion having arisen, since the last account rendered by my predecessor, of making use of any part of the moneys heretofore granted to defray the contingent charges of the Government, I now transmit to Congress an official statement thereof, to the thirty-first day of December last, when the whole unexpended balance, amounting to twenty thousand nine hundred and eleven dollars and eighty cents, was carried to the credit of the surplus fund, as provided for by law; and this account consequently becomes finally closed.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 25, 1802.

The said Message was read, and, together with the official statement referred to therein, ordered to lie on the table.

Another Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

Some statements have been lately received of the causes decided or depending in the courts of the Union, in certain States, supplementary, or corrective, of those from which was formed the general statement accompanying my Message at the opening of the session. I therefore communicate them to Congress, with a report of the Secretary of State, noting their effect on the former statement, and correcting certain errors in it, which arose partly from inexactitude in some of the returns, and partly in analyzing, adding, and transcribing them, while hurried in preparing the other voluminous papers accompanying that Message.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 26, 1802,

The said Message, and the documents accompanying it, were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom was committed, on the fourth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House then went into Committee on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. NICHOLSON.—I lament, Mr. Chairman, that I am under the necessity of rising at this late hour. As I am fearful the patience of the Committee is well nigh exhausted. I am sensible that the uncommon length of the discussion has left me but a very narrow ground to tread on; but as the question has become highly important, from the Constitutional objections which have been started, I will venture to solicit your indulgence while I offer some remarks that appear to my mind applicable to the subject now under consideration.

The very uncommon direction which has been given to the debate, will, I trust, be a sufficient apology for my noticing a variety of observations made by gentlemen on the other side of the House, which have no connexion with the bill on the table. I should have felt a singular pleasure in following the honorable member from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) but for his concluding remarks. In the anterior part of his speech, that gentleman kept his eye steadily fixed either upon the expediency or constitutionality of the question, and did not indulge himself in those wanderings of the imagination, which so eminently distinguished his friends who have preceded him; but the close was marked with a shameful virulence, calculated to excite indignation and not to convince the understanding.

Sir, when I am told that the party advocating this repeal have grown out of the party originally opposed to the Constitution, and are now about to prostrate it, I feel more than I am willing to express; but when gentlemen talk about parties in this country, permit me to turn their attention to an earlier period of our political history; to that period when our liberties and independence were at stake, and when every nerve was strong to resist the encroachments of tyranny. At this time where were many of that gentleman's political friends? Upon examination it will be found, that many of them basely deserted their country in her distress, and were openly fighting in the ranks of her enemies. In the list of my political friends, none such are to be found, for we do not require their support. But I can look about me, upon my right hand and upon my left, and can see men, even upon this floor, advocating the present bill, who bore the burden of the Revolutionary war, who drew their swords to establish the independence we now enjoy, and who will not hesitate to draw them again, if those threats are carried into execution which have been recently thrown out against the Constitution. I know men too, equally distinguished for their talents and their virtues, friendly to this repeal, who signed the Constitution as members of the General Convention, who used every effort to promote its adoption, and who, I have no doubt, are ready to defend it, to the last moment. There are men likewise, and gentlemen dare not contradict me, who refused their signatures to the Constitution as members of the General Convention, and who opposed it in every stage of its adoption, but were afterwards received into favor, and were high in the confidence of the former Administration. Which of these two descriptions of persons are most likely to cherish the Constitution, I cheerfully leave to the American people to decide. It is extremely possible that some of my political friends were opposed to its adoption, without certain amendments at that time urged with great force, because they thought the liberties of the nation not sufficiently secured; and I wish I could say that no events have since taken place to justify the uneasiness which at that time existed. A recurrence to some of those events by my friend from Virginia (Mr. GILES) has been warmly commented on, and he has been charged with introducing subjects which have formerly excited irritation, for the purpose of catching the popular ear. I trust I shall be pardoned for saying that, in my judgment, a recurrence to those events was in a great measure rendered necessary, by the unjustifiable remarks with which the debate was opened by a gentleman from North-Carolina, (Mr. HENDERSON.)

Let it be recollected, sir, that a few days past, when the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) was begging for a postponement of the bill for a week only, he promised for himself and his friends that if we would indulge them, they would meet us with calmness, and would proceed to the discussion with a spirit of Christian meekness. After the postponement was consented to, and after this voluntary promise, I came to the House with an expectation of hearing the subject discussed with that coolness and deliberation which are truly desirable in the investigation of truth; but

I soon discovered that this expectation was vain and illusory; that the expected calm had roused itself to a whirlwind, and the spirit of Christian meekness was transformed into a spirit of anger and crimination.

The gentleman from North Carolina, who opened the debate, forgetful of the promise which had been made for him by his friend from Delaware, commenced an unwarrantable attack upon a majority of the House, by declaring that on the seventh of December the same spirit of innovation had entered these walls, which had laid waste the fairest portions of Europe; that it was now about to tear down all the valuable institutions which had been erected by former Administrations, and even to destroy the Constitution itself. Did gentlemen imagine that such observations were to pass unnoticed? Did they suppose that we would sit tamely down under an imputation at once so heavy and so groundless? Was it not natural that we should go back and look into the nature and origin of those measures which had been denominated the fairest institutions, and which the gentleman had particularized as the debt, the taxes, the Judiciary, and the Mint? Yes, sir, the gentleman from Virginia did take a view of these fair institutions, and did show, whatever might have been the motives of their authors, that their inevitable tendency was to strengthen the power of the Executive. It is this undue influence of the Executive power of the Government that we wish to reduce; it is this influence that we wish to confine within its proper limits, in order to prevent the Government from taking that course which most Republican Governments have heretofore taken; to prevent it from arriving at that goal where the spirit of republicanism is lost, and monarchy commences. Permit me to ask the gentleman from Delaware if he was serious when he said there were no friends to monarchy in this country? Does he not recollect a proposition that was made in the General Convention, when our present Constitution was framed? And does he not recollect by whom that proposition was made? The form of Government contained in that proposition bore, indeed, the name of a Republic, but was marked with the strongest features of monarchy and aristocracy. The Chief Magistrate and Senate were to hold their seats during good behaviour, or, as gentlemen now contend, for life; the Chief Magistrate was to have an absolute negative on all laws, and the sole direction of war, after its commencement; the Senate to have the exclusive right to declare war; the Governors of the respective States to be appointed by the General Government, and to have an absolute negative on the laws of the States. All the militia of the States was to be under the direction of the General Government, by whom the militia officers were to be appointed. The immediate representatives of the people were to be chosen for three years, but their powers were not defined; it is certain however, that they could pass no laws which were not under the control and subject to the rejection of the Senate and Chief Magistrate, who were placed above all responsibility to the nation. When I say "all responsibility," I mean not to forget that they were liable to impeachment for corrupt conduct in office; yet it may be remembered, and the history of other nations warrants the opinion, that rulers may be guilty of ten thousand oppressions, without the possibility of proving that their conduct was founded on corruption. These impeachments, too, were to be tried, not by persons holding their appointments from the people, or responsible to them, but by the chief judge of each State, who it was expressly provided should hold his office during good behaviour. That this proposition was made, no gentleman will doubt; or if a doubt rests on the mind of any man, I refer him to members of the General Convention who are now present, and who agree in political opinion with our opponents. I venture to hazard the assertion, that the information I have given will be found to be correct, because I have derived it from the most authentic source—from members of the Convention, in whose hands copies of the plan are now to be seen, which were taken by them at the time. If, however, my information is incorrect, there are gentlemen now in my view who can furnish the means of setting me right, and I call upon my adversaries to contradict me upon any authority whatever. But, sir, I have no apprehension that I shall be contradicted; gentlemen are too well acquainted with the fact to risk a controversy about it; for it has been published and commented on in every State of the Union, and never has been denied. Among other publications, I have one in my hand, of an official nature, given to the world by a member of the Convention in his official capacity, and bearing an authenticity that is not to be disputed. It is, sir, a communication made in the month of January, in the year 1788, to the Legislature of Maryland, by Luther Martin, Esq., one of the delegates from that State to the General Convention, in which he assigns his reasons for refusing to sign the Constitution. After having said that there were three parties in the Convention, with different views and sentiments, he proceeds, in the tenth page:

"One party, whose object and wish it was to abolish and annihilate all State Governments, and to bring forward one General Government over this extensive continent, of a monarchical nature, under certain restrictions and limitations. Those who openly avowed this sentiment were, it is true, but few, yet it is equally true that there was a considerable number who did not openly avow it, who were, by myself and many others of the Convention, considered as being in reality favorers of that sentiment, and, acting upon those principles, covertly endeavoring to carry into effect what they well knew openly and avowedly could not be accomplished."

After this, let no man doubt that there are advocates for monarchy in this country, and advocates too who have been high in the confidence of the nation; for we have been told that they were members of the General Convention, and were anxious to give the essence of monarchy to that Constitution under which we now live. Nor should it be forgotten, that we have heard from another authority, at one time at least very much respected by federal gentlemen, that a monarchical Government with an aristocratic and a democratic branch, was not only a Republic, but the best kind of Republic.

But, Mr. Chairman, if there are friends to monarchy in this country, who think that the nature and constitution of man will bear no other form of Government, it is not for me to censure them. I thank God we are free, and that there is no more persecution for political than religious opinion. Yet while I refrain from censuring, I will also take the liberty of saying that I never will trust those who entertain such opinions, but will at all times use my endeavors, feeble as they may be, to correct such of their errors as in my judgment may have an injurious operation either upon the Government or the nation.

When we attempt to correct these errors, let us not be told that we are about to prostrate the Constitution. The Constitution is as dear to us as to our adversaries, and we will go as far to support it. It is by repairing the breaches that we mean to save it, and to set it on a firm and lasting foundation, that shall resist the attacks of its enemies, and defy the encroachments of ambition. We are yet a young nation, and must learn wisdom from the experience of others. By avoiding the course which other nations have steered, we shall avoid likewise their catastrophe. Public debts, standing armies, and heavy taxes, have converted the English nation into a mere machine to be used at the pleasure of the Crown. After having struggled nearly six hundred years for their liberties, they now find themselves almost at the same point from which their ancestors set out. This is not barely an opinion of my own, formed upon cursory observation, but is sanctioned by the authority of a universally admired writer, known to most of us. Sir William Blackstone, in the fourth volume of his valuable commentaries on the laws of England, speaking of the various reductions that have been made in the prerogative of the Crown since the Revolution of 1688, and the consequent apparent advantages derived to the nation, uses a language which I fear is too applicable to our own situation:

"Yet, though these provisions have in appearance, and nominally, reduced the strength of the Executive power to a much lower ebb than in the preceding period, if, on the other hand, we throw into the opposite scale (what perhaps the immoderate reduction of the ancient prerogative may have rendered in some degree necessary) the vast acquisition of force arising from the riot act and the annual expenditure of a standing army, and the vast acquisition of personal attachment, arising from the magnitude of the national debt, and the manner of levying those yearly millions that are appropriated to pay the interest; we shall find that the Crown has gradually and imperceptibly gained almost as much in influence, as it has apparently lost in prerogative."—p. 440.

Mr. Chairman, if a man acquainted with the history of our Government, would attend to the remarks just read, he would suppose that this was the chart by which our political course had been steered. It is true we have had no riot act, but we have had a Sedition act, calculated to secure the conduct of the Executive from free and full investigation; we have had an army, and still have a small one, securing to the Executive an immensity of patronage; and we have a large national debt, for the payment of the principal and interest of which it is necessary to collect "yearly millions," by means of a cloud of officers spread over the face of the country. By repealing a part of the taxes from which a part of this money has been raised, we not only lessen the burdens of the people, but we likewise discharge a large portion of those officers who are appointed by the Executive, and who add greatly to his influence.

This debt, which now hangs as a dead weight about us, has been called the price of our independence, and has been spoken of as a debt due to the "war-worn soldier," which we assumed and funded to alleviate his sufferings. This position I cannot assent to. When the veteran soldier returned from the fatigues and hardships of the war, to enjoy domestic comfort, he brought with him, as an evidence of the service he had rendered, nothing but his certificates and his wounds. They were, indeed, honorable testimonials; the latter he felt would remain with him while life lasted, and the former he held with the hope that, one day or other, his country would be in a situation to pay him; but the hard hand of poverty pressed upon him, and stern necessity compelled him to part with them for a pittance. The rich and cunning speculator, who had sheltered himself from the storm, now came out to prey upon his distress, and, for two shillings and sixpence in the pound, he purchased this poor reward of toil and hardship. When you were about to make provision for the payment of this debt, you were called on, loudly called on, by the voice of humanity, by the spirit of justice, to make a discrimination in favor of the soldier. He asked you to give to the speculator what the speculator had advanced; but to give the balance to the poor, though valiant soldier, who had faithfully earned it in the frozen regions of Canada, or the burning sands of South Carolina; you regarded him not; to his tale of distress you turned a deaf ear; his services and his sufferings were forgotten; the cold and hunger he had endured, the blood he had spilt, were no longer remembered; you cast him upon the unfeeling world, a miserable dependent upon charity for subsistence. Let not then the gentleman from Delaware call this debt the price of our independence, or a compensation to the war-worn soldier. To him it was a poor compensation indeed. Its effect was to intrench yourselves around by rich speculators, whose interest and influence you secured, and who would be ready to support you in any measures, provided you would insure them the payment of the interest on that debt, which was funded for their benefit, but which was created at the hazard and expense of a brave and meritorious soldiery. From motives of a shameful policy you enabled the proud speculator to roll along in his gilded chariot, while the hardy veteran, who had fought and bled for your liberties, was left to toil for his support, or to beg his bread from door to door.

But this debt, iniquitous as we deem the manner of its settlement, we mean to discharge; but we mean not to perpetuate it; it is no part of our political creed that "a public debt is a public blessing." We will, I trust, make ample provision for its final redemption; and when in a few days a proposition shall be submitted for the annual appropriation of seven millions and three hundred thousand dollars to this object, I challenge gentlemen on the other side of the House, who express so much anxiety about public faith, to be as forward in support of this measure as I shall be. We will then show to the American nation who are most inclined to support the public credit; whether those who are desirous of paying the debt, or those who are anxious for its perpetuation.

The member from Delaware told us that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) after exhausting one quiver, had unlocked another and discharged it upon the judges; those judges whose victims he has never heard of. If that gentleman has never heard of a judge's stooping from the bench to look for victims, I have. Let me direct his attention even to his own State. Let me ask him if he has never heard of a judge commanding the district attorney to search a file of newspapers, in order to discover something upon which a prosecution might be grounded? Let me ask him if that judge did not detain the grand jury at a busy season of the year, for the avowed purpose of finding an indictment, not upon any fact known to the judge, but upon a mere report which the judge had heard, that there was a seditious paper printed in the State. This looks like stooping from the bench to search for a victim. But the gentleman from Delaware looks to the Executive for victims—for those widows and orphans who demand the commiseration of the people. Mr. N. said he could not conceive how widows and orphans could be affected by the Executive, for he did not know that widows and orphans had been dismissed from office, as he never had understood that it was usual to give them appointments. He had heard that some persons had been dismissed for being public defaulters, and others for revolutionary torism; but he had not heard that any had been dismissed for refusing to sign an address offering up adulation to Presidential vanity. He had indeed understood that two men had been restored to office, who were dismissed under a former Administration for this crying sin. But why all this uneasiness about dismissals from office? Have the friends of gentlemen heretofore been so eager in their pursuit of the loaves and fishes, that they are now unwilling to surrender them? Have they enjoyed them with such peculiar delight, that they now murmur at the exercise of the Constitutional right which the President possesses of displacing from office all those whom he thinks unfit for the duties, and of putting in those who, in his opinion, are better qualified? Surely when gentlemen are so strenuously contending for the Constitutional rights of the Judiciary, they ought not to murmur at the exercise of a Constitutional right by the Executive. Nor do I think they can with any propriety complain, when it is recollected, that although the President had the power of disposing of all offices, yet he has left by far the larger proportion in the possession of men who are personally and politically his enemies. From the great discontent expressed on the subject of removals, it might seem that the judges themselves were rather the objects of general solicitude, than the system or Constitutional privileges of the Judiciary.

This Judiciary, however, the gentleman from Delaware has said, in that same spirit of Christian meekness which appears to have characterized him throughout, he never considered a sanctuary, because he knew that nothing was sacred in the eyes of infidels. May I be permitted to ask, what the honorable gentleman means by infidels? The expression excited some degree of surprise, because, as the gentleman had, on a former occasion, talked so much of Christian meekness, I had flattered myself that he felt some little of Christian charity. The hope, I fear, was a vain one. The honorable member and his friends are orthodox; we and our constituents are heretics. If, sir, an unqualified aversion to the high-fashioned opinion, that a public debt is a public blessing; if a total unbelief in the propriety of laying heavy and oppressive taxes, to pay a useless and expensive army; if the strongest reprobation of every law calculated to restrain the liberty of the press, and thereby prevent the nation from inquiring into its own concerns; if the entire rejection of the odious principle, that the reins of Government are to be placed in the hands of a set of men who are independent of and beyond the control of the people, afford any evidence of infidelity, then do I avow myself as much an infidel as any man living. And if Christianity and infidelity be the two principles, diametrically opposed to each other, it is most certain that the gentleman and myself are as far asunder as if we inhabited different hemispheres. He is a political christian, and I a political infidel. He offers up his sacrifices upon the altar of independent rulers; I bow at the wide distance I trust will ever be preserved between us, while the gentleman holds his present political creed.

Was there a man who did not feel the highest astonishment at the honorable member's doctrine in relation to the common law? Is there any one who believes with him, that "stripped of the common law, we have neither Constitution nor Government; that our Constitution would be unintelligible, and our statutes useless?" Sir, the gentleman tells us "we must leave it to the discretion of the judges to declare what belongs to us, and what is unsuitable." He says we have nothing to do with anything of a monarchical tendency; yet even upon his own ground this is a question for the discretion of the judges. Have the people of this country ever consented to vest the judges with this extensive discretionary power? Have they ever sanctioned the principle that the judges should make laws for them instead of their Representatives? Is it not legislation to all intents and purposes, when your judges are authorized to introduce at pleasure the laws of a foreign country, to arm themselves with power? The American people never dreamed of such a principle in the Constitution, and never will submit to it. They never ought to submit to it. It is giving to the judges a power infinitely more transcendent than that vested in any other branch of the Government. The Legislature cannot recognise any principle of the common law having a monarchical tendency; yet this principle the judges may recognise, if you leave it to their discretion to introduce any part of the common law which they may think proper.

I have so often heard the gentleman from Delaware maintain upon this floor an opinion that the common law of England was the common law of the United States in their national capacity, and that therefore the Federal courts have a general common law jurisdiction, that I think proper to offer some remarks upon it, lest silence on our part should be construed into acquiescence.

Let us then examine this subject, and inquire when and how the common law was introduced into this country. The gentleman from Delaware supposes it was brought here by our forefathers at the time of their emigration. To this opinion I might oppose that of the celebrated Judge Blackstone, who, in the first volume of his Commentaries on the laws of England declares, in the most positive terms, that the American plantations were either ceded by treaties, or conquered from the natives; and that therefore the common law of England, as such, had no force or authority there; but wherever it is in force, it arises from their having ingrafted it into their own municipal regulations. [Mr. NICHOLSON read sundry extracts from the 106th, 107th 108th and 109th pages of 1st vol. of Blackstone, to show that this was the opinion of the learned Judge.] For this opinion, however, sir, of Judge Blackstone, I do not contend. I have seen it very powerfully opposed by able writers, and I think the usage and practice of the colonies themselves furnish a sufficient argument against it. It may perhaps be correct in its application to New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, which, I believe, were originally settled by the Dutch and Swedes, and were ceded to the English by the Treaty of Breda, in the year 1667. These were therefore conquered countries, and the common law of England could not have been brought into them by the original emigrants. It may have been since practised under in these States, but is indebted for its introduction either to express statute, or to common usage. It goes however to establish the principle for which I contend, that our forefathers brought with them no law having a uniform operation over all the extent of country now contained within the limits of the United States; for when gentlemen speak of a common law of the United States, they must mean a law uniform throughout the whole extent, and equally obligatory upon the whole nation. I entertain no doubt myself that the common law of England, or so much of it as was applicable to their situation, was brought over by the original emigrants, to New England, to Maryland, to Virginia, and the other Southern States; and that it continued to be the law of the provinces until altered by their respective Legislatures. But it was the law of each province only, and not a general law operating upon the whole; for each was independent of the other, and the municipal regulations of the one could not bind the other. Thus the rule of succession to real estate by primogeniture continued in most of the provinces till about the commencement of the Revolution; but in Massachusetts, as early as the year 1648, they declared by law that lands should descend and be held in common among the children. In Virginia a feri facias could not be laid on lands, nor can it even at this time; but in Maryland this rule of the common law was changed by statute in the reign of George the Second, and lands were made equally liable to debts as personal property. In Massachusetts, blasphemy and perjury were made capital offences by their own statutes, neither of which were capital at common law, and their punishment has been otherwise provided for in other States, particularly in Maryland. The doctrine of forfeitures was entirely done away in Massachusetts by their own local laws, and traitors and felons were allowed to devise away their lands, goods, and chattels; while, in most of the other provinces, the forfeiture upon conviction and attainder continued as at common law. Numberless instances might be adduced, in addition to these, to show the total disagreement of the various changes made in the common law by the several Provincial Legislatures at different times; but I apprehend those mentioned are sufficient to convince any candid mind, that there was no general uniform law or rule of conduct operating upon the respective Colonies prior to their confederation for the purposes of general defence. Permit me likewise to remark, that even if the common law had remained unaltered by the several Colonial Governments, yet it could not have been considered as a uniform rule of law operating upon them as a nation, because each was independent of the other and had emigrated at different periods, while the common law of England was undergoing the most material changes by act of Parliament. The colonization of Virginia took place in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, that of Maryland in the reign of Charles the First, and that of Georgia in the reign of George the Second. In the intervening spaces of time, the common law had been greatly ameliorated; and if it is now to be insisted on as constituting the law of the United States, in consequence of its introduction by our forefathers at the time of their emigration, we should be at a loss to determine which of these periods we should fix on as that which was to give the character to the common law; whether it is to be the common law in force in the reign of Elizabeth, or the common law as ameliorated by statute, between that time and the reign of George the Second. I need not enter into a detail of these changes, for they will readily occur to most gentlemen who hear me; but as very material changes were made, I think it cannot be contended that the law as existing at one period or the other could have any uniform operation upon the several colonies, who were, as to each other, independent States governed by their own laws, and without any connexion, common government, or general law, prior to the declaration of independence.

These observations have been made with a view of showing, that as British colonies, although each might have adopted the common law of England for its own purposes, yet each having adopted it at different periods, and modified it in various ways, there was no uniformity in the law; and even if there had been a uniformity, we were not a nation, and therefore could have no law common to the whole. These arguments would likewise apply to show that it was not adopted by the United States in their confederated capacity when they first took a rank among the nations of the earth, or in other words, when they declared themselves independent of Great Britain, and associated for the purposes of common defence. The object of this confederation was defence only, and not internal government. The States each became sovereign and independent, and reserved to themselves the power of self-government. Many of them, by their constitutions, adopted the common law as it had been modified by their own provincial statutes, and gave to their Legislatures the power of changing it whenever circumstances might require. Congress had no powers given to them: but everything was done by recommendation, and when afterwards certain powers were vested in Congress by the Articles of Confederation in 1781, they were of a general nature, relating to the war only, and nothing like an authority to establish courts or to grant judicial powers; and I think it would look like an absurdity to say that the common law of England became at that time the common law of the United States, when the only body representing the United States (that is, Congress) had no power to establish tribunals to carry this into operation. But, sir, I think it will not be seriously contended, that the common law of England became the common law of the United States, either as a consequence of the emigration of our forefathers, or by virtue of the Declaration of Independence, or by the Articles of Confederation. I shall therefore beg leave to examine another ground, which gentlemen may think more tenable.

We have been told by the member from Delaware, that without the common law the Constitution would be a dead letter. Every State in the Union, he says, has adopted it; and he asks why it is denied to the Federal Constitution? I could have wished that on this subject, as well as many others, the gentleman had offered us something like argument, instead of mere wild and arbitrary assertion. However highly we may estimate his talents, he must not expect that we are to yield to his political dogmas. We flatter ourselves that the Constitution may stand and flourish without those invigorating principles of the common law, which the gentleman is anxious to infuse into it.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

I agree that it has been adopted under various modifications by the respective States; but I do not admit that it has been adopted by the Federal Constitution. Where the States have adopted it, it has been by a solemn and positive act, expressly recognising it as a part of their code of laws. I might challenge the gentleman to put his finger on any part of the Federal Constitution containing any recognition of it whatever, as a law of the United States. Is it to be found in the enumeration of the powers vested in the Legislature? Is it to be found in the enumeration of the powers vested in the Executive, or in the enumeration of the powers vested in the Judiciary? It is to be found in neither. Is this adoption of the common law to be found in any article contained in the original instrument, or in any of the amendments afterwards ingrafted upon it? In one of the amendments, we find the words common law used, but I presume it will not be contended that the common law was adopted by this article; for it must be obvious to the plainest legal understanding, that the words "suits at common law" are only used in contradistinction to suits in equity. In the latter cases, the trial by jury is not used, but in the former the trial by jury is preserved by this amendment. And when the rules of the common law are mentioned in the latter part of the same article, they are merely referred to as rules of proceeding which are to govern in motions for new trials, and a few other cases, where facts decided by the verdict of a jury may be re-examined; but it can have no operation to confer jurisdiction. Might I not be permitted to ask why the common law of England was adopted by our Constitution more than the laws of any other nation; more than the laws of France, Spain, Sweden or Holland? When the Constitution was formed we were more intimately connected with those countries than with England, because with some of them we had treaties of alliance, with all we had treaties of commerce. Besides, if the common law of England was adopted by the Constitution, a very serious question might arise whether the common law did not thereby become a part of the Constitution; and, if a part of the Constitution, all laws since passed by Congress contrary to the principles of the common law would be null and void; such, for instance, as the act declaring the punishment of manslaughter and several others. That this would be a fair construction may be gathered from the opinions of those who formed the constitutions of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland and South Carolina, and likewise from the Convention of Virginia; who all retained the common law, but expressly declared it to be subject to the future alterations of their respective Legislatures. Now, if the common law was adopted by the Constitution without any provision that it should be subject to future alteration by Congress, a question might certainly arise whether Congress would have the power of passing any law varying the common law. However, if this difficulty is got over, another not very inferior in importance immediately presents itself. If the Constitution adopted the common law, or the common law attached itself to the Constitution, it immediately became a law of the United States, and is paramount to the laws and constitutions of the individual States. Wherever, therefore, the constitutions or laws of the States modified the common law, such modification was of no effect; for whenever a law of the United States clashes with the constitution or law of one of the States, the State Constitution or law must give way, as has been solemnly decided by the Federal courts in more instances than one; particularly in the case of Vanhorne's lessee against Dorrance, in the circuit court of Pennsylvania, and in the case of Ware and Hilton upon a writ of error in the Supreme Court of the United States. Whether the people of this country are inclined to submit to the train of evils which would follow the establishment of this principle, does not, I presume, admit of a doubt.

The gentleman from Delaware, however, seems to consider the existence of the common law, as a law of the United States, as a matter of necessity. He tells you if you go into your courts of justice with the mere statutes you cannot proceed a step, you cannot even punish a contempt. I shall here be allowed to ask if it is the idea of that gentleman that our Federal courts have an authority to enforce the common law doctrine of contempts? If by the operations of the common law they have a right to punish one contempt, I presume they have the same right to punish all. Let us then take a view of these common law contempts.

If one man strikes another in the superior courts in England, or even at the assizes, it is a contempt of a very high nature, and is punished at common law by cutting off the right hand, imprisonment for life, forfeiture of goods and chattels, and of the profits of land during life. To rescue a prisoner from any of the said courts is another very high contempt, and is punished by the common law with imprisonment for life, forfeiture of goods and chattels, and of the profits of land for life. There are a great variety of smaller offences likewise denominated contempts, for which the common law inflicts fine and imprisonment, and if the court pleases, corporal or other infamous punishment. This is a slight specimen of that common law, upon which the member from Delaware has pronounced so high an eulogium; and these are the punishments which your courts of justice could not inflict without the wholesome assistance of the common law. But sir, it may be shown that the courts of justice of the United States do not require the aid of the common law to enable them to punish contempts; for it is declared expressly by the seventeenth section of the act of September 1789, establishing the courts, that they shall "have power to punish by fine and imprisonment, all contempts of authority in any case or hearing before them." The gentleman therefore was grossly mistaken when he said it was necessary to call in the common law, to authorize the courts to punish for contempts; although the act of Congress does not go quite so far as the mild provisions of the common law, which cut off the right arm of the offender. By this act it is likewise declared, that the Federal courts shall have power to grant new trials, and to administer all necessary oaths and affirmations. This was certainly quite nugatory, if the common law had attached itself to the Constitution; because these are powers which the State courts and those of England exercise by virtue of the common law; and if it had been the idea of those who have gone before us, that this common law was the law of the United States, they would not have vested in the courts the same authorities which they had by the common law. I believe, sir, I could take up our laws relative to the Judicial establishment, from the commencement of the Government to the present day, and could show that Congress had from time to time vested in the courts and judges a variety of powers, which they would have had, if the common law had been the law of the United States in their Federal capacity. But I will refer to one instance only, where it was thought necessary to pass a special law for the purpose of giving to your judges one of the lowest common law authorities. In the year 1798, an act, of one section only, passed, authorizing the judges of the Supreme Court, and of the several district courts, to hold to security of the peace and good behaviour in any case arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. At common law the judges are by virtue of their commissions, ex officio conservators of the peace, and if this law had been the Federal law, there could have been no necessity for passing the act just alluded to.

Again, by the common law, a person charged with treason is allowed a peremptory challenge of thirty-five jurors; yet this right of challenge is likewise expressly given by the act of Congress passed in 1789. The same act provides for the punishment of murder, in places under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, as forts, arsenals, &c., and limits the number of challenges to twenty; yet these provisions are precisely the same as at common law, amended by a variety of statutes a long time before the emigration of our ancestors; and I presume it is not contended that the common law was brought here without the changes antecedently made. If, however, the common law was introduced originally by our forefathers, and afterwards attached itself to our Constitution by its own wonderful magic, I ask why not the statute law likewise? The same juridical principle will apply as well to the statute law as the common law, and the two together will furnish gentlemen with an extensive field to wander in, which I cheerfully abandon to them.

I think, sir, I have fully proved that the common law of England was not introduced by our ancestors at the time of their emigration, as a general and uniform law prevailing over all the extent of country comprised within the present limits of the United States; because the several colonies were planted at several periods, some of which were as remote from each other as one hundred and fifty years; because it was changed and modified at pleasure by the respective provinces, and because we were not at that time a nation, and therefore required no general uniform law to govern us. I think I have proved that it was not adopted by the Declaration of Independence, because we associated only for mutual defence against a common enemy, and there were no general questions among us which could possibly require the interference of common law, and Congress had no power to establish courts to carry the law into execution. And I think I have proved that it was not adopted by the Constitution, because there is no part of the Constitution declaring it to be the law of the land; because its implied adoption, without limitation or restraint, would either make it a part of the Constitution itself, and thereby prevent a most valuable exercise of Legislative authority, or by making it a law of the United States, would give it a controlling and repealing or nullifying power over the laws and constitutions of the individual States; and because almost every Congress, by enacting a variety of provisions already established by the common law, expressed an opinion, most unequivocally, that the common law was not the law of the United States in their national capacity.

The common law can have no possible existence in this country, but as it has been introduced by the different States. Some have engrossed it into their body of laws by their constitutions; others by express statute, and in one or two instances perhaps, the States have used and practised it from their original colonization: for it is not denied that the several colonies brought with them such both of the statute and common laws as were applicable to their situation. But the common law as introduced, used, and practised in any one State, can only be considered as a State law. After it was retained by Maryland, by an express article of her constitution, it was no longer the common law of England as such, but thereby became the law of the State of Maryland, under the various modifications which had been made by the provincial assemblies; and such it remains at this day. As a State law then, it cannot be construed to give jurisdiction to the Federal courts, any more than the numerous acts of Assembly which have passed both before and since the Revolution. By the common law of England, as it exists there, and as it likewise exists in Maryland, kidnapping, or the forcible abduction or stealing of man, or woman, or child, is an offence punishable with fine, imprisonment, and pillory: a statute of Maryland declares the stealing of a slave to be a capital offence. Now neither of these laws can give the Federal courts any jurisdiction over these offences, because they are both State laws, although one of them is likewise a part of the common law of England.

Murder is an offence punishable, I believe, in all the States with death, and remains as at common law, modified by several old statutes, which our forefathers brought with them at the time of their emigration, yet the Federal courts can have no jurisdiction over the crime of murder, unless committed in a fort or arsenal; and this is expressly declared by act of Congress to be punishable with death if committed in those places. And permit me once again to observe, that this shows that Congress at the time of passing the law (in 1789) entertained no idea that the Federal courts could punish murder by virtue of any other authority than that expressly derived from a statute.

"Cursing or wishing ill to the King," is an offence punishable at common law by fine, imprisonment, and pillory; but this is not the law of any of the States, because after the Declaration of Independence we had no King, and therefore it was not applicable to our situation. To curse or wish ill to the Governor of a State, could not be punished, although he is the Chief Magistrate of the State; because cursing or wishing ill to the King of England is a contempt against his person and Government: but in America we do not regard the majesty of persons, nor do we admit that the Government belongs to any one man, but to the whole people. However, even if this part of the common law did form any part of the codes of the respective States, it could give no jurisdiction to the Federal courts, being a State law. It is with much regret, Mr. Chairman, I have heard that a man in New Jersey was indicted at common law and punished by a Federal court, for expressing a ludicrous wish in relation to a former President of the United States—a personage not known to the common law. Yet common law jurisdiction was assumed by the Federal court over this offence, and the sacred person of the President was substituted for the sacred person of the King.

In fine, sir, my opinion is, and I sincerely believe it to be a correct and Constitutional opinion, that the common law of England, either as such or as it has been introduced into the several States, is not the common law of the United States in their national or federal capacity, and therefore cannot operate to give to the Federal courts any jurisdiction. On the present occasion, I wish to express my decided disapprobation of the doctrine contended for by the gentleman from Delaware, that the Federal judges have a discretionary power to introduce such parts of the common law as they please, and as they may think do or do not belong to us. This discretionary power in a judge is dangerous to liberty. It will sap the foundation of your Constitution itself. It will place the life and property of every man in the community in the most precarious situation. All security will be lost, all confidence will be destroyed. To vest a discretionary power of this kind in a judge, is to vest him with an arbitrary and unconstitutional power. That able and upright judge, the most excellent Lord Camden, who was an ornament not only to his profession, but to his country and to human nature, declares, that "the discretion of a judge is the law of tyrants; it is always unknown; it is casual, and depends upon constitution, temper, and habit. In the best it is often caprice; in the worst it is every vice, folly, and passion, to which human nature is liable."

I have dwelt longer on this subject, Mr. Chairman, than I intended; but as it is important, I trust I shall obtain the pardon of the Committee; thinking as I do, it was impossible for me to have said less. Having several times heard the gentleman from Delaware maintain a similar doctrine on this floor, I have to-day thought it my duty to examine it; to state some reasons to show the doctrine to be incorrect, and others why it ought not to be admitted. How far I have succeeded the Committee will decide. Infinitely more might be said, but as the evening is advancing I will no longer trespass on your patience now. To-morrow I will again ask the indulgence of the Committee for the purpose of offering some remarks more immediately connected with the subject under consideration.

Mr. N. sat down; the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 27.

A representation of the inhabitants of Fairfield county, in the Northwestern Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying that the said Territory may be admitted as a State, into the Federal Union, on an equal footing with the original States.—Referred.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. NICHOLSON (in continuation) offered his acknowledgments to the Committee for consenting to hear him again to-day, after the very tedious, though he hoped not uninteresting discussion of yesterday, in relation to the common law. From the construction which had been given to our laws and Constitution, not only in the House, but as he had understood by some of the Federal Judiciary, he thought it the duty of every man to direct his attention to this subject, as it involved principles more important than were apparent at first view. Under this impression he had offered some observations to the Committee, which he flattered himself would not be totally unacceptable. In doing this he had been as brief as possible, for he well knew it would fill a volume, if all were collected which might be said in opposition to the opinion that the common law of England was the common law of America, as a nation. He would now, however, proceed to the discussion of the subject more immediately under consideration.

As I have already occupied more time than I either expected or wished, I have no doubt I shall be excused for passing over the immense folio of extraneous matter which the gentleman from Delaware has introduced. It will afford me an opportunity, at the same time, of passing by that list of names which the gentleman held up to our view, and which he exhibited in colors by no means flattering. Were I inclined to pursue the course which he has pointed out to me, I might present a catalogue of his political friends, covered with as miserable a daubing as his own; but I disdain it. Private feeling and private character shall never be made the subject of my animadversions in this House.

The expediency of the present repeal is the first point to which gentlemen seem to have directed their attention. In order to show the necessity of the law of the last year, they have pointed out numerous defects, as they suppose, in the old system. The member from Delaware, after lavishing the highest encomiums on the gentleman who is said to be the author of that system, has undertaken to show that it was constructed upon fallacious principles. The fallacy of these principles, he says, was discovered in practice, and a new organization of the courts became necessary. Since I have been able to form an opinion of the relative merit of the political characters in this country, there are very few indeed whose talents I have heard more commended than those of the gentleman alluded to. On no occasion has his wisdom or the solidity of his judgment appeared more conspicuous to my mind than in the formation of the first Judiciary system of the United States. In a Government like ours, extending over a large tract of country, and composed of sovereign States, independent of each other, confederated for the purpose of mutual defence and mutual protection, it was rightly judged that its Judicial powers should not extend to any other cases of Judicial cognizance, than those which might be deemed somewhat of a general nature, and whose importance might affect the general character or general welfare of the Union. It was foreseen that these cases would not be very numerous, and experience has proved the correctness of this opinion; for in the twelve years that have elapsed, but about eight thousand four hundred suits have been brought in the Federal courts, exclusive of Admiralty causes; or about seven hundred suits for each year in the whole of the sixteen States. Of these, fifteen hundred now remain undecided, which are nearly equal to those of the two last years. In order to show the incompetency of the courts, as existing under the old establishment, gentlemen ought to prove that this is an unreasonable number to be at this time pending. I ask them if this does not prove as great a despatch of business as in any courts of the world? In the circuit court of Maryland, I believe the same rules have been adopted for the despatch of business as are practised in the General or Supreme Court of the State; and I believe it is likewise a rule, that causes shall continue the same length of time. By the laws of Maryland, a cause may continue two years in that court, and of course a cause may continue two years in the circuit court. What the rules may be in other courts respecting the continuance of causes, I do not know, but if a similar rule prevails in all the courts, no doubt can possibly exist that business has been as well despatched in the Federal circuit courts as it can ever be. Most of the causes brought in the Federal courts, I presume, are unimportant, and are controverted. Whenever there is a controversy it is almost impossible to get your pleadings in a state for trial in less than two years, where there are only two terms in each year; and this of necessity compels a continuance for two years. My idea on this point is easily exemplified:

Suppose three hundred and fifty suits brought at May term, 1799	-	-	-	-	350
The same number at October term, 1799	-	-	-	-	350
The same number at May term, 1800	-	-	-	-	350
The same number at October term, 1800	-	-	-	-	350
The same number at May term, 1801	-	-	-	-	350

It would follow that seventeen hundred and fifty suits would be brought to those five terms, and the dockets of May, 1801, would exhibit seventeen hundred and fifty suits then depending. If the first three hundred and fifty were decided at that time, fourteen hundred would be left on the dockets in June, 1801, at which time the list now before us was taken. But the delays which are necessarily incident to trials at the bar, and in chancery, would furnish at least a possible presumption that the whole brought at the first term could not readily be tried at the fifth, for want of testimony, the defective state of the pleadings, demurrers, motions for new trials, and sundry other causes. Let me then again repeat, that as fifteen hundred suits only remain pending, business must appear to have been well despatched, and no argument can be drawn from the supposed incompetency of the courts.

But, sir, the first objection which gentlemen have started to the old system, arises from the itinerancy of the judges. They are stated to be old men, who have passed the meridian of life, and it cannot be expected that they should ride through the continent for the purpose of holding courts. They number, says the member from Delaware, the viginti annorum lucubrationes, and must now have leisure to read, to repair the ravages of time, or, in other words, to prevent them from forgetting what they had before learned. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that I feel as much reverence for old age as most men, and I flatter myself I am not totally unacquainted with the requisite qualifications of a judge: but indeed gentlemen must excuse me, if I do not consent to pay a man four thousand five hundred dollars a year "to prevent him from forgetting what he had before learned."

Give me leave, however, to ask, if these are the evils which have been discovered by practice? This old system has been called an experiment. Permit me to ask, if these are the evils which experience alone has brought to view?

When the great man, alluded to by the gentleman from Delaware, framed this system; when he defended it in the Senate of the United States, as I am told he did, with all the energies of his mind, against the objections which were then urged to it, was it not in his power to calculate the labor of travelling over a certain extent of country? Or, if this was an exaction too great for his powers, were there no men in Congress with sagacity enough to discover this mighty objection? Was it one of the arcana left for the laborious researches of the present day? The extent of country has not since increased. Bridges are not kept in worse order, nor do rivers rise higher now than they did at that time. In truth, all the means of travelling are more eligible and commodious. The roads are better, the houses of entertainment more numerous, the number of stages greatly increased, and gentlemen are not now under the necessity of using their own carriages. Yet, notwithstanding these difficulties which then presented themselves, but have since been removed, men of the most eminent talents were readily found, who were willing to accept the places of judges, and were not afraid of meeting the inconveniences which are now complained of. It cannot, therefore, be urged with propriety that the itinerancy of the judges is one of the objections which has been proved by a trial of the experiment. But it is said to be too laborious, too fatiguing for a judge to be compelled to ride from New Hampshire to Georgia, for the purpose of holding a court. Sir, when these courts were first organized, the United States were divided into three circuits; the Eastern, the Middle, and the Southern. Six judges were appointed, two of whom were to ride in each circuit for the purposes of holding a court in conjunction with the district judge. Of this, however, the judges complained; and, for their relief, a law passed requiring one supreme judge only to associate himself with the district judge. This was, in fact, dividing the United States into six circuits, for no one judge was compelled to ride beyond the two States immediately adjoining that in which he lived. It is true, that no judge was obliged to go twice into the same State, until every one of his brethren had taken his turn in it; but this was optional with them; and if, through caprice, or a desire of change, or any other cause, they could not agree among themselves, I cannot think that it ought to be considered a sufficient reason to reorganize the whole system. By the act of 1792, they were authorized to assign to each other the several circuits in which they were respectively to ride; and if they have made inconvenient arrangements, it can only be imputed to themselves; they are at liberty to change them whenever they think proper. Why, then, is it alleged, that a judge was obliged to ride from New Hampshire to Georgia, when a gentleman living in the New England States was never compelled, by law, to come into any district farther South than Connecticut? But no arrangement of this kind was made. A judge residing in the Eastern States, for the sake of pleasure, to see the country, or for some other cause, we find travelling with "all the agility of a post-boy," from New Hampshire to Georgia, for the purpose of holding a court; while another, residing in the Southern country, with the sprightliness and activity of youth, "studying the law upon the road," has flown from Georgia to New Hampshire, and held his court there. I again ask, where was the necessity of this? If they impose upon themselves labor four or five times greater than that which the law requires them to perform, is it right to, call this excess an evil, and impute that evil to the law?

If the bill now upon the table should pass, let the judges of the Supreme Court make such amendments as will be agreeable to themselves. Let the judge residing in Massachusetts confine himself to the New England States; let the judge in North Carolina travel Southward; and let the other judges perform their duties in the Middle States. They will not then suffer the inconvenience complained of. The mountains which have been raised by the gentleman from Delaware, will fall before them. The wilderness which has sprung up in his imagination, will be turned into fruitful plains and pleasant villages. The judges will have leisure to read to prevent them from forgetting what they had before learned, and will be enabled to add to the viginti annorum lucubrationes.

But gentlemen have resorted to another part of the Constitution, which they say contains the restrictions; not indeed in express terms, but by implication. Sir, this doctrine of implication is a dangerous one. A departure from the letter in order to pursue the spirit, may lead to incalculable mischief, and must ultimately destroy the Constitution itself. It leaves it to the discretion of every succeeding Congress to give to the Constitution any meaning whatsoever, that their whim or caprice may suggest; to assume to themselves, and to attach to the other branches powers never intended to be delegated. We say that we have the same right to repeal the law establishing inferior courts, that we have to repeal the law establishing post offices and post roads, laying taxes, or raising armies. This right would not be denied but for the construction given to that part of the Constitution which declares that "the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour." The arguments of gentlemen, generally, have been directed against a position that we never meant to contend for: against the right to remove the judges in any other manner than by impeachment. This right we have never insisted on; we have never in the most distant manner contended that the Constitution vested us with the same power that the Parliament of England have, or that is given to the Legislatures of Pennsylvania, Delaware, New Jersey, and some others. Our doctrine is, that every Congress has a right to repeal any law passed by its predecessors, except in cases where the Constitution imposes a prohibition. We have been told that we cannot repeal a law fixing the President's salary, during the period for which he was elected. This is admitted, because it is so expressly declared in the Constitution; nor is the necessity so imperious, because, at the expiration of every four years, it is in the power of Congress to regulate it anew, as their judgments may dictate. Neither can we diminish the salary of a judge so long as he continues in office, because in this particular the Constitution is express likewise; but we do contend that we have an absolute, uncontrolled right to abolish all offices, which have been created by Congress, when in our judgment those offices are unnecessary, and are productive of a useless expense.

Let us examine the objections which have been raised to this upon that part of the Constitution in which it is said that "the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall receive, at stated times, a compensation for their services, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." It has already been stated by some of my friends, and I shall not therefore dwell upon it, that the prohibition contained in these words was of two kinds: the one applying to the Legislature, and prohibiting a diminution of salary; the other applying to the Executive, and forbidding a removal from office. The first prohibition our adversaries readily admit, but the second, they say, applies as well to the Legislature as to the Executive. I should agree to this, too, were there any necessity for it, but it is not pretended by us that we have the right to remove from office any officer whatsoever—not only a judge, but even a revenue officer; there would, therefore, be no necessity for imposing a restriction upon Congress in relation to a judge any more than in relation to an officer concerned in the collection of the revenue. They are each appointed by the President and Senate, but the Executive officer holds his place at the will of the President, the judge holds his office during good behaviour, and neither subject to removal by the Legislature. The term good behaviour is said to secure to the judge an estate for life in his office, determinable only upon impeachment for, and conviction of bribery, corruption, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, and that inasmuch as his good conduct is the tenure by which he holds his office, he cannot be deprived of it so long as he demeans himself well. As our system of jurisprudence has been borrowed from Great Britain, it may not be amiss to refer to the history of that nation, in order to discover whether they have given the same construction to these words as is now contended for by gentlemen on the other side of the House. It is certain that, in England, it has, in some cases, been considered, that the words good behaviour, in a commission, confer the office for the life of the officer, provided he shall so long demean himself well; but I do not know that a question has ever arisen there, how far the power creating the office could afterwards abolish it. It appears to me to follow so necessarily, that for myself I should never have started a doubt; it is however most clear, that these words have not, even in England, been thought to give the judges an estate for life in their offices. Antecedent to the accession of William the Third, all judges were appointed by, and held their commissions during the pleasure of the King; but, in the reign of that monarch, it was declared by the Act of Settlement, that judges after that time should hold their commissions during good behaviour, removable upon the address of both Houses of Parliament. The tenure of office then became precisely similar to that of our judges at this time, with the single exception, that it was in the power of Parliament to remove them; they were to hold their offices so long as they demeaned themselves well, and could secure the good will of the Legislature. Yet this was not considered there as an estate for life, because it is well known that their appointments became vacant upon the demise of the Crown, and their commissions were no longer in force. It was the settled opinion and uniform practice for sixty years. The judges never ventured to maintain a contrary doctrine, but acquiesced in it from the reign of William the Third to that of George the Third. It was not only the practice, but it was recognised by the acts of several succeeding Parliaments; for, in the first year of the reign of Queen Anne, an act of Parliament passed, declaring that the judges should hold their commissions six months after the demise of the Crown. Here it was decidedly the opinion of Parliament, that the judge did not hold his office during life, because it was admitted that the commission was properly annulled by the demise of the Crown, and they declared that, in future, it should continue in force for six months after. This practice of vacating the commissions of the judges, six months after the demise of the Crown, was regularly pursued upon the death of Queen Anne, of George the First, and George the Second, without any doubt being entertained as to its propriety. In the reign of George the Third, Parliament again acknowledged it to have been the settled and established law of the realm, by enacting a particular statute to change it, in which they declared, that the commissions of the judges should not determine upon the demise of the Crown, and so the law stands at this day. I have given this as an example to show that, in England, the words good behaviour did not invest the judges with an estate for life in their offices; but that, notwithstanding these words in their commissions, in conformity to an act of Parliament, they were still left subject to the established principle of the common law, that the commissions of all offices in the appointment of the Crown were vacated by the death of the reigning monarch. It is a maxim universally admitted, that the common law may be repealed by statute, but it was not considered in England that a fundamental principle could be repealed in an incidental manner, by declaring that the commissions of the judges should continue during good behaviour. It is a fundamental principle in every Government, that the power having the right to enact has likewise the right to repeal a law. It is the existence of this fundamental principle in our Government which gives to Congress the right of repealing their own laws; for the power to repeal is no where expressly vested in them by the Constitution, and it would be absurd to suppose, that when a law is once enacted, it is to continue forever in force. The Act of Settlement is as much a part of the Constitution of England as the third article is a part of our Constitution; yet the provision in this act which declares that the judges shall hold their commissions during good behaviour, was never considered as destroying that fundamental principle of their Government by which all commissions were vacated upon the demise of the Crown. So in our own country, although the third article of the Constitution declares, that the judges of the inferior courts shall hold their commissions during good behaviour, yet it cannot operate to destroy the fundamental principle of our Government, by which Congress is authorized to repeal all laws which they have enacted, and to abolish all offices they have created. An express statutory provision was deemed necessary in England to prevent the commissions of the judges from being vacated by the demise of the Crown, and was accordingly made in the reign of George III. An express Constitutional provision must be made before Congress can be divested of the right of repealing a law which they have enacted. Until our Constitution is amended to this effect, which I hope never to see done, the right to repeal a law constituting an inferior court, can no more be denied than the right to repeal a law establishing a post road, laying a tax, or raising an army.

Having shown that, in England, the tenure by which the judge held his office was not, of itself, deemed sufficient to destroy a great and leading principle of their Government, I will now endeavor to prove that the tenure of office cannot and ought not to produce this effect in the United States. I will not dispute with the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) about the meaning of the word hold, because it equally answers my purpose to say, that the judge shall possess his office during good behaviour. I cannot, however, agree with him, that the judge holds his office of the people, for he is not appointed by them; besides, if he is to hold his office during good behaviour, of the people, a doubt perhaps might arise, whether, under these circumstances, even a change of the Constitution could affect him. It is true he is not called the President's judge; neither is a Minister to a foreign Court called the President's Ambassador, but the Ambassador of the United States; yet it will not be contended, that the Ambassador holds his place of the people.

It is necessary to examine whether the tenure by which any officer of the United States holds, or, if gentlemen please, possesses, his office, can destroy the inherent right of Congress to repeal the law by which the office is created. In order to do this, it may be proper to refer to an early period of the political history of the present Government. In the year 1789, soon after the Government was organized, when Congress were about to establish the office of Secretary of Foreign Affairs, since called Secretary of State, a question arose, whether the officer was to be removed at pleasure by the President; whether by the President and Senate who appointed him, or whether he was to hold his place during good behaviour.

These different constructions of the Constitution were contended for by three different classes of gentlemen, who severally urged, that each was the true meaning of the Constitution. A gentleman of distinguished talents, at that time representing South Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAM SMITH,) advocated with very great ability the opinion, that the Constitution had pointed out but one method of removing an officer, (by impeachment,) and therefore that he could not be removed so long as he demeaned himself well. Finally, however, a majority agreed, that the true meaning of the Constitution was, that the power of removal was of an Executive nature, and therefore belonged solely to the President. This construction was adopted, and has ever since been sanctioned by uniform practice. But I will suppose that Mr. SMITH's construction had been agreed to, and it must be allowed to be extremely plausible, would Congress thereby have been prevented from repealing a law by which an Executive officer had been created, because the officer could only be removed by impeachment? I presume no gentleman will say so. But let us take the case as it now stands. Your supervisors, who superintend the collection of your excise duties, are appointed by the President and Senate, and hold their offices under the Constitution, not during good behaviour, but during the will and pleasure of the President. The tenure by which he holds his office is completely beyond the power of the Legislature, and they cannot remove him. So long as he can secure the good will of the President, he is to hold his office against the whole world. It is as sacred, in relation to the authority of Congress, as that of a judge. They both hold their offices independent of the Legislature; the one during good behaviour, the other during the pleasure of the President. It is not in our power to remove an excise officer, so long as his office continues, any more than to remove a judge, so long as his office continues. The authority vested in us is entirely Legislative, and has nothing to do with the Executive power of removal. Yet is there any man on earth can say that we have not a Constitutional right to repeal the laws laying excise duties, by which the office of supervisor is created? And can any one say that we can remove the supervisor in any other manner than by repealing the law? We do not contend for the right to remove the judge any more than for the right to remove the supervisor, neither of which we can do, each holding his office independent of us; but we allege that the tenure by which either holds his office cannot prohibit us from repealing a law by which the office is created. It is the tenure of office which is now urged against the repealing power of Congress. This tenure is completely independent of Legislative will, and therefore we are told we cannot pass a law to affect it. I have, however, shown that the tenure by which the supervisor holds his office is as completely independent of Legislative will, as that by which a judge holds his office; yet no man will be hardy enough to dispute the Constitutional right of Congress to repeal the excise laws, and thereby to dismiss all the persons holding offices under them. I am aware that I may be told that the President, in giving his sanction to the law, at the same time impliedly signifies his consent to the removal of the officer. But permit me to suppose that the President refuses his signature to the law, and tells you that these officers hold their commissions independent of you, and therefore you have no right to dismiss them; that the Constitution authorizes them to hold their places during his will and pleasure, and that it is his will and pleasure they shall continue in office. Here the tenure is as strong and inviolable by the Legislative power as the tenure of the judge; yet Congress may, notwithstanding, afterwards pass the law by the concurrence of two-thirds, and destroy this sacred tenure of office.

If, then, the tenure of office in the one case cannot destroy the right to repeal, why shall it destroy it in the other? Both tenures are equally independent of Legislative control—the one securing an estate defeasible by misbehaviour, the other securing an estate defeasible by the will of the President; but neither dependent on Congress for continuance in office, so long as the office itself exists. Gentlemen say we cannot do that by indirect means which we cannot do directly; that is, that we cannot remove a judge by repealing this law, inasmuch as we cannot remove him by direct means; but I have proved beyond the possibility of doubt that we may indirectly remove an excise officer by repealing the law under which he was appointed, although we have no authority to remove him in any direct manner. If the principle laid down by gentlemen is not true in the one case, it cannot be true in the other.

For my own part, Mr. Chairman, I think no doubt can be entertained that the power of repealing, as well as of enacting laws, is inherent in every Legislature. The Legislative authority would be incomplete without it. If you deny the existence of this power, you suppose a perfection in man which he can never attain. You shut the door against a retraction of error by refusing him the benefit of reflection and experience. You deny to the great body of the people all the essential advantages for which they entered into society. This House is composed of members coming from every quarter of the Union, supposed to bring with them the feelings and to be acquainted with the interests of their constituents. If the feelings and the interests of the nation require that new laws should be enacted, that existing laws should be modified, or that useless and unnecessary laws should be repealed, they have reserved this power to themselves by declaring that it should be exercised by persons freely chosen for a limited period to represent them in the National Legislature. On what ground is it denied to them in the present instance? By what authority are the judges to be raised above the law and above the Constitution? Where is the charter which places the sovereignty of this country in their hands? Give them the powers and the independence now contended for, and they will require nothing more; for your Government becomes a despotism, and they become your rulers. They are to decide upon the lives, the liberties, and the property of your citizens; they have an absolute veto upon your laws, by declaring them null and void at pleasure; they are to introduce at will the laws of a foreign country, differing essentially with us upon the great principles of government; and after being clothed with this arbitrary power, they are beyond the control of the nation, as they are not to be affected by any laws which the people by their representatives can pass. If all this be true; if this doctrine be established in the extent which is now contended for, the Constitution is not worth the time we are spending upon it. It is, as it has been called by its enemies, mere parchment. For these judges, thus rendered omnipotent, may overleap the Constitution and trample on your laws; they may laugh the Legislature to scorn, and set the nation at defiance.

To me it is a matter of indifference by what name you call them; I care not whether it be kings or judges. Arm them with power, and the danger is the same. For myself I have no hesitation in declaring that I would rather be subject to the absolute sway of one tyrant, than to that of thirty; as I would prefer the mild despotism of China to the hated aristocracy of Venice, where the vilest wretch was encouraged as a secret informer, and the lion's mouth was ever gaping for accusation.

I must now be permitted to turn my attention to various authorities which gentlemen have introduced, and which, I presume, they thought would fully establish the position they have taken. I deem it peculiarly fortunate for us, sir, that, although volumes have been ransacked, though heaps of newspapers and pamphlets have been resorted to, and the journal of the Convention itself has been produced as authority, yet the whole furnish not a single argument—not one solitary idea—to prove the unconstitutionality of the measure now under consideration. They have been read, it is true, with much apparent triumph, and have afforded gentlemen an ample opportunity to display their eloquence and ingenuity, but certainly have no bearing on the question.

The first of these authorities is of very high nature, not only because it is the decision of a court of judicature, but because that decision was made by men whose talents are acknowledged, and whose characters command universal respect. Let the case, however, be fairly stated, and it will be found to bear no analogy to the subject now before us. I shall refer to the same pamphlet which has been quoted on the other side of the House, and therefore there can be no difference between us as to facts. We find in page twenty-fourth, that by the Constitution of Virginia, the two Houses of Assembly were to appoint, by joint ballot, judges of the supreme court of appeals and general court; judges in chancery, and judges of admiralty, who were to be commissioned by the Governor, and to continue in office during good behaviour. In the twenty-fifth page it is said that, by the first judicial system of Virginia, one general court was constituted with common law jurisdiction; one court of chancery, and one court of admiralty; and by the law the judges of these three courts were declared to constitute the court of appeals, but as such had no commissions given to them. In 1787, the Legislature passed a law erecting a system of circuit courts, and declared that the above named judges should execute the duties of circuit judges, in addition to their duties as judges of the other courts. This law the judges refused to execute as unconstitutional, because they said the Legislature had no right to impose new duties on them without giving them additional salary.

Judiciary System.

This is a plain and simple statement of the case, with the decision of the court, and I am astonished that any man should attempt to apply it to that now under consideration. We do not propose to add new duties to those now performed by the circuit judges; but we propose to take from them all duties whatsoever, so that the two cases are not at all analogous. If, indeed, the opinion be a sound one, (and I certainly shall not undertake to question it,) it clearly proves that the law of last session was unconstitutional, because that law imposed new and more arduous duties on the judges of the district courts of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Maryland. It might likewise prove the bankrupt law to be unconstitutional, because it imposed a great variety of additional duties on the district judges throughout the United States. The bill now under consideration does not add new duties to those of the judges of the Supreme Court and the judges of the district courts, but replaces both in the situation in which they were prior to the passage of the law which we are now about to repeal. I must say, therefore, that this authority fails altogether.

Another decision of the same judges has likewise been adduced to prove the unconstitutionality of the present bill, which is equally inapplicable with the other; but perhaps it may be found in the end to apply more forcibly to the Judiciary system of last session. The same author from whom our opponents have derived their information, tells us (in page 30) that after the judges had refused to do the duties of circuit judges as just mentioned, "the Legislature, apparently acquiescing in their decision," new modelled the law, and established a separate court of appeals, the judges of which were to be elected by the joint ballot of the two branches, agreeably to the Constitution. The former judges, who had before jointly performed the duty of judges of the court of appeals under a law of the State, were relieved from the further discharge of it, and six of them were elected judges of the new court of appeals now created separately, others being appointed in their places as judges of the court of chancery, general court, and court of admiralty. This law they likewise declared to be unconstitutional, not because a court which had been created by law was abolished, (for the court of appeals was expressly established by the Constitution,) but because, in their own language, it was "an amotion from office of the whole bench of judges of appeals, and the appointment of new judges to the same court."

Now, sir, I aver that the very proceeding which the judges of Virginia declared to be unconstitutional was the effect of the Judiciary bill which it is now proposed to repeal. For, by the former system, the judges of the Supreme and district courts of the United States were made judges of the circuit courts, and continued to hold them until they were "amoved from the office" of judges of the circuit courts by the law of last session. So that this decision cannot apply to the bill now on the table, but is directed with great force to that passed by our adversaries early last year, and which it is our intention to repeal.

I have been thus concise in the examination of these two opinions, because it was only necessary to show the points in dispute, to convince the most prejudiced mind that they could have no bearing on the present question. They may, indeed, serve to show that the judges thought themselves authorized to declare an act of the Legislature unconstitutional; but this is by no means the question before us, although it has been dragged into the discussion.

While I am on this part of the subject, I will endeavor to prove that the last Congress set us an example of abolishing courts and vacating the places of judges, although gentlemen who were then in the majority now contend that a similar proceeding on our part will be unconstitutional. The twenty-fourth section of the Judiciary act of last session declares "that the district courts of the United States in and for the districts of Tennessee and Kentucky shall be, and they hereby are, abolished;" and by the same section it was provided that the jurisdiction of those courts should be afterwards vested in, and exercised by, the circuit courts of Tennessee and Kentucky respectively. The question necessarily arising is, what was the effect of abolishing these courts? I have no hesitation in saying that, in my opinion, the offices of the judges were likewise abolished. It is true, that by the seventh section it is declared that the circuit court of the sixth circuit shall be composed of a circuit judge, and of the judges of the district courts of Tennessee and Kentucky, thereby retaining them in office, and, as gentlemen say, not affecting their independence. This point I shall remark on presently, but will now confine my observations to that part of the law which abolishes the district courts.

The words judge and court are correlative terms, and by the Constitution are inseparably connected with each other; for in no part of the Constitution do we find any other judges spoken of than judges of the Supreme and inferior courts. A court may be composed of one or more judges; as the district court is composed of one, and the Supreme Court of six judges. It is the legal name of one man, or of a body of men in their collective capacity, vested with certain powers, authority, and jurisdiction, to be exercised by them agreeably to the established laws of the country; as the word Congress was, under the Confederacy, the political name of a body of men in their collective powers of a certain extent. When you abolish the court, you take from the persons composing the court all the powers vested in them as a court; as when the old Congress was abolished, they were divested of all powers vested in them as a Congress. When the district court of Kentucky was abolished, the gentleman who was then judge, was no longer judge of the district court, for there was no such court in existence. I would ask, then, of what he was the judge? For the idea of a judge without a court is an absurdity. I trust I shall not be told that he was judge of the district of Kentucky, for the Constitution knows of no judge either of the Supreme or of an inferior court; and the judge of a district, without a court, is no where recognised by the Constitution. I think, therefore, I am warranted in saying that when the district courts of Tennessee and Kentucky were abolished, the offices of judges of these courts were likewise abolished. This is precisely the effect now contemplated. The bill upon the table, if enacted into a law, will abolish the circuit courts which were created last year, and will at the same time abolish the offices of the judges of these courts.

But we are told that, by abolishing the district courts of Tennessee and Kentucky, the independence of the judges of these courts was not affected, because they were by the same law appointed to hold the circuit court of the sixth circuit. This is the part of the law which the gentleman from Virginia said had violated the Constitution, and this opinion I do, without hesitation, concur in. By the twenty-seventh section of the act passed last session, the circuit courts then in existence were entirely abolished, and by the seventh section, new circuit courts were created. The Constitution has given to the President and Senate the power of appointing all judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts; the circuit court of the sixth circuit is an inferior court, and by the Constitution the judges ought to have been appointed by the President and Senate. Yet in the face and in violation of the Constitution, the Legislature of the last session did appoint the judges of the district courts of Tennessee and Kentucky to hold the courts of the sixth circuit, which courts were created anew by that law, and ought to have had their judges appointed by the President and Senate. This, sir, was the measure which the gentleman from Virginia said had inflicted a ghastly wound on the Constitution, and not that part of the law, as has been contended, by which the two district courts were abolished.

The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) in order to show that we are not authorized to abolish these courts, and thereby to vacate the commissions of the judges, has referred us to the draught of a constitution made for the State of Virginia, in the year 1783, by the present President of the United States. It must be remembered, sir, that this is nothing more than the opinion of an individual on a subject not growing out of the Constitution of the United States, which was not then formed, and, I believe, not even dreamt of; but, as I feel a high respect for the opinions of this gentleman on all subjects, I shall beg leave to examine that alluded to by the member from Connecticut. And, to me, it is a matter of some gratification that the man who has been so long and so unjustly the object of federal calumny, should at last receive even this slight retribution from federal authority. In this reference, however, the honorable member has been peculiarly unfortunate, for it will be found that this draught of a constitution shows the opinion of Mr. Jefferson to have been, at that day, precisely the opinion which we now entertain on the subject before us. Happily for the nation, it is not the only instance in which the sentiments of the Chief Magistrate are in direct opposition to those of the gentleman from Connecticut, and his friends. If the gentleman had turned to the book itself, which I now have in my hand, instead of relying on the scraps of anonymous scribblers, who, for aught I know, are interested in giving a false coloring, he would not have been imposed on. In the third article of the plan of a constitution proposed by Mr. Jefferson, it is declared that "the Judiciary powers shall be exercised by the county courts, and such other inferior courts as the Legislature shall think proper to continue or erect; by three superior courts, to wit: a court of admiralty, a general court of common law, and a high court of chancery; and by one supreme court of appeals." This language is very similar to that of our Constitution, which says that "the Judiciary power shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." Now, sir, the precise point of difference between us is, whether it was at that time the idea of the President, that the judges of these inferior courts who, I will show you, were likewise to hold their commissions during good behaviour, could be removed from office, by abolishing their respective courts. The plan already alluded to, proceeds to declare that the judges of the court of chancery, of the general court, and court of admiralty, shall hold their commissions during good behaviour; and afterwards, in page 371, provides that "the justices or judges of the inferior courts, already erected or hereafter to be erected, shall be appointed by the Governor, on advice of the Council of State, and shall hold their offices during good behaviour, or the existence of their court." This, then, clearly shows it to have been the idea of the writer, that the inferior courts, which the Legislature were authorized to erect, as they might think proper, might afterwards be reduced by the Legislature, and the judges displaced, although they were to hold their commissions during good behaviour. As I before said, this is nothing more than an opinion on a subject somewhat similar to that before us, and is not directly in point; but as the member from Connecticut thought proper to call it into his aid, I think, when it is found to be against him, it may very fairly be thrown into the opposite scale.

The gentleman has likewise referred to the journals of the Convention by whom the Constitution was framed, and has said a proposition was there made, that the judges should be removed upon the address of the Legislature, as in England. As this was not inserted in the Constitution, he infers that we have not the power. Is it necessary, sir, again to repeat, that this is a power which we do not contend for? But does it therefore follow that we have not the power to repeal a law? There has been no proposition that we should exercise such a power. We have no complaints against the judges. They may all be, as I know some of them are, men of honor and integrity. We have no desire to remove them and put others in their places, but we wish to abolish a system which, in our consciences, we believe to be useless and unnecessary, and which is supported at a heavy expense, that the nation is neither able nor willing to pay.

But, sir, I believe it has not heretofore been supposed, that a refusal by the Convention to grant a power expressly, prevented Congress from an exercise of that power. When it was formerly proposed to grant a charter of incorporation to the Bank of the United States, it was stated by a member of this House, who had likewise been a member of the Convention, (Mr. MADISON,) that an attempt had been made in the Convention to invest Congress with this power, and that the proposition was rejected; yet, this argument had no effect whatever, for Congress did proceed to incorporate the Bank, and the incorporation stands at this day. If, therefore, the present quotation from the journal was in point, we might be excused for suffering it to have no weight with us, as we should at least be justified by the precedent of federal authority. But it bears no analogy to the present question, and ought to have no influence in its decision.

The extracts which have been read from Judge Tucker's lecture, from the debates of the Virginia convention, and from the writings of "Publius," are equally irrelevant. They contain some general ideas on the independence of the Judiciary, without any definition of that independence which can possibly affect the bill on the table. The independence of the three branches of Government has, in my opinion, been much talked of without being fairly defined, or correctly understood. The powers of our Government are distributed under three different heads, and are committed to the different departments. The Legislative power extends to the enacting, revising, amending, or repealing all laws, as the various interests of the nation may require. The Judiciary power consists in an authority to apply those laws to the various controversies which may arise between man and man, or between the Government and its citizens, and to pronounce sentence agreeably to the dictates of their judgment and consciences. After the Judicial decree, it then becomes the business of the Executive to carry it into effect according to its true intent, and conformably to the laws of the land. In all Governments where they have the semblance of freedom, the great desideratum has been, to keep these three branches so entirely separate and distinct as that the powers of neither should be exercised by the other; or, in other words, that the Legislative powers should never be exercised by the Executive or Judiciary, that the Judicial powers should not be exercised by the Legislative or Executive, and that the Executive powers should not be exercised by the Legislature or Judiciary. But there is no Government on the face of the earth, whose history I am acquainted with, in which a total and entire independence has been established. In England the judiciary hold their offices at the will of Parliament. In the States of Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Georgia, the judges are either elected by the Legislature for a limited time, or are subject to removal by them; in New York, some of the judges are in the same situation; in New Hampshire, the Legislature are authorized to limit the duration of their commissions, and, I believe, are in the habit of doing so; and in Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, the Executive is absolutely dependent on the Legislature for his continuance in office, being annually or biennially elected. In Tennessee, and in most, perhaps all of the others, both the Judiciary and the Executive are dependent on the Legislature for the amount and payment of their salaries. Yet, sir, in all these States, where we find no such idea of independence as is now contended for, there has been no confusion, no disorder. The people are happy and contented, and I venture to affirm, are more free than the inhabitants of any other part of the globe. They are happy, because none can oppress them; they are free, because they have a control over their public agents. But if the public agents of the Federal Government are to be set above the nation, and are to be invested with the arbitrary and uncontrolled powers which some gentlemen insist on, who can say where they will stop, or what bounds shall be prescribed to them? Man is fond of power, is continually grasping after it, and is never satisfied. He is not, therefore, to be trusted. Unlimited confidence is the bane of a free Government. Those who would retain their freedom, must likewise retain power over agents, or they will be driven to destruction. I have been taught to believe, that the power is never so safe as in the hands of those for whose benefit it is to be employed. I consider it in their hands when it is delegated to representatives freely chosen by themselves for a short period, and immediately responsible to them for its use. "Power in the people has been well compared to light in the sun; native, original, inherent, and not to be controlled by human means." But power, when once surrendered to independent rulers, instantly becomes a despot, and arms itself with whips and chains. While the people retain it in their own hands, it exalts the character of a nation, and is at once their pride and their security; if they surrender it to others, it becomes restless and active, until it debases the human character, and enslaves the human mind; it is never satisfied until it finally tramples upon all human rights. It is against this surrender of power that I contend; it is this vital principle of the Constitution that I never will yield. The people are the fountain of all power; they are the source from which every branch of this Government springs, and never shall any act of mine place one branch beyond their control.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will conclude. I have already said more than I could have wished, but the subject demanded it. The question has become important, and the Constitution loudly calls for its decision. I entreat gentlemen, however, to examine calmly this new doctrine of the independence of judges, before they establish the principle that the tenure of office is to prevent the repeal of a law, by which the office is created. It will equally apply to every office under the Government for all are held equally independent of the Legislative will. It is no more in our power to remove an executive than a judicial officer, and if we are to be prevented from repealing a law, because we have no right to remove an officer, not only the present expensive Judiciary must continue, but the army and the navy may be increased hereafter, and no future Congress will be authorized to reduce them; and the odious excise duties are entailed upon us for ever. This is an extent, I presume, to which no gentleman is willing to go. It may indeed secure the judges in their offices, and afford them the much wished for independence, but it will sacrifice the independence of the nation, and render the Constitution of no avail. It may leave us the name and the shadow of liberty, but the essence and the spirit of representative government will be totally destroyed.

I therefore cherish the hope, that this Constitutional question will be decided by passing the bill upon the table, and that a majority of this House will vote against striking out the first section.

Mr. DENNIS.—Mr. Chairman, indisposed as I have been, since the first commencement of this discussion, and indisposed as I still am, prudence, perhaps, would have dictated to me silence on this occasion; and sure I am, I should not have risen at this late hour of the day, but for the observations of my honorable colleague (Mr. Nicholson.) Had I offered my sentiments at an earlier period of this discussion, it would have been my primary object to have taken an analytical view of the Constitutional question, to have shown what the Constitution has said, and to have proven that it means what its language certainly imports, no less a restriction on Legislative, than on Executive power. But this will now be but a subordinate consideration, and my object will be rather to pursue certain gentlemen through their boundless excursions into almost every region of our political history, than to attempt a methodical investigation of the subject before us. In the course of my observations, I beg my colleague to be assured, I shall not omit to pay him the homage of my most profound respect and high consideration; yet he must excuse me, since he has thought proper to reiterate the preliminary remarks of his friend from Virginia (Mr. GILES,) if I should assign to that gentleman the priority in the application of my remarks. And here, Mr. Chairman, I will not promise, like little David (Mr. RANDOLPH) to slay the Philistine, (Mr. GILES,) but will endeavor to aid my friends in repelling his unprovoked and ungodly attacks on the children of Israel and their illustrious chieftain; that chieftain who may be emphatically denominated the father of his country, and who was the President of the Convention who formed that sacred instrument of which you are about to make a burnt offering; a propitiatory sacrifice to appease the vengeance of party prejudice and political hostility, to a few obnoxious individuals. Great geniuses, Mr. Chairman, in the political, may be aptly assimilated to comets, in the natural world; they serve rather to excite our admiration and wonder and astonishment, than contribute to the order or perfection of the general system. Such a genius is the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES.) That gentleman we all know has light in abundance, and if the path we have to explore be dark and intricate, he might have taken his lantern and have gone before us; we should have been glad to have followed him and had the benefit of his illumination. But he has departed from the highway leading to the place of destination, and, like an ignis fatuus, has attempted to lead us through bogs and morasses, in order that we might mire or get lost on the way. My friend from Delaware has, however, taken him by the skirts and never let go, and is the evil spirit which haunts and pursues him wherever he flies. The honorable gentleman from Virginia commenced his observations by giving us a retrospective narrative of the rise and progress of political parties, their respective views and their different tendencies. And truly, sir, the history which he gave us was such a one as I have long since read in Callender's History of the United States, and his "Prospect Before Us;" but such a one as I had not expected from the urbane, accomplished, and very enlightened gentleman from Virginia. It the more resembles these histories, because, to the best of my recollection, there is in them both an open attack on that illustrious name which was once dear to us all, and which, however it may now be sought to be tarnished by foreign convicts and a few gentlemen who stand high in the honors of their country, is, I trust, still sweet in the lips of the great mass of the American people. This great name is now to be put down, together with all those federal ramparts which have originated under its auspices, and been sheltered in its shade. But whence this hostility to this name? That great man, (WASHINGTON,) whose strong penetrating intellect and sound discriminating judgment seldom led him astray, in a letter to a citizen of Maryland, happened to express a sentiment, that the democratic party in this country had been the cause of all the expense incurred in our preparations for resistance to the French aggressions. And is this the reason why to this moment, with all power in their hands, no one has been found making one solitary effort for the erection even of a pedestrian statue, expressive of a nation's gratitude to a nation's saviour, to whom there has been assigned by the Chief Magistrate of our country, for his revolutionary services, (nothing, sir, for his civil labors) the fairest page in the volume of faithful history? The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) proceeded to state, that there exists in this country a certain party whose object it has ever been, to embrace every opportunity of extending Executive patronage, and of nerving the Executive arm, for the purpose of elevating the constituted authorities above responsibility to the public will; that with this view, they, with that great man at their head, (WASHINGTON,) had recognised, as a favorite maxim, the paradoxical maxim, that a national debt is a national blessing. My colleague has also observed, that such a party has existed and still does exist, and has endeavored to enforce the assertion of the gentleman from Virginia. I wish, sir, these gentlemen had been a little more particular and condescended, instead of dealing in general assertions, to have given us the names, the time when and place where these sentiments have been expressed. But it is well understood that these gentlemen allude to Mr. Hamilton, the first Secretary of the Treasury, and the author of the funding system. I think it is time these assertions should be repelled, or supported by better evidence than mere assertion. In order to see how far these categorical allegations are supported by the fact, I must solicit the indulgence of the Committee whilst I read to them, from Mr. Hamilton's report of the fifteenth of January, 1795, a few passages illustrative of this subject; The report begins thus:

"The President of the United States, with that provident concern for the public welfare which characterizes all his conduct, was pleased in his speech to the two Houses of Congress, at the opening of the present session, to invite their attention to the adoption of a definitive plan for the redemption of the public debt, and to the consummation of whatsoever may remain unfinished of our system of public credit, in order to place that credit on grounds which cannot be disturbed, and to prevent that progressive accumulation of debt which must ultimately endanger all government."

In page fifty-six of the same report, after recapitulating the different acts of the Government relative to the public debt, and the revenues provided to meet it, he goes on strongly to urge the propriety and necessity of establishing a sinking fund for its speedy extinguishment. Here follows his remarks on that proposition:

"There is no sentiment which can better deserve the serious attention of Congress than the one expressed in the Speech of the President, which indicates the danger to every Government from the progressive accumulation of debt; a tendency to it is perhaps the natural disease of all Governments; and it is not easy to conceive anything more likely to lead to great and convulsive revolutions of empire. On the one hand, the exigencies of a nation creating new causes of expenditure, as well from its own as from the ambition, rapacity, injustice, intemperance, and folly of other nations, proceed in unceasing and rapid succession. On the other hand, there is a general propensity in those who administer the affairs of Government, founded in the constitution of man, to shift off the burden from the present to a future day; a propensity which may be expected to exist in proportion as the form of the State is popular. To extinguish a debt which exists, and to avoid contracting more, are ideas almost always favored by public feeling and opinion; but to pay taxes for the one or the other purpose, which are the only means of avoiding the evils, is always more or less unpopular. These contradictions are in human nature, and the lot of a country is enviable indeed, in which there were not always men ready to turn them to the account of their own popularity, or to some other sinister account. Hence it is no uncommon spectacle to see the same men clamoring for occasions of expense, when they happen to be in unison with the present temper of the community, well or ill directed, declaiming against a public debt, and for the redemption of it as an abstract thesis, yet vehement against every plan of taxation which is proposed to discharge old debts, or to avoid new, by defraying the expenses of exigencies as they emerge. These unhandsome arts throw artificial embarrassments in the way of the administrators of Government; and co-operating with the desire which they themselves are too apt to feel to conciliate public favor, serve to promote the accumulation of debt, by leaving that which at any time exists without adequate provision for its reimbursement, and by preventing from laying with energy new taxes, where new occasions of expense occur. The consequence is, that the public debt swells until its magnitude becomes enormous, and the burdens of the people increase until their weight becomes intolerable. Of such a state of things, great disorders in the whole political economy, convulsions, and revolutions of empire, are natural offsprings."

How far this report, when it speaks of a description of characters in all countries, whose business it is to indulge a constant clamor about the existence of a public debt, and who are equally noisy whenever a tax is proposed to reduce it, has described the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) and some of his adherents, I shall leave it to this Committee and the world to decide; but I am sure that his and my colleague's assertions are unsupported by the evidence before us. This man (General Hamilton) who has been constantly represented in all the jacobinical gazettes, and by the gentleman from Virginia, as wishing to create and perpetuate a public debt, it appears, was the first to propose a sinking fund for its extinguishment; in conformity with whose proposition that fund was established, and we were rapidly progressing in the extinction of the debt, and in the year 1798 had actually extinguished the sum of $3,972,873. Here, sir, our operations were suspended; everybody knows the cause, and the gentleman from Virginia and my colleague ought to remember it. French depredations were now at their height, and whilst on the one hand they diminished our resources, on the other they created a necessity for augmenting our expenditures. The question was no longer how we should best diminish our debt, but how we should save our expiring commerce, a dilapidated revenue, and defend our territory.

But, Mr. Chairman, with all our anxieties for building up this system of patronage, and for accumulating the debt to effect it; with all our predilections for the British Government and subserviency to British influence, I believe there is no man to be found among us, whose solitudes have been so ardent, as to prompt him to propose to lend, or rather to give, to a foreign Government, five millions of dollars. Is the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) acquainted with the Governor of Virginia? Does he recollect of his being our Minister Plenipotentiary to the French Republic? Does he remember that whilst there he proposed to our Government, with no little importunity, to lend to our sister Republic, who was engaged in the common cause of republicanism five millions of dollars; not absolutely to be repaid, but only to be repaid "if possible?" And did he express the opinion, that the people of the United States would cheerfully submit to bear the tax to raise this money, when they knew it was thus to be employed?

[Here Mr. RANDOLPH called Mr. DENNIS to order, stating it to be improper to allude to the official conduct of a man who was not present to defend himself. Mr. DENNIS being permitted to explain, said he had not approved the latitude in which some gentlemen had indulged themselves; but it must be in the recollection of the Committee that others had far exceeded him in the freedom of animadversion on absent characters; and that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had, in a particular manner, distinguished himself by his attack on a judge of Maryland. The Chairman decided against Mr. RANDOLPH, and declared Mr. DENNIS in order. Mr. RANDOLPH appealed; the Committee confirmed the opinion of the Chairman.]

Mr. DENNIS proceeded—It is remarkable, Mr. Chairman, the sum which that gentleman proposed to lend or rather grant, to the French Republic, was precisely the sum which we have borrowed at eight per cent. The only difference between us is this; that gentleman was willing to tax the people for the benefit of a foreign Government, and the money lent might have been, and probably would have been, employed in building vessels to prey upon our commerce. We were of opinion that it was better to borrow money, even at eight per cent. than to submit to the loss of our commerce; and that to employ it in procuring the necessary implements of war, for the defence of our territory and the assertion of our invaded rights, would be making a proper use of our money. But does the gentleman (Mr. GILES) suppose that Mr. Monroe, in his willingness to accumulate our debt, was actuated by the political maxim, that a public debt is a public blessing? And is that gentleman, notwithstanding, still high in his confidence? If we have ever expended money, we have erected forts and fortifications, replenished your arsenals and magazines with arms and military stores, and put into your hands a valuable navy, which we have employed to much advantage ourselves; a part of which the present Administration is now employing to advantage, and still will continue, I hope, so to employ. We have consolidated your resources, provided for the debt of the old Confederation, and left in your hands, after all the difficulties we had to encounter during a war, unexampled on many accounts in the annals of nations, more than four millions of national property.

But my colleague (Mr. NICHOLSON) has said a great deal about the war-worn soldier having petitioned Congress for a discrimination in his favor, between the original holders of the national debt and those in whose hands it was at the time this Government provided for its payment; and that when he petitioned, he was scornfully rejected, sent away to starve, and the speculator is now rolling in his chariot and fattening on his spoils.

Here, Mr. Chairman, my colleague is wholly mistaken in point of fact, for your war-worn veterans never did petition for a discrimination. They had no interest in a discrimination, for after they had sold their claims to these speculators, though they had great reason to regret they had done so, they had no claim and never set up any claim on the Government. The old Confederation was considered as bankrupt, unable to pay its debts; and not foreseeing the establishment of a Government better disposed, and more competent to do it, some of these soldiers sold their certificates for whatever they could get; and those who sold have never petitioned us. Perhaps he alludes to certain cases barred by the statute of limitations; if so, he will do me the justice to say, that I have been always in favor of the war-worn soldier, who has a claim, though it may be barred by the statute. If he will look around he will find as many of his political friends, who have opposed the opening of this statute, as of his opponents; and it is not at all a question connected with those different views which characterize the different parties. With respect to the proposition for discrimination between the purchaser and original holder, I shall be permitted to remark, that the principle in the first place is extremely questionable, and in the next is impracticable in its execution.

[Here Mr. DENNIS proceeded to animadvert on both these propositions at some length.]

He then proceeded—But, Mr. Chairman, why do these gentlemen talk so much about paying the war-worn soldiers; have they ever consented to a tax to raise money for them, or for any other purpose?

But, sir, we have created an army, according to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) not because the threatening aspect of our affairs required it, or our views of impending danger suggested the propriety of the measure, but for the extension of Executive patronage; and, according to the intimations of my colleague, (Mr. NICHOLSON) to overawe five hundred thousand freemen, with arms in their hands and courage in their hearts, and humble them in dust and ashes. Since these gentlemen so often allude to the expense of the army, without any allusion to the crisis in which it was created, I must beg leave to recapitulate some of the circumstances which existed at the time. France, inspired with Roman ambition, and setting up pretensions to Roman supremacy, was at this time overstriding Europe, and trampling under foot every Republic in that quarter of the globe. The patriots of these Republics (for they had their patriots) complained of the tyranny of their rulers, the heavy taxes which they imposed, and called on this kind-hearted Republic for aid and assistance, to remove these oppressions. All on the alert, she readily obeyed the summons, invaded them as a friend, and demolished their ancient institutions, substituted in their place a military despotism, and at the point of the bayonet levied contributions in a few months, to an amount greater than these people had before paid for their own benefit in half a century. This, however, was then styled liberty and republicanism.

By the treaty of Campo Formio, the armies of France were liberated from employment in Europe, and they had nothing to do but look out for foreign conquests. The importunate demands of the soldiery for their pay, and the inadequacy of the means to pay them, rendered it very desirable to the Directory to get clear, on any terms, of fifty or a hundred thousand men. Bonaparte had collected at Brest and Toulon forty thousand veterans, with every requisite to transport them wherever his enterprising spirit might direct him. His destination was the subject of conjecture, and we had as much reason to apprehend it was for Louisiana, or some part of the United States, from the irritation which they had discovered towards us, as to suppose it was for the invasion of Egypt, whose barbarian regions held out much less inducements, and who had not provoked their resentment. In this situation we created a small military force, not to supersede the use of the militia, but who might be in readiness to meet the first onset of the invader, infuse into them a spirit of military discipline, stand in front of the battle, and cover a retreat, if a retreat should be necessary. This was my motive in raising this army, and I believe it to have been that of all those who united in the measure. Nor do I know, but for Nelson's victory and Suwarrow's campaigns, which we had not the powers of prophecy to foretell, these gentlemen would now be constrained to acknowledge the wisdom of the measure, and to regret that it was not further extended, instead of denouncing us as the enemies of the liberties of our country and its republican institutions.

Again, sir, we are told we created a navy; not because the French Republic, after plundering us under one pretext or another, for five years together, at length issued an arrêt which authorized an indiscriminate seizure of your merchantmen, and amounted to an universal proscription of your commerce. Not because her gun-boats were found in your own jurisdiction and limits, searching your most valuable shipping in your very ports and harbors; but for the purpose of strengthening the arm of the Executive, and introducing principles of the British monarchy. Those who are conversant with the history of that period, must remember that the only question to be decided when this navy was created, was, whether we should abandon the ocean, and basely surrender our unquestionable rights, or determine to defend them with all our energies. Whether we should abandon a commerce little inferior to that of any nation in the world; give up seven or eight millions of revenue; nine hundred and twenty thousand tons of shipping; sixty thousand seamen; and leave to your merchants the forlorn hope of deriving their subsistence from the plough, the axe, or hoe, and of being reduced to beggary and starvation; or whether, animated with the spirit of freemen, we would determine to protect them against the unprovoked aggressions, even of this mighty Republic. And it is well known, that the party opposed to us were disposed to consider the mercantile part of the community as so many outlaws, unworthy of our protection. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) has now discovered the importance of your merchants, and thinks there ought to be a strong sympathy between them and the Government; for they collect your revenues, and may greatly defraud you, unless you conciliate them by a reasonable attention to their interest. A friend in need, sir, is a friend indeed; and the sympathies of this gentleman and others, ought to have had an ample reason for their exercise on the occasion I allude to; but these benevolent sentiments at that time had no room in their breasts; This navy has re-produced again and again, the reimbursement of its expenses, and in a financial view has been all important. They talk of the direct tax; of their's being the repealing system; of abolishing the internal revenues; and claim great credit that they are enabled to dispense with them. What is the source from whence you derive ten millions of dollars? You must answer, from commerce. What would have become of this revenue, if, according to their system, it had been abandoned to its fate, and no navy created for its protection? What, if, according to them, we had not permitted the merchants to arm their own ships at their own expense? What would have been the resources on which you would rely for the payment of your debt, which they tell us they mean honorably to discharge, without borrowing? and what your means to meet the ordinary expenses of your Government? Alas! but for this navy, and the measures of those whose motives it is so desirable to gentlemen to asperse, instead of repealing your internal revenues, you would have been now under the necessity of increasing them tenfold! We have enabled them to pay the debt, to pay their friends now at the head of affairs, and to repeal the internal taxes, by the protection of our commerce; and whilst they claim all the credit from this measure of repeal, they cease not to villify the only act without which it could not have been accomplished. The only thing to be lamented, sir, is, that the creation of your navy was so long postponed; for otherwise we should not now be called on by your mercantile citizens for a reimbursement of those twenty or thirty millions which have gone into the pockets of French privateersmen.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us have a word or two on the subject of this Executive patronage. My colleague has said, we have looked up to the British monarchy as our prototype, and has read to us a passage from "Blackstone's Commentaries," to prove we have been servilely devoted to the principles therein contained. If he means that there is, and has been a party in this country that believes that the House of Representatives is not the sole depository of power in our Government; but that the Executive is as much the representative of the people for executive purposes, and the Judiciary the agents of the people, for judicial purposes, as we are for Legislative purposes; and that this party has constantly maintained a conflict, for the purpose of preserving to each department the powers which have been delegated to them by the people, against those who have unceasingly exerted themselves to draw all power into the hands of this body; then I confess myself obnoxious to the charge. We have apprehended, on the contrary, that a success on the part of our opponents, in prostrating the Executive power with respect to treaties and foreign intercourse, so often essayed under the former Administration by the friends of the present Executive, and other powers which belong to that department over which this House has hitherto claimed a control; and as we now suppose the prostration of the Judiciary, which will be the inevitable result of this measure, would establish over our free and happy country, a legislative despotism, no less tolerable than the despotism of a monarch. That having broken down the other branches, they would proceed to organize their committees of Interior and Exterior Relations, of War and the Navy, of Finance, and ultimately of Justice; and absorb all the powers of Government in the tremendous vortex of legislation.

Mr. Chairman, the era of Executive patronage is precisely coeval with the commencement of the present Administration; yes, sir, it has been reserved for this Administration to attempt to establish a complete dominion over the heretofore free minds of your Executive officers, and to invade one of the most sacred rights of an American citizen, the right of suffrage! To expect, sir, that any President of this country can ever render himself formidable to our liberties by directly arrogating powers not vested in him by the Constitution, is farical in the extreme. Our ancestors emigrated to this country, when regal prerogative was in its meridian in the mother country; and, persecuted and suffering under the pressure of executive authority, all the jealousies of their descendants are directed to that quarter. But they are not aware of the various shapes which the Legislature may assume, from the indefinite nature of their powers, for the establishment of an unlimited authority. The Executive power is more definite, and the Executive Magistrate in this country who shall ever attempt a struggle with the Legislature, must yield in the conflict. But he may stoop to conquer, and by appearing to submit himself to the will of the Legislature, in order the more completely to govern them, and through them the people, under pretext of economy, or some other pretext, may rule us with an iron rod.

My colleague has said, he has heard of but few removals from office of Executive officers, and those defaulters and old Tories. He has formerly been in the habit of reading newspapers, for I recollect he gave us an account, which he said was taken from a newspaper, at the last session, of a man who died a victim under the Sedition law, who turned out still to be alive; and if he continues to be in the same habit still, he must have seen accounts of twenties and fifties of officers turned out of office, who were of neither of the descriptions alluded to.

Indeed I have known many war-worn soldiers deprived of their offices, but no old Tories. But suppose there were some of them old Tories, if they had been ousted to make room for whigs, there would have been some excuse; but to turn out old Tories to put in old Tories, did not appear to be altogether consistent. [Mr. DENNIS then proceeded to state some instances of this nature, in support of his proposition.]

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) has told us, that the tenure of good behaviour in the judges is only restrictive on the Executive, because it is an exception from the power previously delegated to the President, of displacing all other officers at pleasure. Has he shown us the passage in the Constitution which gives the President this general power of removal? He first supposes the power to exist by express delegation, which is nowhere to be found, and then makes this an exception from it. But he thinks he finds this power in the right of the President to commission all officers; and says, as he is to judge of the nature of the commission, he will of course commission them during his pleasure. Admit, sir, that he possesses this power under the Constitution, (but the truth is he possesses it under a Legislative act,) still it is but a constructive power, and the remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEMPHILL,) that they make one implication assist another implication in bolstering up this authoritative claim, remains unshaken. We have been told by my colleague and others, that the Legislature possesses the same power of creating and putting down courts and the judges, as of dismissing excise officers, and of changing post roads and postmasters; but these gentlemen wholly forget, that in relation to these no restriction on the Legislative power exists with respect to the tenure of their offices; and on this principle the tenure of good behaviour means nothing, and is no restriction whatever. I have, however, said that our opponents claim not only the prerogative of a British monarch, but also the omnipotency of the British Parliament; and as I think I have proved the first, will endeavour to support the second proposition. Here let me add together the different propositions which different gentlemen have advanced, in favor of their claims to legislative supremacy, and let me then resort to Sir Edward Coke's definition of the extent of Parliamentary authority, and I think it will result from the comparisons, that there is scarcely any power contained in the one which is not included in the other. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) says the sovereign power here, as in all other countries it must do, resides in the Legislature. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) supposes we have the same power over the judges as over any other officer. A gentleman from Virginia says one Congress can undo whatever another has done (notwithstanding a Constitutional prohibition to the contrary.) My colleague (Mr. NICHOLSON) says the power of the people is like the sun, original and inherent, and we possess their power as their immediate representatives; and the gentleman from Kentucky has discovered a cure for all difficulties, and with his sweeping clause, tells us Congress have the power of providing for the general welfare, and may do whatever they may choose to declare is for the public good. Now, sir, I will read to you the definition of the powers of the Parliament, and will defy those gentlemen to show me one of the high and mighty prerogatives inherent in that body, which they do not contend for.

[Here Mr DENNIS read, from Blackstone, Sir Edward Coke's definition of the powers of Parliament.]

He then proceeded.—Shall I be told, sir, they do not claim the ecclesiastical power? No, sir, for they are claiming an exemption from all the limitations of the Constitution, and converting it into an unlimited power of legislation. Yes, sir, to complete the catalogue of their unlimited demands, we are told the judges are bound to pocket their oaths, when they are called on to decide between a law and the Constitution, and are bound to yield to the will of Congress declared by law, rather than the will of the people proclaimed through the Constitution; that Congress, the creatures and agents of the people, are greater and more powerful than their creators, the people themselves. Congress, sir, are the attorneys of the people, and to them, the people, who are our principals, have not given an unlimited but a special authority to do certain things, and have expressly forbidden them from doing certain other things. We, however, not only do things not within our commission, but something expressly forbidden, and the judges are called on to decide between the people, their principals, and us, their agents; and we are told they are bound to decide, in this case, in favor of the usurped authority of the agent.

The Constitution declares, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion," &c. Suppose we make a law establishing a national church, and compel persons of every religious denomination to attend that church under a certain penalty. Other sectaries refuse to comply, incur the penalty, and are prosecuted for its recovery. The defendant pleads the Constitution, which is the act of the people and the paramount law, and you say the courts are bound to convict them. Again, "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." I have thought there is a distinction between the freedom and licentiousness of the press, and that, though a man publish what he pleases, if it be not wilfully and maliciously false; if he publish what he knows at the time to be false and malicious, in order to stir up sedition, tumults, and opposition to legitimate authority, he is an offender, and ought to be punished. But suppose, instead of punishing, as did the Sedition act, only malicious falsehood, Congress, in imitation of the Directory and Charles the First, should determine to put down all the presses which they suppose unfavorable to their ambitious views, and declare no man shall publish a newspaper without a previous license from an officer appointed by the Government; and suppose a printer proceed to edit a paper after being refused this license, and he is prosecuted, are the judges bound to convict? They say they are. Then, sir, the judges are the creatures of the Legislature, and not of the people; and whether they belong to us or the people, is the question now between us. Shall they be our judges, and as in England they are said to be the mirror which reflects the image of the King, here reflect our image? If so, instead of being a security to the lives, liberties, and property of the people, they are to be made the engines of party vengeance, and the efficacious weapons of arbitrary and tyrannic power. Charles had his Star Chamber, and Robespierre his Revolutionary Tribunal, and by the sanction which the forms of justice gave to the indulgence of their wicked and vile propensities, they were enabled to veil the acts of oppression which their private animosities and aspiring views might prompt them to execute on suffering innocence. In this country, we may have our Hampdens and our Sidneys, some great characters, whose resplendent talents, whose prominent virtues, may render them obnoxious to the Government, and the united rays of Legislative and Executive indignation may kindle upon them; to what refuge will they fly? Shall I be told, if their estates are confiscated, if Legislative attainders should denounce them as traitors to their country, a Judiciary, the mere creature of the Legislature, is to protect them? Should they be imprisoned by the exertion of usurped authority, shall I be told we have a habeas corpus to bring them and their cause of commitment before the eyes of the public? Your habeas corpus is worse than nothing in the hands of judges, the mere sycophantic minions of Legislative influence. Tell me not I am winging my flight on fancy's pinions; the Constitution has supposed the existence of these abuses, and to say they will not happen is to be wiser than the Constitution. Let us, sir, be more just to that enlightened and patriotic Convention who formed that instrument, than to suppose they meant to guard only against the remoter evils of Executive influence, and leave your Judiciary to the varying dominance of alternate Legislative factions. No, sir, they read of Legislative attainders, Legislative confiscations, and Legislative banishments, and therefore declared, "no bill of attainder, or ex post facto laws, shall be made." Nor were they such mere novices in political science and the knowledge of human nature, as not to know, that these paper restrictions were of little avail without the practical means of giving efficacy to these declarations. And it was for this purpose that they rendered the Judiciary a co-ordinate department of our Government. I can hardly forbear to smile at the ridiculous conceit, when I consider this subject in connexion with the constitution of Maryland. That constitution declares, "the independence of the judges is essential to the upright and impartial administration of justice and a great security to the lives and liberties of the people." Against whom are the judges this security? They answer, only against the Governor. Who is the Governor, and what the extent of his powers? The mere President of a Council, who, together with himself, are annually chosen by the Legislature, and possesses scarcely any attributes of sovereignty, whilst the Legislature are invested with almost unlimited power. Now let me ask our opponents if it be expedient, if it be desirable to any party, that all our political prejudices, our party passions, should mingle themselves in our Judicial tribunals; that causes should not be decided according to their merits, but according to the political principles of the litigants? Spies and delators will swarm around, and hold inquisitions over your courts; and instead of applying to the Executive, as at present, for removals of Executive officers, a base sycophantic tribe will assail us with continual applications for the abolition of offices.—“In a certain cause, a certain judge has abandoned his party and decided in favor of an aristocrat, and has held doctrines incompatible with republicanism; he no longer deserves well of his party, and his office must be abolished, to make room for a more zealous partisan.” Such will be the language of your patriots, and such the result of the principles of the bill before us.

We are about to revive the old system; a system which heretofore has been universally admitted to be defective, but which is now discovered to be susceptible of no amelioration.

Here, sir, I cannot but express my own, and I am sure the world will unite in the expression of their astonishment, that they should declare, that a federal Congress, who never did one solitary thing before which has not called down upon it the reprobation of these gentlemen, should have made on the first experiment, a system involving above all others the most complicated and difficult questions, which is so entirely perfect as that the united republican wisdom of all the departments cannot discover one single amendment. Sir, I cannot believe it, but must suppose that this old system is to be restored, not because it is the most perfect which can be devised, but because it may be more compatible with the views of our opponents to provide for some of their political friends than the one now in existence. It will not do for them to abolish the existing courts, and re-enact them for the purpose of substituting, in the place of the present judges, others of their own political principles. This is too bold a measure even for the enterprising spirit of the majority to attempt. But they may restore the old system, and add a few of their friends to the Supreme Court. But have they answered the objections to that system? Have they refuted the invincible observations of my friend from Delaware, on the oscillation of justice, and the irretrievable injury resulting to suitors, from the constant change of judges, with their predilections for, or their antipathies to the varying practice of different States? No, sir, here little David himself, in the stoutness of his heart, thought proper to shrink from the conflict. Alas! he had now lost both his stone and his sling, found it prudent to fly from the field of battle, and had ample reason to regret his disobedience to the admonition of Saul, for refusing in his eagerness for the combat to bring with him his brazen helmet and his coat of mail. Are they afraid to give this system one year's experiment, lest it should refute their calumnies, and demonstrate to the public that these judges, whom they are pleased to denominate pensioners, will have business enough, and more than they can perform? I will dare predict, sir, that another session shall not have transpired, when they will discover, what everybody now perceives, the defects of this very perfect old system, and improve it by the addition of seven new judges. Can nothing stay the uplifted arm of party vengeance from prostrating our political fabric in the dust? It is in vain that we have with us in opinion the whole choir of Virginia judges, formerly expressed on an analogous occasion; and among these I recognise the names of Pendleton, of Wythe, of Tazewell, of Tucker, of Tyler, and of others, who for the respectability of their legal and political information, are, with our opponents, in high estimation, and all of whom are associated in their political labors with a majority of this Committee. It is vain that the nation is divided, and men of all parties, respectable for their information, contemplate this repeal as aiming a vital blow at the fundamental principles of the federal compact; yes, they have commenced the work, and it must be accomplished. It is equally vain that we recommend to them the perusal of Mr. Jefferson's Notes on Virginia, in which he deplores that in that State all the powers of the Government were resolved into the will of the Legislature; that it had been the intention of the framers of their Constitution, to keep separate the three departments; but as the Judiciary and Executive were left dependent on the Legislature for subsistence, and some of them for their duration in office, the Legislature were daily in the habit of directing them both, in the performance of duties exclusively delegated to those departments. We deplore the circumstance, that by these means there was a consolidation of all power in the hands of the Legislature, which, says he, is precisely the definition of despotism. It does not avail us that they are chosen by ourselves, an elective despotism, says he, was not what we fought for. We are to reject, however, all those high authorities and many others, and all those important considerations, in pursuit of British analogies.

Sir, there are but two alternatives if we abolish this system. You must either increase the number of the judges of the Supreme Court, in which case no money will be saved, or devolve on State authority the execution of your laws. I have always conceived the greatest improvement of this Constitution over the old Confederation, consists in its having the capacity to act on individuals and not on States merely, in their corporate capacity. But we are now to be carried back to that old exploded system, and as we formerly depended upon requisitions for revenue, are now to resort to them for supplies of justice. In case of conflicting laws between the States and the United States, we are to depend on State judges, the dependants of State authority, and the servants of State Legislatures. Here, Mr. Chairman, I find it vain for me to attempt a development of all the different topics. I feel myself greatly exhausted, and I feel for you, sir, and for the Committee. It was my intention to have given a particular detail of the circumstances attending the Presidential election; but I will content myself with a few remarks concerning it, and conclude with them my observations on the bill before you. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) has mentioned this subject for reasons apparent to us all, but from his own statement, that perturbation, and those angry passions with which he would persuade us the act of last session was accompanied, were excited long subsequent to the passage of the bill. He has read to us the journals to show, that when the bill was returned, signed by the President, we were about to proceed to the twenty-sixth ballot. But the bill had originated and passed this House, gone to the Senate and passed through its various forms, before we commenced that operation which excited that ill humor and those party feelings which he attributes to that transaction.

But that gentleman is under a great mistake in point of fact. Yes, I believe the general idea, during that memorable occurrence, was, that we were influenced with all that passion and irritation which party zeal and mutual hatred could inspire, and were tearing each other to pieces, whilst shut up in conclave. Nothing, however, is more remote from the fact. Called on to ballot periodically, and liberated from that rigid confinement to our seats, necessary in the transaction of our ordinary business, we were at liberty to mix together, and indulge ourselves in social intercourse; and since I have been a member of this body, I never saw so much freedom of communication and good nature displayed by gentlemen of different parties, as prevailed on that occasion. I happened to be one of those who were rendered conspicuous from having it in my power to decide the vote of a State. From the moment I knew the two candidates, I did not hesitate to decide that, in my opinion, the interests of the nation would be best promoted in the election of the Vice President. The friends of these gentlemen had presented them to us as equal in their view, and constitutionally they were equally favored with the public will. I did believe there was great doubt on which side the majority of the people preponderated. Almost all those denominated federalists, I did presume, preferred Mr. Burr; and, by adding to them his particular friends in New York and elsewhere, it was problematical, at least, whether he had not with him the major part of the community. One gentleman (Mr. RANDOLPH) has alluded to the blank votes, which from certain States were the evidences of a dereliction of the contest; and has intimated that they were put in from a fear of responsibility, and for purposes of concealment. That gentleman was at the time applying his observations to the gentleman from Delaware, and it is wonderful he did not perceive that as he (Mr. BAYARD) was sole Representative from the State, that object would not have been effected. It is a notorious fact, however, that before the ballot, it was known by the whole delegation of Maryland, and of other States, who put in the blanks, and to all those who sat in the vicinity of them, that this was the mode in which the contest was to be abandoned. Our reasons for this mode are best known to ourselves. I have no particular objection to explain them, however, had they any application to the subject before us. I will now conclude, though I have not exhausted the observations which I had to make on this subject, and with great cheerfulness resume my seat.

Mr. S. SMITH.—The question, Mr. Chairman, is not whether it was the President or Vice President of the United States whom the people meant should preside over the affairs of the Union. The question is not whether Bonaparte ought to have detached the right wing of the army of Egypt to this country, in order to verify the fears of certain gentlemen. The question is not whether the President was justifiable in selecting for the high offices of Government, men eminent for their talents, men distinguished for their republican principles, for their abhorrence of the system heretofore pursued, and friends to a system which the people had, by their late elections, strongly marked as that which they wished to be adopted. The question is not whether Mr. Charles Pinckney, who signed the Constitution of the United States, a gentleman always high in the confidence of the citizens of South Carolina, whom they had twice elected their Governor; whose services were so highly approved, that immediately after his last term as Governor had expired, the Legislature of that State had chosen a Senator of the United States, was or was not a bad character. The question is not whether Mr. Edward Livingston, whose shining talents are well known to members in this House, had discovered some new merit that had induced the President to believe him fit for the post of District Attorney. No, sir; the question is, shall the first section of the bill (now on your table) to repeal the act entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," be struck out? This subject, Mr. S. said, had been very properly divided into two parts, the one the constitutionality, the other the expediency of the measure.

To prove that Congress have not the power to repeal the law in question, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEMPHILL) has favored the Committee with his observations, nor had he, Mr. S. since heard anything on the Constitutional point that had not been embraced by the speech of that gentleman. He had been fully answered in a very luminous speech by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) and very ably by the other gentlemen on the same side of the question. It will not, Mr. Chairman, be expected that one whose pursuits in life have not been professional, will attempt to expound the Constitution to this enlightened body, even if he had the power. Mr. SMITH said he would not be able to find one idea not already presented to the House by gentlemen who had preceded him. He hoped, however, that he would be permitted to say, that in that House, in the Senate, nay, throughout the United States, gentlemen learned in the law were divided on this question. Did this division arise solely from a collision of sentiments? Or did it arise from the line which divides the parties of this nation? Wherever he looked he found the professional gentlemen of one party (with a few exceptions) giving their decided opinion one way, and those of the other directly the reverse. How then are men not professional to form their opinions on this great and important question? He knew but one way; that was, to read the Constitution with care, with attention, and to judge for themselves. This, Mr. S. said, he had done, and he had no hesitation in saying, on the oath he had taken, that Congress had the Constitutional power to pass the bill on your table. In this opinion he was warranted not only by the opinions expressed in this House, but by men highly respected for their talents, integrity, and enlightened understanding, in the different States. He had seen the opinion of a great law character in Massachusetts; he had understood it also to be the opinion of a gentleman in Connecticut, not inferior to any in the bar of that State. He knew it to be the opinion of gentlemen of the very first legal abilities in the State of New York. It was unquestionably the opinion of some of the legal characters, the most eminent at the bar of Philadelphia; and the letter read yesterday had shown it to be the opinion of the greatest law character in that State (he meant the Governor) that Congress had the Constitutional right to repeal the law in question. In the State of Maryland, Mr. S. said, many gentlemen, learned in the law, concurred with him in opinion on this important subject. One gentleman of high federal authority had told him, that he had no hesitation in saying, that Congress had the Constitutional right to repeal the law of the last session, but that Congress were bound to provide for the payment of the judges' salaries. This opinion, high in authority, concurs fully in the power of the Constitutional right Congress has to pass the bill before you. The providing for the judges' salaries will be an after consideration. Congress may hereafter determine whether men rendering no service ought to be paid out of the public treasury. He might, he said, go through the States southward, and quote the opinions of gentlemen equally eminent for their talents and ability, confirming the one he had formed, but this he conceived would be unnecessary.

When the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) had quoted the statutes of Great Britain, he did not understand him to give them a preference over the Constitution under which we act. On the contrary, he quoted them to show, that although the judges were removable by a joint vote of Parliament to the King, yet that it had never been said that the judges of England were not sufficiently independent; their complete independence has been admitted by gentlemen here, and has been the glory and boast of Englishmen. An instance of that independence had been given in their conduct in the case of Wilkes, read (with a contrary view) by the gentleman from South Carolina. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) meant to show, and in his opinion did show, that if the judges of England had been deemed independent for ages, although removable by a joint address of Parliament, that the judges of the United States were much more so, when, agreeable to his construction of the Constitution, they were not removable in any way but by impeachment, or when the courts in which they presided were deemed by the three branches of the Legislature to be useless and unnecessary. The gentleman (Mr. GILES) stated emphatically, that the judges were not removable from office, either by the President, or by the two Houses of Congress. But he contended, and with great force, that the power which had organized new courts, could constitutionally put them down. In answer to this, the gentleman from Delaware had said, and seemed to rely much on the observation that it is truly paradoxical, that the body having the power to check, should be at the feet of the body to be checked. The gentleman from Delaware has himself favored the Committee with a solution of this paradox; for he has said, that by the Constitutions of Delaware and Pennsylvania, judges in office during good behaviour may be removed by a joint address of two thirds of both branches of the Legislature to the Governor. On such address the Governor cannot refuse to remove. Here then the gentleman has himself shown, that the judges of Delaware and Pennsylvania, having the power to check by declaring a law unconstitutional, can be brought to the feet of the body checked, to wit, the Legislature, who can, by a joint address, cause them to be dismissed; yet those judges are quoted by the gentleman himself, as being completely independent. Will the gentleman from Delaware say, that the judges of that State are as secure in their offices as the judges of the United States, under the construction of the Constitution assumed by the majority? He certainly will not. The gentleman from Delaware has said, that worse men will probably succeed the present majority, who will repeal the Judiciary laws, and re-enact them immediately, for the express purpose of dismissing the judges; and this, he says, has been done in Maryland. In that State, the gentleman said, they had repealed their Judiciary law for the avowed purpose of dismissing certain judges obnoxious to their politics, and re-enacted the same law without making one solitary amendment. The gentleman was totally mistaken. The fact is, that many valuable amendments had been made.

His colleague (Mr. DENNIS) had also said, that the gentleman who had introduced the bill to repeal the judiciary law of Maryland, had avowed that his sole object was, the dismissal of the judges. Suppose this to be the fact, does it prove that the law was passed with that view? No, sir, the law would not have passed, had there not been many and very beneficial amendments introduced into it. Mr. S. said, he believed that this was not the first attempt made in Maryland. His colleague, (Mr. DENNIS,) would remember an attempt to put down the General Court, and make the judges ride the circuits to each county; lest however he should have forgotten, he would remind him that the gentleman who had proposed putting down the court, had likened it to a faro table. His colleague will probably recollect that he was himself the prime mover in that attempt. His colleague, (Mr. DENNIS,) had read a part of the Bill of Rights of Maryland, and said, he could not but smile when he heard a gentleman from that State (Mr. NICHOLSON) endeavoring to destroy the independence of the judges, in direct violation of the Bill of Rights of his own State. Had this gentleman read farther, he would have found that a judge of Maryland "holding his office during good behaviour" may be removed by a vote of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature. Is their security in office, Mr. S. asked, equal to that of the judges of the United States? And yet his colleague would not say, that the judges of Maryland were not independent. Mr. S. then said, that although unequal to the discussion of the Constitutional question, yet he hoped he might be permitted to judge of the expediency of the measure. It had been objected to the old Judiciary system, that men, venerable for their years, were unequal to the labor of travelling from one end of the United States to the other to hold their courts; he would admit that two of the judges of the Supreme Court were advanced in life, but he could not admit that the other four were; they were all younger than himself. But he asked, why did the judges ride? They were not compelled by law. It was optional with themselves, under the first law, to have divided the circuits, so as each should have taken that circuit most convenient to himself, nor is there anything in that law as it now exists to prevent them. Why did the judges not make such a division? Perhaps, he said, they might have had a desire to see the country, and proposed riding, or it may be that a mode so troublesome might be expected to promote the favorite object of confining their duties to their holding the Supreme Court only. If that was their object, they fully succeeded by the passage of the Judiciary bill, now meant to be repealed. When the present bill has passed, it will be fully in our power (and he would not vote for its passage, if he was not perfectly assured that it would be done) to introduce a bill amending the old system, so as that each judge of the Supreme Court shall have his particular circuit designated, at which he shall preside. For instance, the United States may be divided into seven circuits; the first circuit to include New Hampshire and Massachusetts, where Judge Cushing may preside, his associate judges to be the district judges of those two States. The second circuit to include Vermont, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, where Judge Patterson may preside, and his associates may be taken from the district judges of those States. The third circuit to include New York and New Jersey, where Judge Marshall may preside, and be associated with the district judges. The fourth circuit to include Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, at which Judge Chase may preside. The fifth to include Virginia and North Carolina, at which Judge Washington may preside. The sixth to include South Carolina and Georgia, at which Judge Moore might preside. The seventh to include Kentucky and Tennessee, which may be conducted as it now is, or it may return to the ancient system, or a new judge of the Supreme Court may be appointed to preside there, as gentlemen from those States may conceive will best answer the interests of their fellow-citizens. On this plan, the objections of the gentleman from Delaware (to wit: that three judges had, all coming in turn to one court, decided differently on the same case.) will be avoided. This system will satisfy the bar of Philadelphia, for it will secure to them a court in the same manner as it now is held, with the additional dignity of having at its head one of the Supreme Judges of the United States; and it will obviate the objection made on account of the judges travelling; none of the gentlemen will have more riding than what will conduce to their health; and above all, it will avoid that want of uniformity in decisions, which must result out of the present system. It has been observed that more speedy justice is had in the courts of the United States than in the State courts, and therefore strangers would prefer going into them. It is true, Mr. S. said, that this had been the case, when the judges of the supreme courts presided in the circuit courts, but not so now. He spoke only of Maryland: in the last circuit court held in that State, a rule was adopted and established, by which it requires the same time to obtain judgment in that court, as it does in the General Court of Maryland. Here, then, is an essential difference already commenced in the manner of conducting our courts. For instance, a citizen of Maryland sues a citizen of Pennsylvania in the circuit court of that State, and recovers the first or second court; the same citizen of Pennsylvania brings a suit in the circuit of Maryland, and to his astonishment he will find his recovery procrastinated from year to year, perhaps for four years; thus the plaintiff is greatly injured, so far as relates to the State of Maryland by the new system. Let us go back, he said, to the ancient system, and we may then expect an uniformity in the courts throughout the Union.

FEBRUARY, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

Mr. S. then said, that he would take leave to remark on some of the observations made by gentlemen in the course of the debate. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) had taken a very masterly view of the measures pursued from the commencement of the Government, which, in his opinion, led towards monarchy; he criminated the views of none, but showed that such measures, had they been pursued, would have gone to the destruction of our republican form of Government; he terminated this view by showing that the Judiciary law was passed the last session by an expiring party, not as a shield to protect them, but as a strong arm (to which they willed all power) held over the Administration, always uplifted, and ready to thwart, perplex, and strike the Government. And has not the gentleman from Delaware fully warranted this opinion, when he said that the judges ought to be of a different opinion from the Legislative and Executive branches? For those two, he said, will always come into power with the same sentiments and at the same time. Is it not fair then to conclude, from this candid declaration, that the law which gentlemen from the Federal party would not themselves permit to pass in 1800, when they retained the power, they did pass in 1801, when they knew that all power had been taken from them? Is it not fair to conclude that the law was passed for the sole purpose of embarrassing the new Administration, by a new corps of men, clothed with omnipotent power, and hostile towards it? And is it not just, is it not right, to repeal a law passed with views so wicked? It has been said by the gentleman from Delaware, that he never did hear a Federal man even hint the most distant wish towards a consolidation of these States. He could not doubt the gentleman's veracity; but he would say, that he (Mr. S.) had been warned by a Federal gentleman against the Judiciary bill, when introduced in 1800; he had been then told that this was considered as an entering wedge, and that the Federalists hoped, if they succeeded, to be able to establish courts in every county of the States; that it was believed causes would be more speedily decided in courts of the United States than in the State courts; that State courts would first be neglected and afterwards deserted, then declared useless, and thus, step by step, we should be led to a national Government. But he did not mean to say that such was the opinion of all the Federal party; he would indeed be sorry to think it was.

Objections had been made to the President for presenting the document No. 8. It had been said that he had no right to send that document; that it was officious. This, Mr. S. said, was a doctrine entirely new to him. The President might send documents relative to every other subject, but he must not peep into the courts; and why? Because it is said that no other President ever did furnish a judicial document. And here, Mr. S. said, he could but express his regret that the last President had not (when he pressed the law upon Congress) supplied such documents; if he had, every gentleman would then have seen how unnecessary the law was, and no member would have been bold enough to have proposed the creation of sixteen new judges, with salaries of two thousand dollars per annum, when it would have been palpable there was no business for the six judges then in commission.

Mr. S. said, that of all the abuse poured out in this House, or in public prints, to sully the fair fame of the Chief Magistrate of the Union, none had so much surprised him as that which had just fallen from his colleague (Mr. DENNIS.) What spirit was it that could induce a gentleman so mild to enter into such unqualified abuse of the President, and through him of gentlemen in private life, and in public employ, by name? The gentleman had, contrary to all order, attacked the Governor of Virginia; he had charged Judge Stevens, of Georgia, with having deserted to the enemy. For this he has been severely checked by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. MILLEDGE,) who declared that information to be a malicious calumny against a man who more than once fought in his country's cause, and ultimately was taken a prisoner; as an apology his colleague (Mr. DENNIS) said he had his information from the Washington Federalist. His colleague had charged the President with turning out an old and meritorious officer, the late Navy Agent of New York, and appointing an old tory in his room; here his colleague had again been mistaken. The President has nothing to do with the appointment of the Navy Agents; they are appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, and by him considered as a merchant, doing business on commission. Of the high respectability of Mr. Ludlow, as a merchant and an honest man, no person, would express a doubt; of his predecessor he would say nothing; a suit was now depending between him and the United States; until that was determined it would be highly improper to give an opinion of his conduct anywhere, but at all times improper, by name, in this House. His colleague had heard of hundreds of meritorious officers turned out of office without fault, and this he also got from newspapers. Mr. S. doubted whether there were five turned out of office on political ground. If gentlemen really wished for information, why an officer had been put out, let them apply to the proper office and they will be informed. He (Mr. S.) had done so; in the case of the Collector of Savannah he did so, because he had seen several names (which he knew) to an address to that gentleman, highly censuring the President for his dismissal; on inquiry he had found that the collector was not dismissed on political ground, but because he had never settled one single account from the time of his appointment, although the law is peremptory that every collector of the customs shall settle his accounts every quarter of a year. Let gentlemen inquire and they will find that there has been good cause for most of the removals. But they will not inquire. It is better for men disposed to calumniate the Administration to take newspapers than official information. Mr. S. again inquired what spirit of faction was it that could induce a gentleman so amiable in private life, to permit himself to assail gentlemen by name under the privilege of that House? His colleague stumbled on the case of the Berceau, and charged the President with expending the public money on that ship without authority. Does he mean to insinuate that the President is prodigal of the public treasure? If he does, nobody will believe him. How is the fact? The late Secretary of the Navy directed on the nineteenth of December, eighteen hundred, that the Berceau should be purchased for the United States; the same gentleman directed that she should be restored under the treaty, with all her guns, ammunition, apparel, and everything belonging to her; that the delivery should be made as if there was no reluctance accompanying the restoration, and in such manner that no cause of complaint should lie against the Government or its agents. And conformably with the opinion and advice of the late Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Stoddert, a letter was written on the first of April (the day after that gentleman resigned) in the following words, to wit:

"I have to request that you will be pleased to ascertain, without delay, the state of the French national ship Le Berceau was in at the time of her capture, as to her armament, stores and provisions, and to cause her to be put in the same condition before she is delivered to the French Government."

He knew the amount of repairs must appear large; but he had such high confidence in the Navy Agent of Boston, that he would not believe one dollar had been spent improperly. The ship having been bought for the use of the United States, the appropriation for the navy (of which she then was one) fully covered the money expended. His colleague (Mr. DENNIS) in a triumphant manner had boasted that near four millions of the principal of the public debt had been paid off against the year 1798. If there was credit assumed for paying less than four millions in nine years, how much more is due to the present Administration which in nine months had paid off two millions two hundred and seventy-nine thousand dollars of the principal of the debt, and had then remaining as much money in the Treasury as had been received from the late Administration? It will perhaps, he said, give his colleague pleasure to know that at least four millions more of the principal of the debt will be paid off in the course of 1802. Our constituents, he believed, will be better pleased with the payment of the old debt, than the contracting of a new debt at an interest of eight per cent. His colleague had asked, who was it that talked of the merchants as outcasts of society, as men not worthy of protection? Mr. S. in return, asked who ever did? No person had in that House during the present session; and before this session, he had never known gentlemen of any party so far forgot themselves as to go into unqualified abuse of men by name. He had known on former occasions the measures attacked, but never the men. That conduct was left for the friends of order to assume.

Mr. S. said that, during his absence for a few minutes from the House, he had been told that a gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RUTLEDGE) had charged the President with having thrown away thirty-two thousand dollars in the expenses of sending a gentleman to France, in the frigate Maryland. In this charge the gentleman was unfortunate. He had stated the cost at thirty-two thousand dollars: the real cost of the voyage was but seventeen thousand four hundred and twenty-eight dollars, as appeared by a statement which he read. How was the fact? The Maryland was prepared by an order of the last President, and was actually held in readiness from the beginning of February, to sail at a moment's notice with a Minister for France. Her crew was on board, and the ship was anchored below the fort.

The Maryland being prepared, it would have been the height of folly not to have sent the treaty by her. Suppose a messenger had been sent by a private ship, and she had been met by a British ship-of-war or privateer, is it not certain that she would have been detained? And would not the gentleman from South Carolina, in such case, have censured the President for an ill-judged economy? Would not the merchants very properly have complained at the delay occasioned thereby to the restoration of their ships? These circumstances, he presumed, had induced the President to direct the Secretary of the Navy, on the 17th of March, to order the Maryland to proceed with the gentleman who was bearer of the treaty.

Mr. S. then read the President's letter to Mr. Stoddert, the Secretary of the Navy, in which were the following words: "The gentleman who is the bearer of the treaty is of course to have good accommodations in the vessel, and a participation of such fare as is provided for the officers themselves."

Observe, said Mr. S., that particular expense on account of the bearer of the treaty was actually forhid.

The gentleman from South Carolina had also (if he had been rightly informed) been unfortunate when he said that an enormous expense had been incurred by sending the Boston to carry Mr. Livingston to France. The Boston was considered as one of the six ships peremptorily ordered by law to be kept in constant service. She was bound on a cruise to join the Mediterranean squadron, called at New York for Mr. Livingston, and on her route landed him at L'Orient, the nearest port in France. This cost the United States only the short delay of the ship; for Mr. Livingston found his sea-stores at his own expense. Under the late President the sea-stores of Ministers and Envoys were found, when on board a ship-of-war, at the public expense, and seldom cost less than one thousand five hundred dollars—sometimes much more.

[Here Mr. RUTLEDGE assured Mr. SMITH that he had not mentioned the Boston, and Mr. S. had been misinformed by his friend.]

Mr. S. then said, that he had no doubt of the constitutionality of the repeal, nor any of its expediency, and therefore should give his vote against striking out the first section, and in favor of the bill.

When Mr. S. had concluded, a motion was made that the Committee should rise, which was supported by Messrs. HILL, HUGER, DANA, BAYARD, MACON, HOLLAND, GRISWOLD, BACON, CLAIBORNE, and PLATER; and opposed by Messrs. ALSTON, GILES, and SMILE.

At eight o'clock the question was taken—yeas 46, nays 43.

The Committee rose, and asked leave to sit again; on granting which there was a division—yeas 48, nays 37.

MONDAY, March 1.

A memorial of Stephen Sayre was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will consider and decide on the petitions heretofore presented by the memorialist, relative to an adequate compensation for his services and expenses as Secretary to the Commissioners of the United States at the Court of Versailles, in the year seventeen hundred and seventy-seven.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of Claims.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee on the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. HILL said the few observations he had to make he would have offered before to the Committee could he have done so without interfering with other gentlemen better qualified to do justice to the subject.

The best exertions of his humble talents would at all times prove unequal to a question of such magnitude as the one under consideration. Vain indeed then must prove the attempt after the subject had been so well considered, and the arguments so entirely exhausted.

He had determined to express his opinion by his vote merely. He lamented the impulse which obliged him to forego that determination—an impulse created by allusions too direct to be mistaken.

His respect for the Legislature of the State from which he came also required he should assign his reasons for the conduct he should pursue. That Legislature had recommended to the Representatives of that State to vote in conformity to the bill on the table. However great his respect for that Legislature—however much he was inclined to obey its requisition—yet, when he found that respect conflicting with important duties—when those requisitions are opposed to obligations, sacred obligations, which imperiously direct another course, he could not hesitate in his decision. His conduct must be consistent; he voted for the law proposed to be repealed under the full persuasion that it was expedient; he could not vote for the repeal, because he was equally persuaded it was inexpedient; because he did not consider himself authorized so to vote. He stated that when he came into Congress, he came with the conviction full on his mind, that the Judiciary was a distinct, important, independent branch of the Government; that to be efficient it ought to be well organized; that the then organization was defective, greatly so; that he knew from experience it was greatly defective; having been for several years an officer of the United States, in their established courts, he had an opportunity of acquiring this knowledge by experience; that to a reform of the then existing system, the only alternative which presented itself was a resort to the courts of the several States. Considering it a solecism in the science of Government, that one Government should intrust the administration of its laws to the officers of another, over whom it had no control; believing that no responsibility attached to the State judiciaries, which would oblige them to perform duties imposed on them by the General Government, and knowing the jealousy of the State governments, which had been frequently evidenced against an amalgamation of National and State authorities, the necessity of a reform presented itself with great force.

The circuit courts, as formerly established, were directed to be holden by the judges of the Supreme Court, and the district judges in their respective districts. By this arrangement six judges were required to ride over this vast country twice in each year; to hold courts as often in every State, and this in addition to the duties required of them as judges of the Supreme Court; the consequence was, that with all their exertions these judges found themselves unequal to the performance of those duties; and nothing but a reliance on the wisdom of Congress, which cherished the hope of a new arrangement, retained them in office. Under that establishment the lapse of terms would unavoidably occur; it did occur frequently, and occasioned great injury to all concerned in the courts. Another evil was the want of identity, and the resulting want of consistency of decision in those courts—productive of delays and uncertainties, which could not fail to depreciate the character of the Judiciary, however upright and independent the judges—that was an important defect also which allowed the same judge to decide on your appeal, who had pronounced judgment in your cause in the inferior court. These and many other important reasons, which had been or might be adduced, had decided his mind in favor of a reformation in the Judiciary system. Accordingly, in the first session of the sixth Congress, he had given his vote for a more convenient organization of the courts of the United States, and in the last session he pursued the same course. Actuated by a wish to promote the due administration of justice, to elevate the character of the American Judiciary, and to insure the independence of the judges, as the safeguard of the Constitution, he had invariably given his support to the law proposed to be repealed; he believed it to be expedient; he was satisfied it was Constitutional; he still had the same impressions; and when he added, that not a doubt existed in his mind that a violation of the Constitution is involved in the proposed repeal, he should be justified in voting as he should vote on the present occasion. But, sir, it is said that the Constitution has already been violated; that the law proposed to be repealed violated the Constitution; that this assertion was groundless, Mr. H. apprehended, had been clearly demonstrated. But suppose it was fact, would that justify a second violation? He knew that in some languages it was taught that two negatives made an affirmative; but he had yet to learn the principle in morals which establishes that two wrongs will make one right. If gentlemen really believe the Constitution has been violated, let it be to them an example to deter; let us unite our efforts to heal the wound, and join in deprecating the attempt that would enlarge it. But how has the Constitution been violated? By detaching, it is said, from the judges of the Supreme Court, and the district judges, the right of holding the circuit courts; let us examine this. It will be recollected, that previous to the law of last session there was no circuit judge; the duties of the circuit court were imposed on the judges of the Supreme Court and the district judges; to relieve those judges from this imposition was one object of that law; another object was to make an arrangement that should not require the judges to perform greater duties than they were able to perform. Is it not a strange doctrine that the lessening the burdens of office, the diminution of the duties required to be performed by a judge should be considered as an infraction of his rights? But the last law imposed on some of the judges other duties, which might be considered in lieu of some of those from the performance of which they were relieved; for instance, by certain provisions in the law, the judge of North Carolina district is required to hold nine district courts in each year, and at three places in the district; previously he held but four district courts, and those at the same place; that judge might have supposed himself aggrieved by these provisions of that law; but it had not been suggested that he considered his rights infringed by being relieved from other duties. As he was instrumental in making this arrangement, as to the courts of that district, Mr. H. hoped he might be indulged in explaining the reasons which had induced him to think these provisions necessary, and as the law on the table went to their repeal, he should not be considered out of order. The State of North Carolina has an immense extent of seacoast. The chief seaports are Edenton, Newbern, and Wilmington. The first and the last are at the distance of two hundred miles the one from the other; Newbern about one hundred miles from each. The residence of the judge is the interior of the country, near two hundred miles from Wilmington, the place of most trade, and about one hundred miles from each of the other ports; the objects of the jurisdiction of the district courts are chiefly causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The court to be useful and convenient could only be made so by bringing the judge, at fixed periods of time, to the commercial points of his district. The difficulty of instituting a suit in the district court of North Carolina, and the inconvenience of attending it there, amounted nearly to a prohibition of the process of individuals; and, Mr. H. said, he knew demands had been relinquished and claims abandoned rather than encounter these obstacles. For these reasons the provisions on this subject were introduced into the last law, at his motion. And although much benefit may not yet have been experienced by the new arrangement, he had no doubt that great advantage would result therefrom eventually; he stated that he had been informed, at a late term of one of those courts, near thirty suits had been instituted. He was thus furnished with another reason against the bill on the table; for an amendment which should retain the benefit of these provisions of the last law was inhibited by the consideration that the imposition of duty would thereby be too great on the judge of that district, who will have the duties of the circuit court again imposed on him. Mr. H. had listened with great attention, and weighed with due deliberation all the arguments which had been offered on this important question; his conviction of the inexpediency and unconstitutionality of the proposed repeal was thereby enforced. When he found the best argument, the one most relied on by the advocates of the repeal, on the Constitutional point, was derived from a distinction, a fancied distinction—a distinction without a difference, between a removal of a judge from office and the taking away the office from a judge; when it is acknowledged on all hands that we have no power to remove the judge from office; yet it is held that the thing may be effected by taking the office from the judge; he must be excused in declaring his belief that such arguments, analyze or examine them as you will, whether opposed by "boys" or contested by men, would alike be found to be but "shadows" indeed.

He considered the Judicial power of the United States as a vested power—a power vested in the judges constitutionally appointed; it is vested by the Constitution and cannot be taken away by law. It was vested by the people in the majesty of their power, and cannot be divested by any power inferior to that of the people in the exercise of their sovereignty.

The Constitution declares that "the Judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The Constitution arranges the different branches of Government; to each department a distinct article is appropriated, vesting power and defining its limitation. By the first article the Legislative power is vested in the Congress of the United States, subject to a limited veto of the President. By the second article the Executive power is vested in the President of the United States; and the third article vests the Judicial power in the judges of the United States, who "shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." The three branches of Government are thus made distinct and independent of each other. By what authority is it that one or two departments can put down the third department? Where is it to be found? Is it found by construction? Then construction makes it as competent for the judge and the Legislature to declare they have the right to divest the President of the Executive power, as the Legislature or the Executive, or both, to declare they have the right to divest the judges of the Judicial power. To his mind it appeared clear and certain that no such right as the one claimed did exist.

The members of both branches of the Legislature and the President are periodically elected, and their continuance in office limited and defined by the Constitution; they depend on the people in the exercise of their elective franchise for their continuance in office. The judges, who are to hold their offices so long as they behave well, depend only on God and their own conduct for their continuance in office.

"The judges shall hold"—What? "Their offices," says the Constitution. How then can the assertion be sustained that the Constitution is not infringed, when that is taken from the judge which the Constitution declares the judges shall hold? Has not the taking the office from the judge precisely the same operation as the removal of the judge from office? Surely this will not be denied. Is not then the provision in the Constitution as certainly contravened by the one as the other procedure? The framers of the Constitution appear to have been jealous, anxiously jealous, of an interference with the independence of the judges; not satisfied with guarding them from a direct removal from office, they endeavored to provide against indirect means whereby the removal might be effected, hence the provision which forbids a diminution of the salary of a judge. But, say gentlemen, compensation has a relation to services so intimate, that unless one is performed the other shall not be paid; that when the office is abolished, no service can be performed; consequently no compensation is demandable, and thus the difficulty is avoided. This, to be sure, is a most convenient kind of casuistry; an argument not expected to be heard in this House; subterfuges which could not fail to attach disgrace on individuals, surely must be unworthy of Government. To what does the argument amount? Does it amount to more than this? (asked Mr. H.) I engage a man for a stipulated sum to perform for me a certain service, and while, in pursuance of his contract, he is engaged in the work, in order to avoid the payment of the sum stipulated, I disable him from performing the service; would this be warrantable? could I justify it? Most unquestionably no. It is of the highest importance the judges should be independent; they are intended to stand between the Legislature and the Constitution, between the Government and the people; they are intended to check the Legislature. Should the Legislature even surmount the barrier of the Constitution, it is the duty of the judges to repel it back within the bounds which limit its power. Were they not independent, would they be equal to this duty? Could they perform it—dare they perform it, if on the Legislature they were dependent? But, it is said, with a Government of responsibilities like ours the uncontrollable power of the judges is incompatible. Sir, no such power is claimed for the judges; their office and duty is to prevent the exercise of unauthorized power; they are not without responsibility; they may be controlled; the Constitution provides the means. The tenure of their office is their good behaviour; when that ceases their term expires; and whether they behave well or ill, it is not for them, but the Legislature, to judge and decide. And here is the Constitutional check on the judges; this House may impeach, and the Senate evict from office a judge. If he behave ill, a judge may thus be removed, and the Legislature is restrained from an unwarrantable use of this power by its own responsibilities. Mr. H. declared himself without a doubt on the Constitutional point in question.

Much had been said concerning the manner in which the law proposed to be repealed had been passed. A gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES), who had been up early in the debate, had taken occasion to mention by name certain Senators, and alleged that their votes carried this law. A recurrence to the Journals of that day would show the fact to be otherwise, unless the gentleman meant to suggest, that the votes of those Senators would have been the reverse of what they were but for the prospect of their subsequent appointments. He would not suppose the gentleman intended this—it would be attaching on the characters of those Senators motives too corrupt for that gentleman to charge on others in their absence. The same gentleman, with great emphasis, has marked the time when the Presidential approbation of this law was announced to this House, the 13th day of February, when this House was engaged in the choice of President! And then the gentleman directs his attention to the circumstance of some of the members of this House being afterwards appointed to office. As to the time when this approbation was announced, whether combined or not with the circumstance of the subsequent appointments, Mr. H. declared his incapacity to discover what impression the gentleman thereby intended to make. He could not have supposed it had any influence on the passage of the bill, for that was a retrospective relation which could not exist. Did the gentleman mean to suggest it had, or was intended to have, any influence on the pending election? This was a suggestion unfounded. It was never understood, at least within his knowledge, that the late President directly or indirectly interfered with this House in the choice of his successor; nor did he ever hear that the late President espoused the cause of either the one or the other of the candidates for the suffrages of the States in this House; equally difficult is it to discover the relationship which the subsequent appointments bear to the subject of that election. Wherefore were those appointments mentioned? Did the gentleman mean to suggest that the members of this House, who were distinguished by the President in his subsequent nominations, were actuated by the prospect or promise of such appointments? He was unwilling to believe the gentleman did; such a suggestion would be unworthy any man who did not feel himself liable to be actuated by such motives; and should such suggestions be made, existing facts would not sustain it; the conduct of the members alluded to would prove it to be groundless, and the majority in this House on that occasion was too decided to countenance a belief that such means could be necessary.

Other members on this occasion and other occasions had undertaken to make their allusions, to express their insinuations on the subject of these appointments—discovering a disposition to ascribe improper motives to gentlemen on this floor. Mr. H. said, for his part, he was no motive monger, and although gentlemen differed from him in political sentiments, he was inclined to appreciate properly their views; they were as much entitled to suppose themselves correct as he was; and he was willing to believe that gentlemen generally were disposed to do right. He would, however, caution those members who are inclined to criminate, to be certain before they did so that the means of recrimination were not at hand. He might say, that inducements to put down the present judges, were to be found in the wishes of gentlemen to advance themselves, or to make places for their friends on the bench of the United States. He might say, that the proposed repeal had numerous advocates, because it was a measure which emanated from the Executive; because his smiles are courted; his favor hoped for; his power to grant appointments regarded. He might also say, that "if republicanism," as it is called, "did leave this House when the British Treaty came into it," that treaty had brought into this House many foes to the Constitution; for the energies of that Government, which enforces the payments of debts long withheld, are not likely to find friends or admirers among the coerced debtors; these things he might say.

He would not, however, make the charges, because it was possible they might not be well founded. He disdained such motives himself, and reprobated the practice of imputation too sincerely to pursue it.

Mr. H. would inform the other gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) who had alluded to a gentleman from North Carolina on that floor as a commissioned judge, that the member alluded to never had such commission presented to him—of course he had never the opportunity to accept or reject it; he apprehended that it would be admitted that the acceptance of a commission was necessary to make an officer, and that member held his seat here by an authority equal to that by which the seat of any other member was held; the free suffrages of a large and respectable majority of the freemen of the district he represents is his authority. The gentleman from Virginia has certainly been greatly misinformed as to the member from North Carolina. If he alluded to the same member, when he assimilated certain characters as to their political tendencies to that of his Pensacola Hero, his informer had grossly deceived him. The fact or sentiment of an anti-revolutionary adherence to the enemies of his country never had attached, nor ever could attach, on the character of the member alluded to. The fact was directly the reverse; that member had not ceased to lament that his ability had not equalled his inclination to serve his country in her glorious contest for liberty and independence; during that time he was but a boy; the only one of his family who was able, did share in the toils, the perils, and the glory of the contest, and was found among those who gathered laurels at the springs of Eutaw.

The gentleman from Virginia was also mistaken as to the fortuitous circumstances relating to the salary of the district judge of North Carolina, at the last session. That was not a fortuitous occurrence; it was designed; that gentleman's friend from North Carolina was one of a committee appointed to report on the salaries of the officers; and, as Mr. H. had understood, opposed in the committee the measure of augmentation generally, and especially the increase of the salary of the North Carolina judge, and as to that judge prevailed in the committee. In the House, to the surprise of his co-members of the committee, the same member moved an amendment to their report whereby that judge's salary should be included among those which were to be increased; the design was obvious; the circumstances being known, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. H. said the member alluded to lamented not that he possessed the good opinion of the late administrations; it was his pride to have been so distinguished. The suggestion was unfounded, which had been made by some, that favoritism was exemplified by the appointment of that member by the late President. The relationship of affinity or any consanguinity between the President or any part of his family and that member did not exist, he had not that honor; but he had filled an office before in the same department, under a commission conferred by the first President. To have been thus distinguished by the preceding Presidents, that member considered as highly honorable to himself. But it seems sufficient reason with some to excite their irritation and display their irascibility; the motives and feelings of that member are therefore to be assailed; the victim is to be sacrificed; and the means are disregarded by which the offering is to be made; the well turned period of pointed invective, the gross terms of mere vulgarity, the keen knife of the skilful surgeon, or the edgeless tool of the clumsy operator, are instruments alike acceptable. But he would take leave to say, that the character of that member is fortified by a barrier of integrity which defies the malice and machinations of his enemies; happily possessed of mens conscia recta, he disregards the imputations which have been made; thus shielded, the shafts of malice however directed, fall harmless at his feet, or are repelled with accumulated force on those who cast them. Mr. H. concluded with expressions of regret that he had exhausted any part of the time of the Committee in observations extraneous to the subject under consideration; but impelled as he had been he hoped to be excused; he would return to the question before the Committee, and close his remarks with one additional observation; that, believing as he did believe, the essence of civil liberty to be security, and that this blessing would only be insured to ourselves and to our posterity by the government of laws directly administered by upright and independent judges, it was his duty to withhold his support from any measure which might possibly contravene this all-important principle; he should therefore give his vote for striking out the first section of the bill on the table.

Mr. CUTLER.—Mr. Chairman: It is with great reluctance that I rise on this question, especially at this late period of the discussion. Unaccustomed to legislative debates, and conscious to myself that, on a subject which has already had so able and copious a discussion, it is not possible for me to say anything which is not familiar to every gentleman in this House, I should much have preferred giving my silent vote.

But, sir, viewing, as I do, the magnitude of this question, I feel it a duty which I owe to my constituents—a duty, sir, which I owe to myself, to state some of the reasons which have directed my judgment, and on which I have founded my opinion, in deciding on the bill before you. At the same time I feel it to be very unpleasant to solicit the attention of the Committee when I see the patience of gentlemen so much exhausted. I will detain them but a very short time.

In the pursuits of my life, sir, I have not been led to turn my attention very much to systems of jurisprudence, nor have I been conversant in courts of justice; but, on a subject as momentous as this which now occupies the attention, not only of this Committee but the nation at large, I believe it not necessary to be an adept in political science, in order to form a correct opinion.

Sir, I well recollect the time when the Constitution, which authorizes us to sit here, was under consideration in the State from which I came; and I am certain if the important feature of an independent Judiciary had not been clearly discovered in it, the adoption of it would not have been effected. Independent of what, sir? Of the overbearing power of the Executive and Legislative branches of the Government on the one hand, and of popular whim and caprice on the other. The people, generally, so far as my information extends, and myself among the rest, believed that our safety in life, property, liberty, and reputation, was secured by this all-important feature in a Government, emphatically introduced "to establish justice, to insure domestic tranquillity, and to secure the blessings of liberty." And I feel myself utterly incapable of comprehending what gentlemen mean, when they suppose we are safe under the administration of a Judiciary liable to be removed by the Legislative body any more than if they are liable to be removed by the Executive. If passion, or any improper motives, may induce the Executive to abuse such a power, may not passion, or improper motives, operate upon a Legislative body? And if I understand the import of responsibility, as attached to a man or men in public office, and producing the salutary effects of checking any of the imperfections incident to man, this same responsibility operates stronger upon an individual than upon a numerous body of men; and I must believe, because such is the irresistible conviction of my mind, that it would be safer to trust our Judiciary to be removed at the will of the Executive, chosen, as he is, once in four years, and solely responsible, than to the Legislative body, who, by dividing the blame, if any be imputable, will unavoidably reduce it to nothing.

Mr. Chairman, with these impressions upon my mind, and understanding, as I do, the words of the Constitution, I have not a doubt the independence of the Judiciary was intended to be secured, as much against the power of the Legislature as the Executive. If words are to convey ideas to plain men, not used to the subtleties of legal proceedings, which I must believe was the intention when this Constitution was composed, they can, in this case, convey but one idea. When plain men, of common sense, read this part of the first section of the second article, "the judges of both the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour," will not the irresistible impression be, that these words were intended to give entire security to the judges so long as they behave well? That good behaviour should be their security against the encroachments of any power created by this instrument? And will not the impression be precisely the same when it is read by men of the strictest logical and grammatical correctness? If no crafty imposition upon the public mind was intended—if the true construction of an instrument, involving their dearest rights, was not concealed under implications and far-fetched deductions—if there was not an intention to deceive, can this plain sense of it be rejected?

But, sir, if the construction of the Constitution gentlemen contend for be correct, this article gives not the least security. If the Legislature can remove the office when they please, and of course the judges, can gentlemen show what security is given by this article? If it was intended to guard only against the power of the Executive, why was it not so expressed? The security is no more nor better than it would have been if the article had expressly said: "The judges of both the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during the pleasure of the Legislature." If we depart from the plain letter, to make out a meaning by hard construction, we may give any sense to the Constitution we please. Here an insuperable objection arises in my mind to the constitutionality of this bill. Much ingenuity has been displayed in the course of this discussion, by gentlemen who advocate the bill, but the point on which the question of constitutionality principally bears, has been slightly passed over, or the plainest and most forcible arguments left unconfuted. The unsophisticated common sense of honest men, who have only common understanding, will compel them to believe the Legislature is not vested with power to remove judges at pleasure. If the Constitution does not place the Judiciary out of the reach of removal, as well by the repeal of the law establishing the courts, by which they act as judges, as in any other way, they hold their offices, not during good behaviour, but during the pleasure of the Legislature.

If the judges should misbehave, the Constitution has wisely authorized an impeachment, and a conviction involves in it a removal from office. In a very few words the wisdom and design of the Constitution is developed. We are not to suffer under the administration of bad men, because if their conduct is bad, they can be removed. Neither are we to suffer from a fear which the judges may feel of being crushed by the weight of Executive or Legislative power, nor from the sovereignty of the people operating in elections. "The fear of man bringeth a snare," and in no case can this fear do so much injury, as in the character and person of a judge. But I will not, Mr. Chairman, take up the time of the Committee in reiterating arguments which have been so clearly and forcibly impressed, at least, upon my mind, by the honorable gentlemen who have opposed this bill.

Sir, this Government has been emphatically styled a Government of checks and balances; it has been so understood by the people; and in this, more than in anything else, have they seen their own safety in the delegation of power. I believe it was the intention of the wise framers of the Constitution, that the Judiciary should form, not a "subordinate, but a co-ordinate, branch of the Government." By making the Judiciary, equally with the other branches, a component part, a check was formed, not less necessary to the security and freedom of the people, than any other contained in the Constitution. This check erects a barrier between the Government and the people, and becomes the bulwark of equal justice and equal liberty. It is the only effectual security against the encroachments of the Legislature upon the Constitutional rights of the people, and forming a wise and free Government, it will forever be a desideratum to establish, immoveably, an impartial, inflexible and sacred administration of justice. I was happy to hear the other day, an opinion which was in perfect unison with my own, so decidedly advanced by my honorable colleague, on the opposite side of the House (Mr. BACON.) He declared it was an opinion he had weighed in his own mind, and whatever conclusions might result, he should still adhere to it, that the judicial officers of every grade, from the judge of the Supreme Court of the United States down to the common justices of the peace, not only have a right, but are bound by their oaths of office, to judge of the constitutionality of the acts of Congress. And I should be still more happy to find the opinion of that gentleman according with my own, in opposing an act which is hostile to the very principle he so confidently advanced.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

It has been, Mr. Chairman, repeatedly said, that this independence of the Judiciary would involve in it a destruction of the Legislature; that the independence contended for, would in its consequences erect the Judiciary into a despotism. But it has as often been answered, that the Judiciary commands no money—makes no laws—and this completely removes from my mind every apprehension of danger. Any power the Judiciary can assume over the Legislature is merely negative—it is of the preventive kind—it is only calculated to prevent injury and not to inflict it. The moment they attempt to inflict punishments, not authorized by law, an impeachment is an effectual remedy.

Sir, if the bill on your table passes into a law, I can see no obstacle to the passing another similar to the act repealed or varying from it, establishing the same or a greater number of judges. The next Congress may go on to do the same, and a perpetual fluctuation of your judges must be the inevitable consequence. If the Constitution was not meant, among other things, to guard against such an abuse of power, I cannot see for what purpose those words were introduced, showing the tenure of office in your judges to be solely that of good behaviour. If the words in the Constitution have not done it, I cannot discover the use of words, nor the benefit of intellect in giving them an explanation. I must subscribe to the opinion of the President of the United States, expressed on a late occasion, which I believe to be perfectly correct, that the true construction of the Constitution, is the "safe and honest meaning contemplated by the plain understanding of the people at the time of its adoption."

Mr. Chairman, before I sit down, I will make one or two remarks, on an observation I do not recollect to have been noticed, which fell from an honorable gentleman from North Carolina, whose political knowledge and talents I respect, and with whose candor I was much pleased. This gentleman (the honorable Speaker of the House) has said, and seems to rely much upon it, that all the evils which can possibly be apprehended from the passing of the bill, or any other improper act of the Legislature, may be cured by future elections. I cannot help doubting whether the gentleman has contemplated the full extent of this doctrine. It goes, in my opinion, wholly to set aside a written constitution. It is not in my power to conceive that elections are a remedy for every encroachment the Legislature may make on the Constitution. It must be a very uncertain corrective in instances of the most flagrant violations, and in smaller ones, it is none at all. There is not responsibility enough attached to the individual members of this House to render elections a sufficient corrective for the abuse of power. If the acts of the Legislature, which shall violate the most plain and positive provision of the Constitution, can only be corrected by an appeal to the opinion of the people, to be manifested by the exercise of their right of election, we lose the advantages we expect to derive from a written Constitution. And public opinion, which can never be accurately ascertained, and which is continually liable to fluctuation and change, will be our political constitution. If the time should come, which I hope has not yet arrived, when public opinion is to be the only corrective of the abuse of power, Constitutional rights will be reduced to a phantom, and the fair fabric of our national independence, liberty, and safety, will be levelled with the dust.

But, sir, I will not detain the Committee at this late period of the discussion, when it is not possible for me to add to the weight of argument and mass of information, which, in a manner so lucid and impressive, has been given to this House. I have thought it a duty thus far to state my own ideas on a subject which has excited much apprehension. The distinguished talents and information of gentlemen, who are of opinion that the passing this bill will be no infringement of the Constitution, command my respect. But when I find them leaving the plain words of the Constitution—the plain import of terms used without limitation, without being applied to any particular department—implying no more restraint upon the Executive than upon the Legislature, and undertaking to support their opinions on constructions and implications—when I find them denying that the Judiciary ought to be independent, I am forcibly led to the conclusion, that they are mistaken. And if the case is even doubtful, that the safest way is not to act at all. I had rather leave the laws in operation than hazard a breach of this inviolable instrument. What evils may we not suffer, if we by repealing this law shall in event, be found to have broken the Constitution! They may extend beyond the power of calculation. It must be left to imagination alone to portray the picture which may be dreadfully realized.

What shall we suffer, sir, if, by doubting its constitutionality, we suspend the repeal to another session? I must confess to you, sir, my information is too limited to attempt a consideration of the expediency of the repeal. But so far as I can judge from the copious information given to the Committee, the expense, compared to the benefits which may arise from the present system, bears no proportion to them. I am as much disposed to promote economy as any gentleman on this floor, but economy becomes a public injury when it is not subservient to the public good. The saving expense alone, in this case, can afford little or no argument in favor of the repeal. From many parts of the Union, we find the courts, by the little experience already had, are in high estimation. I should therefore wait until further experience determine the propriety, or impropriety of a repeal. Diffident as I may feel of my own opinions on a subject like this, when called to vote under a sense of moral obligation, and the solemnity of an oath I have taken on this floor to support the Constitution, I must give a decided negative to the bill on your table.

MR. HOLLAND.—At this advanced period of the debate it would be improper for me to enter largely into the discussion of the present question, a regard for our time, a respect for the honorable gentlemen that have gone before me, and a respect to you, sir, forbid it. I shall, therefore, confine my remarks to the most prominent objections that have been made to the passage of the bill on your table.

The first objection to the passage of the bill is, the want of Constitutional power in the Legislature to pass it; and the second ground of objection is, that if the Legislature have the power, that it is improper to pass it at this time.

As to the first objection, it is laid down as a maxim, that the same power that can create can destroy, and that the power that gives has a right to take away that which is given. The first maxim relates to the Legislative, the second to the Executive power. But it is said, that these maxims do not apply to the present case. That the Legislative powers have been limited by the charter under which we legislate, and that the limitation extends to the present case. And it is also contended that the appointment of judges is not an Executive act, but the act of the people, and therefore they cannot be removed but by the people. If, upon examination, either of these assertions are true, I shall be ready to concede the point, and shall say at once that the bill ought not to pass, and will give it my veto.

As to the first maxim, I shall contend that if it holds good in any case, it ought to hold in legislation; legislation being a science so essential to the happiness of man, and so little understood, owing to the many obstructions that have been thrown in the way by wicked and designing men, that it ought to be at liberty; the Legislative mind should be at liberty to reconsider its own acts, in order to benefit by experience. In the Executive and Judicial departments, the greatest part of their acts are mechanical; having no will of their own, they are obliged to execute the will of the nation; but even they have a right to correct their own errors. The Executive can dismiss from office persons that he has taken into service by mistake. The Judiciary can revise and reconsider their own judgments, reverse their own decrees, and correct their own errors. Indeed, this seems to be a common inherent right in all men, whether considered in a private or public capacity. And in all limitation to this rule the act may be properly said to be not the act of the agent but the act of the principal, the agent not being responsible for the result. But, with respect to the powers assigned to Congress, they are ample to all objects submitted to them, they are numerous and defined in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution; there is not the smallest indication of a restriction where they have power to act, or had acted, except in the case of the compensation of the President and judges' salary, they are not to be diminished during their continuance in office. This does not restrict Legislative power over the institution under which the judges hold their office; if this restriction had been intended it would have been expressed in unequivocal words; words that would have applied to the office and not to the officer, such as that the judges shall hold their office during good behaviour, and the office shall not be abolished. This not having been said, I am unwilling to suppose that the framers of the Constitution intended to restrict Legislative power; that they intended to prevent them from having it in their power at all times to reconsider their own acts, and to put down useless, inconvenient or expensive institutions. I am unwilling to suppose that the convention intended to keep up the office for the sole use of the officer. That the office and the officer being created by the people in their Legislative and Executive capacity, the people in the same capacity can dispense with them, when, in their opinion, they are useless; a contrary construction would be an improper limitation of Legislative powers, and preclude the benefit of experience.

I shall now consider more particularly to whom the words, "and they shall hold their office during good behaviour," alluded to. By the eleventh section of the second article of the Constitution, "the President shall have power, by and with the advice of two-thirds of the Senate, to make treaties, to nominate and appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court," &c., and by the last clause the President has power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session. From this section it is evident that the appointment to office is an Executive act, that the Senate, when advising, are in the exercise of Executive duties; the appointment is an Executive choice, it is an Executive gift to the person to whom the office is conferred, he has it not by purchase, he has given nothing in exchange, but holds it as a gift, and unless otherwise checked, at the will of the giver. Hence the framers of the Constitution thought proper to restrain the power of the giver, to wit, the Executive, by inserting the words before stated, "and he shall hold his office during good behaviour." If these words had not been inserted the judges would have held their offices by the same tenure as Ambassadors and other officers under his gift, subject to be removed by Executive pleasure. And I cannot but think, that the Convention had a reference to the tenure of the judges in Great Britain, and observing that the will of the Executive was there limited, they thought proper to make a similar restraint upon the will of the Executive in this country. This, sir, is the most correct opinion that I am able to form as to our having a Constitutional power to pass the bill on your table.

My colleague (Mr. HENDERSON) says, that the tenure under which the judges hold their offices in the State from which we come is the same with the tenure of the judges of the United States. He is correct; not only the judges, but all the justices of that State hold their offices by the same tenure, during good behaviour. But I think differently from him when he says he considers it not an Executive but a Legislative restriction. Soon after the formation of our Constitution, our Legislature passed laws organizing courts of justice, constituted of inferior and superior courts; the superior courts were held in districts by judges whose authority extended to the utmost limits of the State, and had unlimited jurisdiction; the inferior courts were holden by the justices of the respective counties, and had a limited jurisdiction with respect to officers, and unlimited as to civil actions, subject to an appeal to the superior court in all cases by the party who thought himself aggrieved.

Notwithstanding the Legislature at sundry times has attempted to change the Federal system both of the superior and county courts, an attempt was once made to repeal the law constituting the superior court, with an intent to vest superior power in the county courts; if this project had carried, the judges would have been put down; and, indeed, when this subject was on the tapis, I never once heard it suggested, that on account of the office of the judges, that the Legislature had not a power to make any arrangements they thought proper; indeed, it was said by members, that the repeal would answer one good purpose, if no other, that by it the State would get rid of one or two judges who were incapable of performing their duties; but so it happened that no substitute could be proposed that obtained a majority of the members, and no material change has been made. And I am pretty certain had the friends of the judges suggested that the Legislature had not a Constitutional power to repeal the law on account of the offices of the judges that it would have contributed to the repeal.

And with respect to the justices who hold their offices by the same tenure as that of the judges, as before stated. The Legislature, for the more convenient administration of justice, have thought proper to divide a number of their counties; in some instances neither division retained its original name, as in the case of the county I live in, and the county adjacent, both of which were once known by the name of Tryon, after the British Governor who joined His Majesty's forces, which occasioned the Legislature, on the division, to name the counties after two American officers—Lynch and Rutherford. In this case the whole of the justices were out of commission, occasioned by a Legislative arrangement, and the Legislature did not feel themselves bound to re-commission said justices, their reappointment depended upon the opinion that was entertained of their merit. And in all this it never once occurred to the Legislature of North Carolina, that they had infringed the rights of office or violated the constitution of the State; and, of these transactions, I appeal to all my colleagues that hear me. And I further say that the late Judiciary bill, even before and since its passage, has been a subject of much conversation, and opinions freely given as to the propriety of its repeal, but in all that I have heard respecting it, the Legislative power of Congress never was called in question. I further say, that the objection is so new to me that I never heard of it until I came to this city; and after I found it insisted on by gentlemen, I have paid due attention to all the arguments that have been advanced by them, but to no purpose; my first opinion stands unshaken, and I think, with the former Legislatures of the State that I have the honor to represent, and with the present Legislature as announced by their resolution on your table, that the words, "that the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour," are not a Legislative but an Executive restriction, and, under this impression, I feel at liberty to exercise my influence according to the wish of the Legislature of the State to repeal the act contemplated by the bill before you. And I am far from thinking with my colleague, (Mr. HENDERSON,) that the Legislature of that State stood in need of the arguments of this place to enable them to form a correct opinion as to the expediency or constitutionality of the repeal. With regard to the expediency, so far as relates to their State, they are the most competent on account of a complete representation of all the counties in all their remote or various situations must be fully understood. And with respect to the constitutionality of the repeal they would be at no loss, having the whole evidence before them—the act and the Constitution—this being all that was necessary to the forming of their judgment. I would ask my colleague first up, and the gentleman just sat down, if they think the multiplied arguments made use of on this occasion, have proselyted a single gentleman? I think it will be answered in the negative. I shall now proceed to make a few observations on the expediency of the passage of the bill, drawn principally from what comes within my own knowledge. I think I attended at two courts in the city of Raleigh; it was at the time of the sitting of the General Assembly of that State, in the year 1797-'98. I was in court in 1798, when his honor gave his charge to the grand jury; it principally consisted in an eulogium on the administration of the General Government, after which the court adjourned; and on the next day the court met, made up two or three issues, and, perhaps, tried a suit; and on the third day the court having nothing to do, adjourned until court in course. And I have understood that, in the other parts of the State, the business was conducted nearly in the same way. Indeed, I have understood that the Federal courts there had little to do. There was one case that came within my own knowledge; it was a suit that was brought against a poor man, on the other side of the Appalachian mountain, as a delinquent under the excise law, where the demand was about seventeen dollars; and, after the poor man had rode near two hundred and fifty miles once or twice, he paid the large sum of one hundred dollars cost, and came off clear. These circumstances, with the resolution of the State Legislature, is to me conclusive evidence that the original courts were adequate to all the business for which they were instituted in that State.

H. OF R.

Judiciary System.

Having thus got over the objections relative to the want of power, and shown the expediency of passing the bill on your table, I shall take some notice of another objection that has been greatly insisted upon, namely, if we pass this bill we destroy the independence of our Judiciary. And if, on examination, it is found that, after this bill pass, our Judiciary will possess more independence, that they will stand further from the grasp of Legislative or Executive power than any other judiciary on earth, I hope gentlemen will concede to the passage of the bill. In looking at this subject it will be proper to take a view of the judiciary of Great Britain; that is admitted to be the best judiciary in the world, where independence and fidelity have been admitted to be the glory of the English nation.

The tenure of the judge's office there is during good behaviour, or, in other words, against the will of the Chief Executive Magistrate; subject to be removed by a joint address of both Houses of Parliament; and, in this case, the King has no discretion, the address is imperious. Here, by our construction, the judges cannot be removed so long as the Constitution, under which they hold their offices, exists. To repeal this institution there must be not only a majority of both branches of the Legislature, but the consent and approbation of the Executive are necessary, or otherwise a Constitutional majority of both Houses. A gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GODDARD,) has said that he has no apprehension of an abuse of power in England; that it is not reasonable to suppose that Parliament would make an improper address for the removal of their judges; for that the Parliament consisted of a democratic and an aristocratical branch that would remain firm against any improper impulse; but that he apprehends that there is not the same security in this country. As the gentleman has not given a reason for his apprehensions, it is but fair to presume that he has a higher confidence in the British House of Commons and Lords of Parliament than he has in the American Senate and House of Representatives, with the further additional security of the Executive of the United States.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEMPHILL) asked, what could induce the framers of the Constitution to leave it in the power of the Legislature to let their judges drop by repealing the law by which they held their commissions? I will answer that honorable gentleman by asking him what induced the convention that formed the constitution of his State, to put it in the power of the Legislature to remove their judges by a joint address of two-thirds of the Legislature to the Executive of that State? The motives that governed in the one case probably governed in the other, and I will submit to the opinion of the gentleman whether the removal by address is not easier effected than by repealing the institution under which the judges acted; the vote of the Governor being equal to one-third of the Legislature, equal to the Constitutional vote of the President of the United States? A gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RUTGEGE) says, that if we pass this bill we not only destroy the independence of the Judiciary, but that we voluntarily stab the Constitution in the most mortal part. To both charges, I say not guilty. But to prove the truth of the charges, he introduced the outlawry of Wilkes, in England, and stated that the judges had fortitude, fidelity, and independence sufficient, and reversed the outlawry. This case proves the reverse of the position intended; it proves that although the judges in England held their offices by the courtesy of Parliament, yet they had integrity and independence equal to the discharge of their duties, from which it must be inferred that our judges, not holding their offices at the will of the Legislature, are more independent and more capable of discharging their duties.

And, as a further proof of our destroying the independence of the Judiciary, and stabbing the Constitution, the same gentleman informed us that by this means all Republics had been destroyed; that Greece had fell, Rome had fell, and that Venice, and the Republic of Switzerland, had fallen. I expected that the honorable member was about to show that those Republics had fallen because they had written constitutions, vesting certain powers in their Judiciary, and that the Legislative branches of those Governments had destroyed their independence. The honorable gentleman says that we are the enemies of the Constitution, and that he and his honorable friends would do anything to save it. The manner that those gentlemen formerly and at this time have portrayed the Constitution, puts me in mind of Achilles the Grecian chief: the Constitution, like this hero, at some times was invulnerable; it was adequate to every purpose; it was broad, and extended its force against all opposition, like the hero it nursed, and levelled armies, and now, like him, the only mortal part that the shaft of death can enter is at the heel. It is in the minor branch of the Executive, the Judiciary, and in the minor branch of that branch, the sixteen judges.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania, and my colleague from North Carolina, has compared this tenure of the judges to a contract, and says that the same rule of justice should be applied to them as to individual contracts. I am not disposed to contest this point. And what is the rule upon contracts where work and labor is to be done? Suppose a firm of merchants employs a clerk to act as a clerk in their firm during good behaviour, for which services said clerk had a covenant with said firm by agreeing for a monthly payment of a sum not to be diminished during good behaviour? Is the contract binding upon the firm, so that they cannot dissolve it? Suppose said firm dissolves, what becomes of the contract? Can the agent maintain an action in law or equity for the recovery of moneys for services which he never did perform, or for services not wanted? I believe not, sir; and the principle holds good in all contracts where services are to be rendered. If anything occurs that renders the services unnecessary or improper, the contract is concluded, it is at an end, a contrary principle would lead to many absurdities. A gentleman from Connecticut has said that the words "during good behaviour" are so plain and easily understood, that a school-boy would, without hesitation, answer that it meant so long as he behaved well, that it meant during life, and would not a school-boy also answer that no person should be continued in service longer than his services were wanted, and that as soon as the services could be dispensed with that the person performing services should be discharged, and, after the discharge, would not the school-boy say that the payment should stop? The gentleman has said we may not commit murder by running our sword through a man, but may push a man against a sword. Is there any similarity in this case, in discontinuing a man from service whose services are not wanted, in discontinuing an office that is unnecessary to be kept up, and even expensive and injurious to the community, and that of taking the life of a citizen? I must confess I see none. One being an act arising from just impressions of duty, the other an act of high criminality. The same gentleman has said that we ought to be cautious in passing laws by constructive right on the Constitution. This caution comes with a bad grace from that quarter. Has the honorable gentleman forgot the law passed by his support, where by a construction of guarding against the licentiousness of the press, they passed the Sedition act, contrary to the express words of the Constitution? These things are of so recent a date that they cannot be forgotten. We have been too long amused by sound, by declarations from that side of the House, but it is now too late for declarations to obtain credit, when contrary to experience. We have been told by a gentleman from Delaware that he wishes to support the sovereignty and dignity of the United States, and at the next breath he tells us and tells the world, that he has no confidence in the majority of the Legislature, and that he has no confidence in the Executive. Is this the means that he employs to support the dignity of the United States? He has also said that the assumption of the State debts was necessary for the remuneration of the war-worn soldiers; these were the declarations by which this measure was carried. But my friends in the opposition then declared that it would not have that effect, that, on the contrary, the soldiers that had performed the services, and that the citizen that had advanced his property for the public service, would not be remunerated, but that the whole would be cast into the hands of a few speculators, and that the public debt would be greatly augmented. And has not all this been realized to a greater extent than was even apprehended by my friends? The same gentleman has said, with one other gentleman from Maryland, that the war in Europe, and the extent of the French arms, made it necessary to augment and raise the additional army, or to put it in the power of the President to do so. My friends then thought, as they still think, that the French, whatever intentions of hostility they bore to this country, would not invade it; that they were so encompassed by the Powers of Europe, the thing was impossible. To these reasonings my friends received in reply, that they were Jacobins, Democrats, French partisans; then was the time of political intolerance. But, having carried the army, more was necessary, the opposition must not talk, or at least they must not write about it, unless they had always legal evidence in their pocket: to justify the Sedition law, it was necessary to put down free inquiry; and, after all this, we are still told all has been well conducted; and we are further threatened with civil war, if we strike down this institution, and recommended to take care of our wives and children. We are threatened with the bayonet. Are these gentlemen prepared, like their famous leader and author of the funding system at New York, to shed their hearts' blood in the opposition? I trust they are not prepared—they have no army of dependants to second them in a design of that kind. The good sense of America has at length seen their projects, and cannot longer be imposed upon by them.

A gentleman from Maryland (Mr. DENNIS) begins his remarks by giving us the homage of his esteem. I would ask the gentleman, is this an indication of approbation or contempt? He dwells much on the name of General WASHINGTON, and says that no monuments are building for him. I cannot conceive any relation that this has to the present question. And he says that Mr. Hamilton, although he was the author of the funding system, did not consider a national debt as a national blessing, and, to prove it, reads a long report of Secretary Hamilton to Congress.

It is true, in this report, there is no express avowal of an opinion that a national debt would be a national blessing; nor is it reasonable to believe that this avowal would accompany an official report. But we are to judge of the intentions of men by their actions, more than by their declarations—the actions on many measures adopted by Government lead to the proof—and I think I have seen a publication, (as publications have been admitted as evidence by gentlemen on the other side)—which publication has been ever considered as the production of that gentleman—which went to prove that a national debt was a national blessing. The doctrine has been so well understood in theory and practice, that I had thought the principle had been settled. The gentleman says that it was impossible to do justice in the funding system; this would be a good argument not to have touched it.

He says at the time the additional army was raised France had forty thousand troops, and had nothing to do, and she might have bent her course this way. If this was true, France has one hundred and fifty thousand troops at present, and less to do; we therefore ought to be raising armies.

He says our navy protected our trade. It may be so, but was there a necessity to build the six ships-of-the-line, that could not in any short time be brought into action, at a time when we had to borrow money at eight per cent.? He says, our side of the House never wished to pay the public debt. This I deny; my friends never wished unnecessarily to augment the public debt by creating and keeping up useless institutions. But they at all times, when a debt has been created, although ever so improperly, have wished to extinguish it by actual payment; to prove this, examine the records and journals of Congress, and the votes will be there seen. The gentleman has said much about our destroying the independence of the Judiciary, and attempting to violate the Constitution, in common with other gentlemen on that side of the House, equally unjust and defamatory, for which no apology can be given unless it be admitted to be the last convulsions of an expiring party. Sir, as I am fully convinced that we have a Constitutional right to pass the bill on your table, and as I do believe that it is expedient to pass it, and as I further believe that it does not violate the independence of the Judiciary; that if they have a right to judge of the constitutionality of law, they will continue unimpaired to have the same right, and in every respect remain in their Constitutional independence, I shall therefore vote against the proposition of my colleague for striking out the first section of the bill.

Mr. GREGG.—Several days ago, Mr. Chairman, I expressed an anxious wish that this question might be decided, and assigned as a reason for my anxiety, the length of time it had already occupied, and the belief I entertained, that if the discussion was continued any longer, it must be by the repetition of arguments we had already heard, and by introducing extraneous matter, which very probably had better be kept out of view. I confess that I have heard nothing since to convince me, that the opinion I had then formed was incorrect. It is true, the argument has been conducted with great ingenuity and address on both sides, but it must be acknowledged, that there has been much repetition, and many subjects brought into view, which, as they have very little bearing on the present question, had certainly better been left untouched.

It has appeared to me, that a stranger coming into the House at some periods of the debate, would at once have concluded the subject of discussion to be, whether the measures of the Government during the Administration preceding the present, tended to monarchy or aristocracy? At other times he would have apprehended the question to be, whether the common law attaches to the Constitution of the United States, and forms a part of it? From the course of the arguments at other times, he would be inevitably led to conclude, that the main question to be decided was, how far the courts have a Constitutional right and power to declare laws passed by Congress unconstitutional and void. These, to be sure, are interesting and important subjects, and we have had much useful information to aid us in forming an opinion, should we even be called to decide on them, but they appear to me so entirely irrelevant to the subject immediately before the Committee, that I have regretted to hear them, thus incidentally drawn into the present discussion. Entertaining the opinion which I before expressed, and which I have now repeated, of the exhausted state of the subject, it would certainly be improper in me to detain the Committee by entering minutely into the argument. I assure the Committee I have no such intention. My principal object in rising is to correct some information with which a gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RUTLEDGE) favored the Committee a few days ago, respecting an official character in Pennsylvania, the State from which I have the honor to come, as one of its Representatives. I would have done this at the time the information was given, had I not been prevented by the reluctance I always have felt at seeing a gentleman interrupted in his observations. Had it been done, then, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. DENNIS) would perhaps have spared the allusion made by him to the same person on Saturday.

A gentleman from Virginia, in speaking on the subject of appointments to office, mentioned that a person, not only hostile to our independence during the Revolutionary war, but who had even joined the British army, and distinguished himself as an active partisan in their service, had been appointed to the important office of a judge, by the late President. The gentleman from South Carolina, in searching for an officer under the present Administration, supposed to have been possessed of similar principles, during that interesting period in the affairs of this country, as a set-off to the appointment of the judge, travelled into Pennsylvania, and fixed on the collector of the internal revenue for the city and county of Philadelphia, in that State. He informed the Committee, that when the British army under Sir William Howe, made its triumphal entry into Philadelphia, that person was its conductor; that in manifestations of his joy on the occasion, he rode before with his head wreathed with laurel, and that he was afterwards proscribed for his conduct by an act of the Legislature of the State. That the person alluded to, with many others, did precede the British army when it marched into Philadelphia, exhibiting evident demonstrations of joy, I believe has never been contradicted. That he was proscribed by an act of the Legislature, I believe is equally certain. But I never until now heard, that he was the conductor of the army on that occasion. I have always heard him spoken of as being too young to be entrusted with so important a commission. His youth, and his being under the direction of friends, who, on that occasion, were supposed to have exercised a controlling power over him, pleaded so powerfully in his favor, that this political transgression was forgiven by his country, and the proscription revoked. I wish the gentleman had proceeded with the history of this person. It would then have appeared to the Committee, that the war had not long terminated before he was brought into public notice, and placed on the theatre of public life, by that very description of people who now arrogate to themselves the appellation of Federalists. It would also have appeared, that shortly after the establishment of the present Government, he was appointed Assistant Secretary of the Treasury by General WASHINGTON, then President, and that when that office was abolished, he was appointed to be Commissioner of the Revenue by General Washington also. Yes, sir, he was appointed to both these important offices by General WASHINGTON. This consideration alone, it might have been supposed, would, in the opinion of gentlemen, have been sufficient to justify the present President in giving him the appointment he now holds, had it been given by him; but it is a subordinate office he holds; it does not come under the immediate notice of the President; it is within the gift of the Supervisor of the District.

Here, Mr. Chairman, I must beg leave to observe, and I think it will not be improper in this place to take some notice of the clamor that has been excited, and the charges that have been made against the President for removing the late Supervisor of that district, and appointing as his successor the person who now holds the office. I have before me a newspaper containing a number of toasts given at an entertainment, on a late memorable occasion in this city, in one of which the injury done the late Supervisor is represented to be so great as to warrant a kind of appeal to the people for obtaining him redress. I have seen, in another newspaper, (and newspaper information is become very fashionable on this occasion,) a paragraph in these words: "General Miller, the accomplished, the war-worn soldier, has been removed from the office of Supervisor of the District of Pennsylvania, to make room for one Muhlenberg, a Dutchman." Now, sir, what must have been the object of the author? Most undoubtedly to impress the minds of strangers with a belief that the former was a man of distinguished merit, and the latter, the reverse. In this, as in other cases, it is fair and proper that the whole truth should be declared. It is not pretended to be denied, that the late Supervisor is a man of merit. It would ill become any person at the present day to attempt to divest him, or any of the brave men to whose exertions our country is indebted for its independence, of the honors justly acquired by their services during the Revolutionary war. That gentleman entered into the Army very early in the war, and continued in service until 1779 or 1780. He then retired, and was shortly after appointed to a lucrative civil office under the State, which he held till 1794, at which time, I believe, he was made Supervisor of the District.

Let us now, said Mr. G., inquire what are the pretensions of his successor in office. His military career also commenced with the Revolution, nor did he lay down his sword until, at the conclusion of the war, the Army was disbanded. The importance of his services through that whole period I have never heard questioned. If, therefore, being war-worn constitutes any just demand on the Government for official remuneration, (and I must declare I have always viewed it in that light,) the person who now holds the office has a superior claim, as having been longer in service than his predecessor, and because, in the last years of the war particularly, the pay of the officers could not be considered an adequate compensation for their services.

Permit me, sir, whilst I am on the floor, to advert for a moment to an address from the bar of Philadelphia to the Senate, on this subject, to which frequent allusion has been had, and on which great stress is laid in this discussion. As the address is not before the House, I much question whether arguments drawn from it are strictly in order. But if it even was on your table, I would ask what influence should it have on the decision of the present question? The respectability of the bar of Philadelphia is acknowledged to be very great. It is composed of men as eminent for their professional abilities as they are distinguished for personal merit. I feel no disposition to detract from their reputation in either of these respects, even was it in my power. But, sir, it is well known to every person living in Pennsylvania, that the lawyers of the whole State, with few exceptions, whatever their professional abilities and personal merit may be, have uniformly been advocates of that system of politics, and all those measures which distinguished the former administration of our Government. The public debt, a large Army, an increased Navy, and the whole catalogue of taxes, received their countenance and support, as contributing to the extension of Executive influence and power. Surely, then, it cannot be accounted strange—nay, is it not to be expected, that these men should rally round the Judiciary, and endeavor, by adding to its influence, to compensate for their loss of power in the proposed reduction of some of the other establishments?

With respect to the address itself, it may be observed, that it cautiously avoids giving any opinion on the Constitutional power of Congress to pass the bill on the table, and confines itself to a simple statement of the expediency of the present organization of the courts, as ascertained by the practice of the gentlemen who have signed it. Even as to the expediency of the system, I have been informed that they were not unanimous, and that a few, not inferior in talents, absolutely refused signing. Had it touched the Constitutional question, or contained even an implied doubt of the Constitutional power of Congress to repeal the laws to which it alluded, I feel myself warranted in saying, that some at least whose names are now in it, would have refused their signatures. Indeed, I am inclined to think, that a regard for consistency would prevent them, generally, from giving their sanction to any instrument embracing that principle, and this opinion I conceive will appear to be sufficiently warranted by this consideration.

In the State of Pennsylvania the judges hold their commissions by the same tenure by which the judges of the United States hold theirs. During good behaviour are the terms used in both constitutions. The Judiciary system, in Pennsylvania, has been long thought to be imperfect and defective. An attempt is now making to improve it. I have this morning seen a bill on the subject, which, I understand, is likely to pass in the House of Representatives. I believe that bill is supported by all the professional gentlemen who are members of the House. I have not heard that any of those who are not members are protesting against it as being unconstitutional; and yet it goes to abolish the offices, and of course to put down more than a hundred judges, who are all commissioned during good behaviour. If these gentlemen believed that measure to be unconstitutional, their patriotism surely would lead them to protest against it, and to exert their influence to prevent its passage. This, sir, it appears to me, may be considered as pretty conclusive evidence, that it is a received opinion in that State, not objected to even by professional gentlemen, that it is competent to the Legislature to abolish an office, which on experience is found to be inexpedient and unnecessary, even although the officer holding it is commissioned during good behaviour; and this is conformable to the opinion of the chief executive Magistrate of that State, expressed with reference to this particular subject, in a letter to a friend, which has been already stated by a gentleman from Georgia. Unless the Legislature does possess this power, or if the doctrine of the independence of the Judiciary should prevail to the extent that has been contended for, it appears to me, that what I have always considered as the most important principle of the Constitution, is destroyed. Responsibility in public agents I have always considered as the best, the only security the people have against imposition. While that is preserved, they are in great danger; destroy it, and where is their security? If the judges even of inferior courts are to be so independent, as that their offices must be sacred, and beyond the reach of the Legislature, and if their power in deciding on the constitutionality of laws, is to be unlimited, and without any qualification, the Legislature is but a subordinate branch of the Government—the Judiciary is paramount—the supreme power is in their hands. Such a doctrine appears to me repugnant to common sense, to the vital principles of our Government, and to the plain and obvious meaning of the Constitution.

I must, Mr. Chairman, take this opportunity of expressing the regret with which I have heard during the present discussion, the friends of this bill branded with epithets and loaded with charges, which, to say no worse of them, are certainly highly improper in this place. They have been charged with being actuated by motives hostile to the Constitution and Government of their country. They have been represented as being led on by a principle of innovation, and a destructive spirit, which after deluging Europe in blood, is now exerting its baneful influence over them. They have been called tools of the President, mere automaton, prepared to execute all his mandates. They have been held up as disorganizers, jacobins, and infidels—and all this is done under the privilege of freedom of debate. This, sir, is not freedom of debate. It is a gross abuse of that privilege. It is licentiousness of debate, and if continued to be practised, its inevitable consequence will be, to sink the reputation of this House in the estimation of every wise and good man. I have lamented exceedingly, that any gentleman on this side of the House could have thought himself justifiable in descending to make any reply to such insinuations.

I was, Mr. Chairman, a member of Congress at the time the system was adopted, which it is the object of the present bill to repeal. I was then opposed to it. I did not think so extensive an organization of the courts necessary. The expense created by it I considered a serious evil. The courts, under the old system, I believed to be competent to the discharge of all the business which would be likely to come under their cognizance for a long time. The document which has been laid before us by the President, containing a list of all the causes which have been entered, and which yet remain undecided in the courts of the United States, has fully confirmed me that I was not mistaken in that opinion. The number therein stated even falls short of what I supposed it might be. Believing, therefore, the present system to be unnecessarily extensive, viewing its expense as oppressive, seeing no article or section in the Constitution, which, either in its plain letter or by any fair construction, prohibits to the Legislature the power of repealing it, and considering the doctrine of the independence of the Judiciary in the extent contended for, as not only incompatible with, but as repugnant to the vital principle of the Constitution, I shall give my decided vote in favor of the bill, and against the present motion for striking out the first section.

Mr. HASTINGS.—I rise to express my sentiments upon the bill now under consideration of the Committee—not that I expect to add many new reasons against the principles of the bill to those that have already been offered by gentlemen who have preceded me in the discussion; but when the Constitution of our country, the ark of our political safety, is in danger; when, in my apprehension, it is threatened with a blow that may prove fatal to its existence; when we contemplate that a dissolution of the Union may be the final result, our fears are excited, the imagination is alarmed, and every exertion ought to be made to avert the impending evil.

Under our present Constitution of Government (which I believe to be the best and most perfect in the world) the American people have been happy beyond all former example, and whether our national prosperity and union shall be preserved or destroyed, depends alone upon ourselves, upon the preservation of the existing Constitution.

The subject now under consideration of the Committee involves in it an important Constitutional question: Shall the independence of our Federal Judiciary be impaired or destroyed? shall it be maintained in that state of inviolability in which the people, the creators of the Constitution, placed it, or shall the independence of this important branch of our Government be prostrated at the feet of the National Legislature?

I have always believed, that for a Government to be free, it must have three separate, distinct, and, as far as possible, independent branches—the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial; that these three branches, though co-operating with, ought mutually to be checks upon each other, and that whenever one of those branches assumes the powers constitutionally belonging to the other, there is an end to the freedom and security of that Government; and I have uniformly believed that it was the sense of the American people, that the powers of their Government should be thus arranged and distributed. It is possible that a Legislature may sometimes be under the influence of popular passions, and that the Executive may not be wholly free from them; to gratify popular clamor, laws may be enacted unconstitutional and oppressive. What power, then, to check the Legislature in their wild career, but an upright and firm Judiciary, that is not dependent upon popular will? Judges who are independent, holding their offices during good behaviour, and who, uninfluenced by popular or party views, will operate as a check upon those, who, in factious times, may attempt to break down the barriers of the Constitution, and by the exercise of this Constitutional power, preserve the liberty, freedom, and independence of their Government and country?

I believe it is often true that there is a strong disposition in Legislative bodies to encroach upon the other branches of the Government, because perhaps they are generally the weaker branches. If we turn our attention to England, we shall discover this spirit displayed in the conduct of the British Parliament during the reign of the elder Charles. He was an arbitrary Prince; he levied money from his subjects without the consent of Parliament, and against law. The Parliament resisted his claims, and he surrendered them; but the Parliament was not satisfied with reducing the royal prerogative within reasonable and Constitutional bounds. They stripped the King of all his Executive powers, and then sent him to the scaffold. The Parliament then assumed and exercised all the Legislative and Executive powers of the Government. Confusion ensued, and order was not restored until Oliver Cromwell, with military force, and without the consent of the people, forcibly seized upon the Government.

If we look to France, we may there behold the same encroaching spirit, which discovered itself and prevailed in the National Convention. The Executive of the nation, deprived of all his powers and prerogatives, which were usurped and exercised by the Convention, who tried, condemned, and doomed the King to the guillotine. The same Convention, afterwards exercising all the powers of Government, detached judges and commissioners from their own body into every part of the country to inflict revolutionary vengeance upon the suspected enemies of the Revolution; and thousands suffered under the arbitrary decrees and sentences of those revolutionary judges. I hope, sir, that the same encroaching spirit upon the Constitutional independence of our national Judiciary has not entered this House; but what has happened once may happen again. The opinion and practice in those States that have provided by their constitutions of government that the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour, (which is the case, I believe, with nine or ten States in the Union,) must be a good rule by which to ascertain the understanding of the people respecting this tenure of office. In Massachusetts the judges hold their offices during good behaviour. In that State, I apprehend, the people never supposed that their judges were liable to be removed from office but for misbehaviour; and I have believed this to have been the prevailing opinion in all the other States where good behaviour is the tenure of the judge's office. Upon this point I cannot entertain a doubt; the meaning of the words in our national Constitution, "that the judges of both the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour," is clear, precise, certain, and free from all ambiguity; it requires no nice metaphysical investigation or distinctions to ascertain their true intent and meaning. But to be a little more particular upon this point, the Judicial power is one of three separate branches of our Government; and it is as essential to the happiness and security of the people that the independence of this branch of their Government should be preserved as entire as the other two branches. The American people have declared, in their Constitution, that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Here the word shall applies as well to the inferior courts as to the Supreme Court; and is as imperative to the one court as to the other court. I apprehend the true meaning to be this, that there shall be a Supreme Court, and there shall be inferior courts, both of which shall be ordained and established by Congress: the Constitutional injunction upon Congress to establish courts being as strong and direct in the one case as in the other; and the Constitution contemplates the constituting of courts inferior to the Supreme Court, having appellate jurisdiction. Then follows another part of the section, "the judges of both the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour." Here the expression that "the judges of both the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour," is as imperative as the former part of the section, that the judicial power shall be vested in a Supreme Court &c. If it is a Constitutional command upon the Legislature that they shall ordain and establish a Supreme Court, and also inferior courts, the command is as positive that the judges of both the courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour; now the advocates for the repeal of the law constituting and establishing the present circuit courts, say that the Supreme Court being a Constitutional court, cannot be affected by the Legislature; but I see no reason why you cannot as easily get rid of the judges of your Supreme Court, by repealing the law organizing that court, as you can remove the judges of your circuit courts by repealing the law that establishes those courts; the principle and process is the same; for both courts equally depend upon a Legislative act to constitute and ordain them; and if the principle is once adopted, why not remove your President from office? For can there be a President constitutionally elected but by the intervention of the Legislature? You make a law determining the time of choosing the electors of President and Vice President, and the day on which the electors shall give their votes. You ordain and establish courts by law. The President is one Constitutional branch of the Government; the judges also are another Constitutional branch of the Government. The President shall hold his office during the term of four years; the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour. If, by repealing the law constituting the court, you can displace your judges, why not also, by a cunning decree, remove the President by repealing the law determining the time for choosing the electors of President? Convinced, therefore, from the best attention I have been able to give the subject, that if the bill before the Committee is finally passed, it will be an infraction of the Constitution, I shall only add, that two or three reasons alone are satisfactory to my mind, why (if it were Constitutional) it still would be inexpedient to abolish the present system of circuit courts, and restore the old one. First, under the old system the manifest impropriety and absurdity of a judge's sitting and deciding causes in an inferior court, and upon an appeal from his decision to the Supreme Court, the same judge sitting and deciding upon the same cause in that court. Secondly, the great inconvenience and difficulty that the judges of your Supreme Court, under the old system, were subjected to, being obliged to travel from one end of the United States to the other to hold circuit courts; their long absence from their families and studies; the failure of holding courts, prevented by sickness and a variety of accidents; and the great expense to suitors consequent thereon. By the present system these evils and defects so much complained of under the old system are remedied.

But, in the course of the discussion, another doctrine has been advanced by the advocates for the bill, in my opinion dangerous to the rights and liberties of the people, and wholly destructive of the Judiciary; I mean, that the Judiciary is no check upon the Legislature; that the Legislature expresses the public will; that the public will, thus expressed, is to be carried into effect by the Judiciary, however the law may be in direct violation of the Constitution; and we are told by an honorable member of the Committee, that, if we pass this bill, and thereby violate the Constitution, it will only be for two years; in two years the people may send other Representatives, and restore the law; and this, it is said, is the corrective principle in the Constitution. But if this doctrine be true, if the Judiciary power has no Constitutional check upon the acts and doings of the Legislature, Congress may pass an ex post facto law by which I may be deprived of my estate or life, before this correcting principle can operate and have effect. We are also told that, by abolishing the present circuit courts, we shall get rid of the expense of supporting sixteen circuit judges, an expense to the United States of about thirty thousand dollars a year; but I ask, what is this expense, which one of the advocates for the repeal has said is paltry, compared to the advantages of a more prompt administration of justice than was the case under the old system? Gentlemen may talk about saving expense; I am disposed to go as far as they will, in saving the public money in every proper way; but I never can consent to abolish expense, at the expense of the Constitution. It is said, also, that the business in the circuit courts has diminished, and this is urged as another reason for abolishing these courts; it appears that sixteen hundred and thirty-five suits were depending in the six circuit courts; this number will average about two hundred and seventy-two suits to each of the courts; this shows pretty conclusively, that there is business sufficient for those courts to do; and the less business the less delay, and the more prompt will be the administration of justice; besides, is not this country rapidly increasing in population and wealth? Contrary to all experience, therefore, are we to conclude that litigation and suits will decrease in a ratio with the increase of our population and wealth?

Mr. Chairman, an honorable member from Virginia has told us that the judges have claimed powers, which, I understand that gentleman to mean, do not belong to them; and he says, that it was the State of Massachusetts which was first attempted to be brought to the feet of Judicial policy; I would ask that, when the judges found, by the Constitution, that a State was liable to be sued, and therefore sustained the action of an individual against the State, if this was an unconstitutional usurpation of power? And are the judges for this to be censured and charged with claiming power, which did not Constitutionally belong to them to exercise? Upon the principles of justice, I apprehend, no sufficient reason can be given, why a State should not be as compellable to pay her debts, as an individual; or is justice and moral obligation different, as applied to a State or an individual?

The same honorable gentleman has said, that we may now indulge the hope, that our pulpits will not much longer be converted into political forums. How this may be in Virginia I know not; but, sir, as it respects the clergy in New England, it is not true; we are blessed there with a learned, pious, and patriotic clergy; who, from their good conduct, have acquired, and deservedly possess, the confidence of the people; a clergy, sir, that, during the Revolutionary war, were the zealous supporters of the rights and liberties of their invaded country; a clergy that, by their influence in their parishes, by animating and encouraging the people, in the most gloomy periods of that war, to persevere in the prosecution of it, were as useful, almost, as an army in the field; and who made as great sacrifices in the common cause, by receiving their small salaries in a depreciated paper currency, as any other class of people in the country. Our clergy, too, like our judges, hold neither the sword nor the purse; like our federal judges, too, their tenure of office is, certainly, during good behaviour; for misbehaviour only can they be removed from office. Our clergy are the advocates of civil and religious liberty; they are the friends and patrons of order and good government. We consider them, in New England, to be a useful and invaluable class of citizens; we wish not to part with them, nor to have their respectability and worth lessened by groundless calumny or outrageous abuse.

Mr. Chairman, an honorable member from Maryland has given the Committee a long dissertation upon common law, and read a number of passages from Judge Blackstone's Commentaries, with a view, I conceive, to convince the Committee that our federal courts have no Constitutional right to use and exercise common law powers; if the gentleman had turned his attention to the 67th and 68th pages of the first volume of the same author, I think his difficulties and doubts, upon this subject, must have been, in a great measure, removed. That correct writer there, treating of the common law of England, says:

"This unwritten or common law is properly distinguished into three kinds:

"1. General customs, which are the universal rule of the whole Kingdom, and form the common law, in its stricter and more usual signification.

"2. Particular customs; which, for the most part, affect only the inhabitants of particular districts.

"3. Certain particular laws, which, by custom, are adopted and used by some particular courts, of pretty general and extensive jurisdiction. As to general customs or common law, properly so called, this is that law by which proceedings and determinations in the King's ordinary court of justice are guided and directed. This, for the most part, settles the course in which lands descend by inheritance; the manner and form of acquiring and transferring property; the solemnities and obligations of contract; the rules of expounding wills, deeds, and acts of Parliament; the respective remedies of civil injuries; the several species of temporal offences, with the manner and degree of punishment; and an infinite number of minuter particulars, which diffused themselves as extensively as the ordinary distribution of common justice requires."

It was so much of the common law of England, of the first description, that our ancestors brought with them and adopted in this country, as was applicable to their situation and circumstances; that part of the general common law of England, which the English people have always held dear, and claimed as their birth-right; upon which depends a great proportion of their rights and liberties; and against which no complaints have been made by the people in England. This important and beneficial part of the common law of England was adopted by the first English settlers in this country; by them it was nourished and preserved, and transmitted to their posterity; under it we have prospered; it enters into all our proceedings; a principal part of our rules of evidence are derived from it; and it is to the common law we must look for the origin of the invaluable right of trial by jury. Take away the common law from your courts of law, as usual in this country, and your courts cannot proceed a step. The common law doctrine of contempts of courts in England, and the common law punishment that the offender should lose his right hand for certain contempts, never was considered, used, or claimed to be used, as law by the courts in this country.

The same honorable gentleman has said, that we ought to go back to the commencement of our Revolution for the origin of parties in this country—Whigs and Tories. I believe, sir, that the party distinction of Whig and Tory, ceased, pretty much, with our Revolutionary war; upon the promulgation of the present Constitution, a party, I believe, in every State opposed its adoption; and was it not this same party that, for twelve years, opposed all the most important measures of the Federal administration? Was it not this party that assailed, with every species of calumny and abuse, the illustrious WASHINGTON, for issuing, at the commencement of the late European war, a proclamation of neutrality to this country? Was it not this same party that formed and instituted Democratic societies throughout the Union, to overawe and control the constituted authorities of our Government? Was it not the spirit of this party that excited two insurrections in a part of our country? And had not the spirit of this party been checked, it would, most undoubtedly, have involved this country in a war with a powerful foreign nation.

The same honorable member has told us, too, that, if the circuit courts are abolished, still the Federal party will have more than their proportion of the loaves and fishes; and he thinks his party is entitled to a share of them; that is candid and sincere—was it, then, for the loaves and fishes that the honorable gentleman and his friends contended for twelve years? I believe the honorable gentleman; the loaves and fishes have been taken from the meritorious—from the war-worn soldier—from those against whom no complaint of misconduct in office was ever made, and given to the friends and favorites of the present Chief Magistrate. According to the principles of our Constitution, these officers, like all other officers of our Government, are the agents of the people, made and created for the people's benefit; and while they are conducted properly and to the satisfaction of the people, I cannot discover either the justice, propriety, or regard to the wishes and interest of the people in the Executive, to remove them from office.

Mr. Chairman, I will forbear saying anything more; I have already consumed more time than I intended. I can only express a hope, that the bill before the Committee will not be finally passed into a law.

Mr. HASTINGS closed his remarks at four o'clock, when Mr. RUTLEDGE moved, that the Committee should rise: he was supported by Mr. GRISWOLD.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. NEWTON, S. SMITH, and MITCHELL.

The question for the rising of the Committee was lost—yeas 31, nays 52.

Mr. DANA rose and adverted to some of the observations which had been made respecting the influence of a gentleman from Virginia. He was called to order by Mr. GILES.

The Chairman, Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, said, that observations tending to show that any one gentleman on the floor possessed an undue influence in the House, could not be in order. He said he would entreat his honorable colleague, notwithstanding the wide range taken by other gentlemen in the course of the debate, to abstain as much as possible from all personal allusions and irritating expressions.

Mr. DANA.—Mr. Chairman, I was disposed to do justice to certain members of the House between whom and myself there might be supposed to exist some of those differences of opinion which have been styled unessential. It was my intention to vindicate them from the imputation of being under the influence of the gentleman from Virginia. This was very different from what he probably imagined at the time of calling me to order. But it shall now be waived. The recommendation from the Chair is entitled to respectful attention.

It is with deep regret, sir, that I have seen the present measure pushed forward upon this House. Yet I will acknowledge that, since the commencement of the main debate, I have experienced a peculiar satisfaction in witnessing the disposition to allow so fair an opportunity for discussion. It is like the sensation which accompanies the return of health, after having suffered severely from the violence of disease.

Whatever difference of political sentiment may exist among us, all will agree, I trust, in its being to the common reputation of gentlemen, that, in the present instance, the deliberations have been conducted with such impressive order. It may be further remarked, as a source of grateful reflection, that, on this momentous subject, we have not been addressed as if the eloquence of avarice were the only eloquence becoming the American Congress. In the course of debate, indeed, there has been some notice of the expense of the Judicial establishment, as organized by one of the acts passed at the last session; but this has not, to my recollection, been insisted on, in this House, as the principal motive for adopting the bill on your table. On the contrary, one of the zealous advocates of the bill (Mr. RANDOLPH) has spoken of the expense as being a paltry sum, and disclaimed the being actuated by this consideration.

Such a frank declaration, on his part, was alike honorable and proper. For what is the additional expense that must ultimately be incurred for the support of the Judicial establishment, according to the principles of the act now proposed to be repealed? Permit me, sir, to state it distinctly.

The act in question is, "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States;" which was approved on the 13th of February, 1801. By that act, six circuits were established; five for the Atlantic States, and a sixth for Kentucky, Tennessee, and the District of Ohio.

To each of the five first circuits, three circuit judges were assigned, and an annual salary of two thousand dollars was allowed to each judge. In the sixth circuit, the judicial duties were to be performed by a circuit judge, with the assistance of the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee. An annual salary of fifteen hundred dollars was allowed to the circuit judge; and the two district judges were each to receive the same sum. By this establishment, the district judge of Kentucky became entitled to five hundred dollars annually, in addition to his former salary; and the district judge of Tennessee, to seven hundred dollars.

According to this statement, there are for five circuits, the salaries of fifteen judges, at two thousand dollars - - - - -	$30,000
For the sixth circuit, the salary of one circuit judge - - - - -	1,500
The additional sums allowed to the two district judges - - - - -	1,200

The amount of the whole for a year, is $32,700

It is to be remembered, however, that, after the office of one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court shall become vacant, by resignation, death, or Constitutional removal, the vacancy is not to be supplied by a new appointment; but the court is thereafter to consist of no more than five justices; that is, of one Chief Justice and four Associate Justices. This is the purport of the third section of the act. All the justices having been duly appointed, and having accepted their commissions, were entitled to their offices so long as they should behave well. As none of them could Constitutionally be divested of office by an act of Congress, the court must continue to consist of six justices, until one of them ceases to hold his office; in which event, the office, and with it, the salary, can rightfully be discontinued. After a Constitutional vacancy shall exist, this part of the act may have effect; and there will then be a reduction of three thousand five hundred dollars for the salary of one Associate Justice.

MARCH, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

The salaries of the judges in the respective circuits being therefore stated at - $32,700
Deduct the allowance for one associate justice of the Supreme Court - 3,500

And the difference being - - $29,200 is the additional expense to be ultimately incurred for the support of the Judicial establishment. This is the clear result of the whole. It has now been stated particularly, that the truth might be precisely ascertained on this point.

An expense of twenty-nine thousand two hundred dollars annually, it will be readily acknowledged, might be considered as a large sum, if it were to be paid by an individual in this country. But it should be kept in mind that this expense is for a public establishment interesting to the whole people of the United States. It is to be paid by a nation—a rising nation spread over a wide and fruitful land, traversing all the seas with the rich productions of their industry, advancing rapidly to destinies beyond the reach of mortal eye."

If you compare this with your permanent expenditures as estimated by the present Secretary of the Treasury, you will find it is not the one hundredth part of the amount to be paid for the current service of the year, even if you exclude all the payments on account of the public debt. It is not the third part of what is estimated as necessary for maintaining one of your frigates.

If you compare the expense with the means of paying it, you will find the whole sum for the circuit judges of the fourth circuit does not amount to the duties payable on seven hundred coaches, chariots, post-chariots, post-chaises, phaetons, and coachees owned in Virginia. That State, it is to be remembered, forms a part of the fourth circuit; and on examining the Treasury documents laid before Congress, you will find, that during the year 1800, there were in Virginia seven hundred and nine pleasurable carriages, such as I have just mentioned; besides upwards of three hundred other four-wheel carriages paying inferior rates of duty.

If you compare the additional expense, which has been stated, with the population of the United States, and apportion it accordingly, you will find it to be but very little more than half a cent for each person.

It would be a national reproach, it would be an infamy to the American name, if the consideration of such an expense could excite the solicitude which has been manifested respecting the question now in debate. The expense is not, cannot be the true cause of what has been witnessed on this subject. Considerations of a different nature, such as appeal more eloquently to the passions, must have operated to produce the effect. You may form some judgment of them, from what was said by a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) when he referred to the journals of the last session, and spoke about opposing the public will.

But before replying to that part of his observations, I beg liberty to advert to what has been said respecting the character of officers who have been dismissed since the 4th of March. It might have been hoped that it would be sufficient for gentlemen to be in possession of power, without attempting to deprive those whom they have driven from office of their well earned reputation. Are the persons now in power sensible of a deficiency of their own stock? And do they expect to supply it by this species of plunder?

A gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) has made some observations conveying a general allusion to negligences and delinquencies in office; but he did not profess to apply the allusion to all the gentlemen who have been dismissed. If I did not misunderstand him, he would admit, that there were some worthy men among them. I regret that the gentleman from Maryland is not now in his place. If he were present, I am persuaded he would not wish that his observations should be left so as to be construed to the injury of meritorious officers. Lest they should be thus misconstrued with reference to the State from which I am a representative, I could have wished to inquire whether he would be understood as imputing any misconduct to the gentlemen who have been dismissed in Connecticut.

It is well known that it has been the Executive pleasure to dismiss a supervisor of the revenue for Connecticut, and two collectors of the customs. The gentleman from Maryland, I firmly persuade myself, could not intend to accuse them. I know them personally. They are men of worth. I am confident no gentleman who knows the truth and respects it, will affirm, that either of those officers was incompetent to his office, or inattentive to his duty, or unfaithful to the Constitution. Nor can it, with a color of justice, be pretended, that they were hostile to our Revolution. They all gave decisive proofs of their attachment to it. No anti-revolutionary adherence to our enemies can, with truth, be charged against them; and their official integrity is irreproachable. If criminality is to be imputed to them it must be for a new species of crime; they have been guilty of obeying the laws of their country.

Was it a reason for their dismissal, that some of the persons high in office did not expect them to be so devoted to particular views as was wished? Whatever it may have been, I will not, in this place, imitate gentlemen on the other side who have so freely called in question the characters of persons differing from themselves in political opinions. Nor will I here undertake to draw a comparison between the officers who have been dismissed and those who have been appointed to their places. I waive any general investigation of the characters of men recently placed in office. It might occupy too much time, especially at this late hour. I quit the topic with a general remark: gentlemen should remember their glass house is not a fortress.

After this vindication of meritorious men who have been removed from office, I will now attend more particularly to some observations of the gentleman from Virginia. He has spoken of the judicial act of the 13th of February, 1801, as if the passage of it had been attended with improper circumstances, and thence has attempted to deduce the inference that it ought to be repealed. He read part of the Journal of the last session, and charged certain members of the House with having been engaged in opposing the public will at the time when the act was approved. The Journal shows, that on the 13th of February, eighteen hundred and one, the representatives, voting by States, proceeded to the twenty-ninth ballot for President, and the result was the same as had taken place before; the votes of eight States given for Thomas Jefferson; the votes of six States for Aaron Burr; and the votes of two States divided. Much has been said on this topic, which has at length been brought forward as a public charge by the gentleman from Virginia. It is now time that it should be examined.

According to the principles of our Government, the public will, when explicitly ascertained by an authentic act, is the law of the land, and must be obeyed. Of this there can be no doubt; it is beyond all question. But this public will is not merely the will of part of the community, a section of the people; it is the will of the great body of American citizens. The highest and most solemn expression of the public will in this country is the Constitution of the United States. This was agreed to by the General Convention; was transmitted to the Legislatures of the several States by the unanimous resolution of Congress under the Confederation; was recommended by all those Legislatures, when they passed laws for submitting it to conventions for their ratification, and was finally ratified by the conventions of all the States in the Union. It was thus established by the general consent. In this we should acknowledge the high authority of the public will.

There is, however, a misfortune which attends the argumentation of some gentlemen. They substitute a part for the whole; and would confound the will of a certain portion of the people, however vaguely expressed, with the will of the whole public body as explicitly manifested by an authentic act.

What manifestation was there of the public will relative to the late election of a President of the United States? The only authentic evidence of the public will on this subject proved, that Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, and Aaron Burr, of New York, were equally the objects of approbation. The majority of the electors had given them an equal number of votes. What then was the difference of right between them? Was it, that one of the candidates was a Virginian? Was it that the members of Congress were assembled on the banks of the Potomac, with Virginia in view on the other side? Must it be acknowledged as the prerogative of that State to impose a Chief Magistrate on the Union? Or was there a difference of right, because Virginia, with its extent and population, could make more clamor than any other State? The noise of so great a State may sometimes seem loud enough for the voice of the people of the United States. And are they, therefore, in this House to be confounded with each other? If so, the observations about the public will, of which we have lately heard so much from a certain quarter, must be understood to mean the will of Virginia; and we may thus judge of the argumentation when gentlemen from that State are speaking of the respect due to the public will.

Two persons were presented, in Constitutional form, to the House of Representatives, as being equally candidates for the office of President: one from Virginia and the other from New York. When they were so presented, the choice between the two candidates was devolved on the Representatives, by the Constitution of the United States. After maturely considering the question, it was for them, as ultimate electors, to vote as they judged to be most for the public welfare. They voted by States, as required by the Constitution. And are gentlemen to be here accused for exercising the Constitutional right of election according to the conviction of their own judgments? When called upon, under the Constitution, to elect one of the two candidates, were they not bound, by the nature of their duty, to give their votes according as the one or the other was by them judged to be more or less preferable? Upon what principle can gentlemen be accused of hostility to the interest of the people, because they did not think proper to elect the candidate from Virginia? Are our affairs already reduced to such a situation that it is to be charged as a public offence, if any member of this House has failed to vote for a Virginian to be the President of the United States?

It was the Constitutional right of members of this House, in deciding between the two candidates, to give their ballots for the one whom they believed to be superior in practical capacity for administering the Government—one whom they believed to be not hostile to the commercial interests of the country, and not disposed to subject the Union to the domination of a particular State, whatever might be its lordly pretensions in consequence of extent of territory or antiquity of dominion.

As the gentleman from Virginia has thought proper to speak of events which took place about the time of passing the act in question, allow me, sir, to mention one circumstance, of which he has said nothing. The act, as finally enrolled, was signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives after the balloting for a President had commenced; and the Clerk carried it to the other House for the signature of their President. The candidate from Virginia was then in the Chair of the Senate. The Clerk of this House, on first presenting himself, as was customary, at the door of the Senate Chamber, was not admitted. The situation came to the knowledge of a Senator, and was communicated to the Senate. After the sense of that body was found to be for his admission, the door was opened, and the Clerk was admitted to deliver his message, and present the enrolled bill for signature. It was then signed by the President of the Senate.

What should be thought of this, as taken in connexion with the fate of the act and pendency of the Presidential election? Was it a circumstance which must ever be remembered with mortification, and which therefore will never be forgiven?

To give a further color to the suggestion that the passage of the act was attended with improper circumstances, the attempt has been made to impress an idea that it was adopted without mature deliberation, and hurried through its different stages in a reprehensible manner. If we are not willing to be misled by pretext, let us examine what was the fact.

A recurrence to the Journals of the House will prove that the subject of the Judicial establishment was recommended by the President of the United States to the attention of Congress at two successive sessions. In his communication at the opening of the first session of the sixth Congress, he recommended the subject in the following terms:

"To give due effect to the civil administration of Government, and to insure a just execution of the laws, a revision and amendment of the Judiciary system is indispensably necessary. In this extensive country it cannot but happen that numerous questions respecting the interpretation of the laws and the rights and duties of officers and citizens must arise. On the one hand, the laws should be executed; on the other, individuals should be guarded from oppression. Neither of these objects is sufficiently assured under the present organization of the Judicial department. I therefore earnestly recommend the subject to your serious consideration."

In the House of Representatives, this part of the President's Speech was referred to a select committee. They reported a bill which contained a variety of provisions for amending the system. The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole, in which it was discussed several days, and was afterwards recommitted to the same gentlemen who had reported it. As it was printed for the use of the members, and the subject was extensively interesting to the community, it was judged proper to defer a final decision until another session, and in the mean time gentlemen might have opportunity to acquire information that would assist them to form a more satisfactory judgment.

At the second session of the sixth Congress, the subject was again recommended by the President. These are his words:

"It is, in every point of view, of such primary importance to carry the laws into prompt and faithful execution, and to render that part of the administration of justice which the Constitution and laws devolve on the Federal courts, as convenient to the people as may consist with their present circumstances, that I cannot omit once more to recommend to your serious consideration the Judiciary system of the United States. No subject is more interesting than this to the public happiness; and to none can those improvements which may have been suggested by experience be more beneficially applied."

On this recommendation a select committee was appointed. That committee reported a bill to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States. The bill underwent a long discussion and a variety of amendments. It was finally passed in the House of Representatives by a majority of 51 to 43; and in the Senate by a majority of 16 to 11. After knowing these facts, will gentlemen have the hardihood to call this a hasty measure?

Compare the whole proceedings with what took place respecting a former act. Gentlemen have spoken of the general power of Congress to repeal acts passed by their predecessors. Are they prepared to repeal the act to which I now refer? It is the act relative to the temporary and permanent seat of Government, passed in July, 1790. That act was carried in the Senate by a majority of 14 to 12. In the House of Representatives, a Committee of the Whole agreed to it as it came from the Senate. Twelve different amendments were proposed in the House; the yeas and nays were taken on each of them, and every amendment was rejected—all in one day. A motion was then made for the third reading of the bill on the Monday following; the motion was negatived. It was moved that the third reading should be on the next day; this was negatived. The yeas and nays were taken twelve times during the sitting. A motion was made to adjourn; this was negatived. The general rule of the House being against reading a bill twice on the same day without special order, a motion for then reading the bill the third time was made on the part of its advocates, and carried. On taking the yeas and nays, for the thirteenth time in one day, the bill passed by a majority of 32 to 29. Mark the smallness of the majority in both Houses; the utter rejection of every amendment in the House of Representatives; the hurried manner in which it was forced on to the final question. Recollect other considerations relative to the passage of that act, and then judge whether it was not attended with circumstances signally improper. If matters of this kind constitute a sufficient cause for gentlemen to repeal any act passed by their predecessors, why should we remain here in pursuance of that act? Will any gentleman say it is for our personal convenience that the seat of Government is now at this place? Is it at present for the public convenience? Is it less expensive for individuals, or for the public, than it would be in some of your commercial cities? Have you here the opportunities for valuable information which might be had elsewhere? What, then, should detain us, if it be not a regard to stability and consistency in public proceedings, combined with a regard to the expectations of respectable persons seriously interested in the question? But if you may repeal the act organizing the Judicial system, what principle is there that ought to confine the Government to the place in which we are now assembled? Repeal this act, as is proposed by the bill on your table, and you shake the principle of public stability and consistency. Repeal this act, and there can be no principle of Constitutional obligation, none of political honor, or legal right, to detain you here.

Gentlemen in favor of the proposed repeal have spoken about the act as if this organization of the courts did not contribute to the more convenient administration of justice. The argument deserves examination.

According to the original system, as delineated in the Judicial act that was approved in September, 1789, two courts, to be called circuit courts, were to be annually holden in each district of the respective circuits, by any two Justices of the Supreme Court, and the district judge of such district. The attendance of two Justices of the Supreme Court at each circuit court in the respective districts, besides two sessions of the Supreme Court annually holden by all the Justices at the seat of Government, required of those gentlemen such burdensome services that they at length addressed a letter on this subject to the President of the United States, who communicated it to Congress. On recurring to the Journal of the second session of the second Congress, it will be found that the communication was made on the 7th of November, 1792. The copy of the letter, as sent by the President, has been obtained from the Clerk's office. It bears date Philadelphia, 9th August, 1792, and is in the following terms:

SIR: Your official connexion with the Legislature, and the consideration that applications from us to them cannot be made in any manner so respectful to Government as through the President, induces us to request your attention to the enclosed representation, and that you will be pleased to lay it before Congress.

We really, sir, find the burdens laid upon us so excessive, that we cannot forbear representing them in strong and explicit terms.

On extraordinary occasions we shall always be ready, as good citizens, to make extraordinary exertions. But while our country enjoys prosperity, and nothing occurs to require or justify such severities, we cannot reconcile ourselves to the idea of existing in exile from our families, and of being subject to a kind of life on which we cannot reflect without experiencing sensations and emotions more easy to conceive than proper for us to express.

With the most perfect respect, esteem, and attachment, we have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servants,

JOHN JAY,
WILLIAM CUSHING,
JAMES WILSON,
JOHN BLAIR,
JAMES IREDELL,
THOMAS JOHNSON.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

It was undoubtedly in consequence of this communication that the system was revised at the same session of Congress. A further act respecting the courts was passed, and approved on the 2d of March, 1793. By that act the system was altered, so that the attendance of one Justice of the Supreme Court was to be sufficient for holding a circuit, with the district judge. In case of their being divided in opinion on the final hearing of a cause, or on a plea to the justification, the cause was to be continued to the succeeding court, when another Justice might attend.

This arrangement afforded a relief to the Justices of the Supreme Court; but, on experiment, it was found to produce serious inconveniences to suitors in the circuit courts.

It should be recollected, that the circuit courts decided, without appeal, all causes of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the value of the matter in dispute was between five hundred and two thousand dollars. To refer causes of this importance to a final decision of a single judge must be contrary to the sound principles of jurisprudence. But the mode adopted for avoiding this impropriety subjected the parties to accumulated disadvantages and expense, in consequence of delays which were continually occurring. Will it be too much to admit, that the decisions on the respective causes were generally delayed at least for one term in a year? What would be the average expense to the parties on account of such delay? If you include the expense for counsel, for witnesses, for the attendance and travel of the parties, on both sides, is it not moderate, very moderate, to estimate the amount of these items at twenty dollars for each cause? The expense for fifteen hundred causes amounts at this rate to the aggregate sum of thirty thousand dollars, payable by the suitors for delays resulting from the defective nature of the Judicial system. Compare this with what has been stated as the additional expense to the Government, on account of the new organization of the courts! A tax of thirty thousand dollars annually, levied solely on the suitors in the circuit courts, and levied in consequence of defects in your laws, was a burden of which they might reasonably complain. It was a burden whose oppressive weight the Government ought not to continue upon persons who had the right to demand justice freely, and without delay. The act of the last session, as it obviates the former causes of delay, relieves the suitors from this unreasonable and vexatious tax. This statement is not a mere affair of speculation. Who disputes the fact of there being at least fifteen hundred causes depending in the courts of the United States? It is proved by a document before the House. The document No. 8, notwithstanding its defects, exhibits enough to prove this fact.

The superior convenience of the new system is sufficiently proved, if it be possible for gentlemen to want proof of what is so evident, by the representations from the bar of Philadelphia, and the bar of New Jersey, if you regard professional experience, and by the representations from the respectable bodies of merchants in Philadelphia and New York, if you regard mercantile knowledge. Other considerations might be mentioned, to evince the general convenience of the new system, and the inconvenience of the former one; but the delays, uncertainties, and contradictory proceedings, which resulted from the late defective arrangement, have already been pointed out with such clearness and force of illustration, that it must be superfluous for me to dwell upon this part of the subject.

On the other side, reference has been had to a document received from high authority. It is the document No. 8, which has been laid before us by the President of the United States. If the Congress had wanted the information which that document professes to give, they would have called for it, I presume, from a subordinate officer, whose proper duty it would be to give it—the Attorney General, not the President. On this occasion, however, the Chief Magistrate has been pleased to volunteer his services. The purity of his motives is not now arraigned; but the propriety of his conduct is not perfectly unquestionable. Let me not be understood as insinuating, that he has intentionally given us incorrect information. The extreme impropriety of any such intention, without regard to the hazard of eventual exposure, should repel every idea of this kind: but the purity of motive does not impair the evidence of fact. No doubt it was the object to give us such information as had been procured. Yet, when information was not desired, why should we have such as has been laid before us?

This document, with a boldness of language bordering on poetic license, has been called an exact statement. After its incorrectness has been detected and exposed, we have a supplementary document sent to us, stating (I am not confident that I precisely recollect the mollifying style of the last communication, but I think it was nearly to this purpose) that there was some deficiency in exactitude. What opinion is to be formed of this proceeding? The Chief Magistrate comes forward, unrequired, unasked, and communicates a statement which is explicitly declared to be exact; and yet he afterwards corrects that statement by following it up with another. It must be unfortunate for the Legislature and for the Chief Magistrate, that errors of this kind should take place, because they tend to excite doubts where no doubt ought to exist. When the President of the United States, with his high responsibility, and all his means for information, is induced to come forward, in the face of the whole American people, and to make to them, through the Legislature, an official declaration relative to facts, it becomes his advisers to be well assured of the correctness of such declaration. When the President gives the sanction of his authority to any statement of facts, and affirms it to be exact, it should be entitled to full credit, beyond any possible contradiction.

The manner in which this document was mentioned, in the communication of the President at the opening of the session, would lead to the idea of its containing ample information respecting the business in the courts of the United States. At present, laying aside all the clerical errors which have been pointed out, I must be permitted to think, there are some others of such importance as to deserve animadversion.

After what has already occurred, I confess the communication itself strikes my mind as an Executive manifesto against the former Administration; and I deem myself warranted to consider the present attack on the Judiciary as having been comprehended in the general plan of hostile operations.

In a concern so important as this, where the stake was so great, and the game to be played so deep, it is not to be presumed that the First Magistrate would recommend the measure, as he has done, without advising previously with the Ministers, of whom he may be considered as the head.

If his powers are to be assimilated to the prerogatives of the British monarch, according to the spirit of what we have heard from some of the advocates of the present bill, it must of course be warrantable for the greater freedom and decorum of debate, to consider him as surrounded by his Ministers in council, and acting with their advice.

Taking up the communication, however, as we find it, what do we further observe? It is well known that circuit courts were holden in the Spring the last year, and again in the Autumn. Yet the document (No. 8) has reference to the 15th of June. If it was the wish to give a complete statement, upon which we might properly act with respect to an important system, why did not the Executive, with his Ministers, think fit to cause the suits for the whole year to be communicated, instead of a part of the year, during which the system could not have gone into fair operation? Why could not we be furnished with a report of the business before the circuit courts at their last autumnal sessions? Has there not been sufficient opportunity for obtaining the information? Why, then, is it that we have a statement for only the first part of the year, and not for the whole? Is this giving to us, or to the public, full and fair information? It cannot certainly be pretended that we have before us all the official information which might have been given upon this subject, although its importance is not to be denied. If we were to act on the information sent us, we ought to have been presented, as far as practicable, with a full view of the business in the circuit courts since their late organization.

But is the utility of courts to be tested solely by the number of causes, and not by the magnitude of the questions decided? A thousand causes, before courts of very limited jurisdiction, such, for example, as those before justices of the peace in some of the States, are of far less consequence than a single cause that might come before a court of the United States. Did the Ministerial advisers of the Executive hold the discernment of the American Congress in such low estimation as to imagine that, in legislating on this subject, the nature of the business before the respective courts would be wholly disregarded? Where great questions are litigated, your courts should be so constituted as to authorize great confidence in their decisions. The value of the interests immediately in controversy, and the extensive influence of the principles on which the decisions must depend, should both be considered in estimating the importance of a judicial establishment. Where life may be taken by sentence of the court, and where causes may be decided of the value of many thousand dollars—causes in whose proper decision the commerce of the country is seriously interested; where the causes are of this nature, it is important that the organization of the court should be such as to inspire confidence by its tendency to unite talents and character, with ample opportunity for mutual comparison of opinions and mature deliberation. Were the Ministry wholly regardless of these principles? Notwithstanding the facility with which further information might have been given as to the nature of the respective causes, especially in relation to the value in controversy, it is to be remarked, that the communication is wholly silent respecting these objects.

As I see the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) in his place, I beg liberty to notice again the dismissals from office in Connecticut. I refer to the case of the supervisor of the revenue and two collectors of the customs. If I understood the gentleman when he was speaking about the officers who have lately been removed, he would allow that there were some worthy men among them, although he appeared to be satisfied that, in general, they ought to have been dismissed for not conducting properly in office. His sense of justice, I am persuaded, would not permit him to apply this censure to the gentlemen whom I have mentioned. But as he did not make any particular exceptions, and his language might, perhaps, be construed so as to implicate persons very differently from his intentions, I could wish the gentleman to state whether he would have his observations understood as implicating the gentlemen who have been dismissed in Connecticut? If he will be so good as to do this I will give place to him.

MR. S. SMITH.—My observations did not apply to those gentlemen. I said nothing against them.

MR. DANA.—I am happy to have had this opportunity of making the inquiry. I believed the gentleman from Maryland to have been in situations where he might be informed respecting those gentlemen; and was satisfied that, if he had become acquainted with their true characters, he could not be willing to accuse them of having conducted improperly in office.

To resume the consideration of the document (No. 8,) it is to be observed, there is another material deficiency. The document has been recommended to our attention as if it were an exact statement of all the causes decided or pending before the courts of the United States. But is it so? No, sir! It is but an imperfect docket of the circuit courts; we must include in this description, however, the courts holden by such district judges as exercise the powers of circuit courts. There is no mention of the causes before the ordinary district courts. Not a word about the causes in the Supreme Court. Why are all these omitted? Is it of no moment for us to be acquainted with them, if we are to revise the whole "Judiciary system of the United States?" After the recommendation of this revision, at the opening of the session, such an imperfect document serves to argue an expectation that Congress would proceed to alter the system without examination of the subject. If it was prepared with a view to inform the people, what information does it give? Such as cannot be relied on. We have been called upon to receive it as completely correct; it is found to be palpably erroneous and defective.

In addition to what has been communicated to us on the part of the Executive, the system, which the present bill is designed to repeal, has been censured in the memorials of sundry inhabitants of the city and county of Philadelphia. Their memorials are all alike; different persons having signed printed copies to the same effect. What are their complaints against the act in question? The time of bringing it forward, the manner of conducting it though the several stages, the subsequent appointments under it, are all mentioned, and, for reasons in favor of repealing the act, there is a general reference to the debates in the Senate. It is not in order, sir, for any member of this House to mention, in debate, what has been said in the other House. By your rules, I am not permitted to reply to any of the arguments which have been urged by those Senators who advocated the repeal. This part of the memorial, therefore, cannot, without inconsistency, be regarded by this House. For the rest, what information is given you? The proceedings of Congress appear from their records, and, it is to be presumed, are at least as well known to the respective members, as to the memorialists. The mention of appointments under the act may perhaps be considered as implying some information unfavorable to the characters of the circuit judges. But, as to them, the memorialists cannot be presumed to have particular knowledge, unless it be with respect to judges in the third circuit. And these judges are spoken of in terms of high respect, by the gentlemen of the bar in Philadelphia and New Jersey. This honorable testimonial is from gentlemen of professional eminence, who have had an opportunity of personally observing the judges in attending the respective courts. To this effect too, you have the testimony of the very respectable body of merchants in Philadelphia, whose representation on this subject has been submitted to the House. They fully concur with the gentlemen of the bar in highly appreciating the services of the circuit judges. The characters of those judges are, unquestionably, placed on a basis too firm to be affected by any thing insinuated against them.

The representations from the gentlemen of the bar in Philadelphia and New Jersey, furnish a strong body of evidence in favor of the new organization of the courts. They are gentlemen accustomed to the transaction of professional business, and have experienced the comparative effects of the former system and the present. In a manner honorable to themselves and to their profession, the gentlemen of the bar in Philadelphia, although well known to entertain different sentiments on political topics, have laid aside their political distinctions to attend to this subject, which concerns the common interest of honest men of all parties; and have united to support a system which they believe to be of high importance for the due administration of justice. It is to be regretted that any member of the National Legislature should be induced, from any cause whatever, to give utterance to such sentiments as have been thrown out against the professional gentlemen who have borne testimony in favor of the present organization of the courts. Persons who have been intimately acquainted with none but the mere underlings of the profession, might perhaps be expected to indulge suspicious, that gentlemen so respectable as these, would state their opinions in favor of a system, solely from motives of pecuniary interest, and not from the conviction of their unbiassed judgment. An acquaintance with the course of professional business, however, might satisfy men of candid minds, that pecuniary motives cannot have induced the gentlemen of the bar to address you as they have done. It is to be hoped, for the honor of the House, that we shall not act upon sentiments so little worthy of the National Legislature, and so unjust to gentlemen of professional reputation. Sir, the testimony of the gentlemen of the bar on this subject, is one of the most respectable sources of opinion.

After what they have said, to evince the superior convenience of the present organization of the courts, if any doubt can exist as to the fact, it is to be recollected there is the additional testimony of mercantile gentlemen in the populous cities of Philadelphia and New York. It is observable, however, that the merchants of Philadelphia, and the Chamber of Commerce in New York, like the gentlemen of the bar, have abstained from any discussion of Constitutional or political questions. With a delicacy as honorable to themselves as it is respectful to the Legislature, they have left it for the respective members to reason on general topics; and have spoken of what has passed within their own observation and experience. The merchants address you with a particular reference to the commercial interests of the country. Will you deny their practical knowledge with respect to the business in which they are occupied, and for which they were educated? They speak of the proposed repeal as a measure which must be seriously prejudicial to their commercial concerns. It should be remembered, that the questions which very frequently occupy the courts of the Union, are such as relate to commerce, not only with foreigners, but between persons of different States. On these subjects Congress have power to legislate, and the Judiciary to judge. Much of the credit of the country, the assurance of obtaining justice, the national character for integrity, depends on a system for the wise and impartial decision of judicial questions. Is it not necessary to your commercial prosperity, that the foreign creditor of your merchants should have a security for as ample justice here as he could in his own country? Is it not necessary, in a national view, that there should be such an organization of the courts as will fully satisfy creditors abroad, or in the respective States, that their claims shall be fairly tried without being subjected to the influence of local prejudices? Let me ask, sir, are your merchants generally such capitalists as to make instant payment for everything they import?—They cannot do it. They must have credit, if the country is to continue its accustomed commerce. And we know that credit is not an object of compulsion, as it respects those who give it. They require a just cause of confidence. Credit is free as human thought. Mercantile gentlemen in Virginia, in Georgia, or any other State, when it is known that ample justice is assured to creditors in the courts of the United States, may obtain a credit abroad which otherwise would never be given them. Without a confidence of this kind, you must not, you cannot speak of your country as being in good credit. When gentlemen of extensive mercantile information address you in favor of these courts, as requisite for securing mutual justice and the prosperity of commerce, they are entitled to attention. They are a body of men who have too much honor to state for true, anything of which they are not well satisfied that it is the fact; and they have too much knowledge to err on a point so intimately connected with their pursuits.

What, sir, I pray you, must be the consequence of measures contemplated at the present session of Congress? If you abolish the internal revenues, and lay upon the commercial interest the burden of supporting Government, will you superadd the destruction of an establishment which authorizes general confidence, and is beneficial to your commerce both foreign and domestic?

Consider the representation from the respectable body of mercantile gentlemen of Philadelphia. If you abolish all the other courts, they request that the circuit court may be preserved in the third circuit. This, it is known, extends over New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware. The merchants request the preservation of this court, as being an institution in which their commercial welfare is most intimately concerned. If you resolve that all the expenses of Government shall be defrayed from commerce, will you not pursue an institution which may assist the merchants to obtain the means of paying the sums which you demand from them?

Gentlemen have undertaken to inform us that the State courts will be sufficient; and appear to have a peculiar jealousy of the Federal courts. But they may be reminded, that the present question is not what they may think, but what others will think of the courts of their respective States. Whatever may be the administration of justice in any of the State courts, yet they are not sufficient, in a national view, if foreigners or citizens of other States have not a confidence in them. The declarations of gentlemen, therefore, in commendation of the courts of their own State, cannot, in the present case, establish the point in their favor, unless it is also shown that equally favorable opinions of them are entertained by persons who live without the State. But why are some gentlemen so zealous for State courts, to the destruction of the courts of the Union? Shall we be told that such is the will of the people? While I speak, sir, of the people in this manner, I mean Virginia. Why should that particular State have a predominant influence for governing the Union? And why should a zeal against the Federal courts be particularly manifested from that quarter? Is it apprehended, if these courts should continue and become objects of general approbation, that the effect may be incompatible with some part of their policy? Is it apprehended, that there may eventually be issued, from the Federal courts, a process which will seriously affect some of their baronial estates? It would be too much, for this cause, to abolish a system which is so evidently formed for the convenient administration of justice.

As a further reason for repealing the act in question, it has been contended, that some of its provisions are unconstitutional. This, however, if true, does not require you to repeal the whole of an act, containing a variety of distinct provisions; although it might be a sufficient cause for amending the act, so as to remove from your statute book such parts as are judged to be not agreeable to the Constitution. A single provision which may be thought exceptionable, does not necessarily contaminate the whole of a system. Gentlemen have spoken as if the act in question had inflicted a wound on the Constitution. But will you, to cure a supposed wound, employ the guillotine?

A gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. DAVIS,) has charged the act with being unconstitutional, because it authorized the Supreme Court to issue writs of mandamus. He founds his charge on the idea that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is appellate, and that the writ of mandamus must issue from a court of original jurisdiction. Will the gentleman say, that it is legally correct to call the mandamus an original writ? Will he state what is the nature of the writ of mandamus? It is essentially appellate. It is in the nature of an appeal to a superior tribunal for redress, in cases where it is alleged that justice has not been done by a subordinate tribunal or officer. There is no novelty, sir, in allowing to the Supreme Court the power of issuing writs of mandamus. A provision to this effect is found in the thirteenth section of the original Judicial act, passed in 1789. Applications have been repeatedly made to the Supreme Court for such writs. Allow me to state one of them. It was founded on an act of Congress respecting invalids, passed in 1792. That act referred it to the judges holding the several circuit courts, to examine the claims to invalid pensions, and to certify the result, with their opinion in each case, to the Secretary of War, who was accordingly to place the name of such applicants on the pension list, except in any case where he should have cause to suspect imposition, or mistake. The judges, as such, did not think the act Constitutionally obligatory upon them; but, in several circuits, they agreed to consider themselves as commissioners designated by the act, and, under this character, proceeded to examine the claims. The result, when in favor of a claimant, was certified to the Secretary of War. There were questions, however, respecting the whole business; a further act relative to invalids was passed in February, 1793; and the Secretary did not place any of the persons, whose claims had been allowed by the judges, on the list of pensioners. It was for the purpose of having the names of one of these claimants placed on the pension list, that an application was made to the Supreme Court. In behalf of the claimant, Mr. Edmond, of Connecticut, moved for a mandamus. The motion was made in February term, 1794. I have an extract from the minutes of the Supreme Court, certified by the Clerk of the court:

"Wednesday, February 5th 1794.—Present: The honorable John Jay, Chief Justice; William Cushing, James Wilson, John Blair, and William Patterson, Associate Justices.

"Mr. Edmond, of counsel for John Chandler, a citizen of the State of Connecticut, this day moved for a mandamus to the Secretary of War, for the purpose of directing him to cause the said John Chandler to be put on the pension list of the United States, as an invalid pensioner, conformably to the order and adjudication of the honorable James Iredell and Richard Law, Esqrs, judges of the circuit court of the United States.

"The court informed Mr. Edmond, that when the trial of the cause now before the court should be finished, they would hear him in support of his motion.

"Friday, February 7, 1794.—The court proceeded to hear Mr. Edmond on the subject of his motion made on the 5th instant, and agreed to hold the same under advisement.

"Thursday, February 13, 1794.—The court proceeded to hear argument of counsel on the motion of Mr. Edmond, for a mandamus to the Secretary of War, made on Wednesday, the 5th instant.

"Friday, February 14, 1794.—The court having taken into consideration the motion of Mr. Edmond, of the 5th instant, and having considered the two acts of Congress relating to the same, are of opinion, that a mandamus cannot issue, to the Secretary of War, for the purpose expressed in said motion."

There does not appear to have been any question respecting the general power of the Supreme Court, to issue a mandamus to the Secretary of War, or any other subordinate officer. The thirteenth section of the original judicial act expressly gave the "power to issue writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principle and usages of law, to any courts appointed, or persons holding offices under the authority of the United States." And a motion for a mandamus was a regular mode for obtaining a decision of the Supreme Court, respecting the validity of a claim to a pension in the case stated. The decision was against the claim. Of course, a mandamus could not issue for the purpose expressed in the motion.

When such has been the unquestioned usage heretofore, is it not extraordinary that there has not been prudence enough to say less about the case of Marbury against the Secretary of State? In this case however, no writ of mandamus has been issued; although there has been a preparatory process of an inferior nature. On motion of Mr. Marbury, at the last term of the Supreme Court, a rule was made for the present Secretary of State to show cause why a mandamus should not be awarded to him for the delivery of a commission which was claimed by Mr. Marbury, as a justice of the peace in the District of Columbia. This was but a regular notice to the Secretary, of the application which had been made to the court. If no cause is shown, the next process is not a peremptory mandamus. For there are two writs of mandamus which are issued in succession; the first being the alternative, to do this, or signify reason to the contrary; and then, if no sufficient reason is signified, a peremptory writ may issue. But in the present case, neither of these writs have been awarded. By a rule to show cause, the court has required that notice shall be given of the purpose for which Mr. Marbury has made his appeal to them. This was not a mandate sent into the Executive cabinet, as has been represented. I have a certified copy of the rule of court, comprehending a statement of the principal allegations as they appeared in evidence. It does not make any mention whatever of the present President of the United States. But that a Secretary of State is amenable to a writ of mandamus from the Supreme Court, is a position clearly warranted by principle and precedent. A Secretary of War, under a former Administration, was not supposed to be exalted above the reach of such a process. He did not consider himself degraded by being called upon in this form where a question of right was to be decided, and a specific relief was the object. Is there anything, in a case like this, to make a difference between a former Secretary of War and the present Secretary of State? What are the facts respecting the application of Mr. Marbury? Several of them are stated in the rule of court, which has been published in a variety of papers. Mr. Marbury had been, with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed and commissioned, by the late President of the United States, as he fully believed, to be a magistrate for the county of Washington, in this district; and he applied to the Secretary of State for the commission. On principles of ordinary courtesy it would not have been expected, but it appears to have been the fact, that the Secretary of State was so far from delivering the commission, that he did not even answer the inquiry of Mr. Marbury, when he requested to be informed whether the commission for him was signed by the late President, and sealed with the seal of the United States.

There are some other circumstances which do not appear on the face of the rule to show cause, although they are mentioned in the affidavits, of which I have certified copies. After mentioning the demand of the commission, it is stated in one affidavit, "that when the demand was made upon the Secretary of State, he referred to his chief clerk, who answered, that the commission was not in the office, and had been delivered to Mr. Lincoln, the Attorney-General."

From another affidavit it appears, that Mr. Marbury "applied to Jacob Wagner, chief clerk in the Department of State, for an affidavit respecting the commission being sealed with the seal of the United States, and that the said Jacob Wagner declined making a voluntary affidavit, alleging that he did not conceive himself at liberty to make such an affidavit, in consequence of his official relation."

The chief clerk has undoubtedly conducted as became his peculiar situation. It was to be expected that he would consult the Secretary of State on the subject. Whatever personal civility might be agreeable to the disposition of Mr. Wagner, it was not proper for him, in a case so circumstanced, voluntarily to contravene the instructions of the Head of the Department.

On such facts it may be asked, why the point in question was so much avoided? Why was there this shunning, and changing from one to the other? Why all this dodging? Why all this consultation? Why give all this trouble about ascertaining facts, if they are doing right?

The next objection is one which has been made by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) I refer now to the gentleman who came forward assuming the humble style of a shepherd, and appeared so confident that the work must be done, and well done, on his coming to the encounter with his sling and his stone, as if to evince the nature of his pious zeal, he afterwards (if I did not mistake his expressions) gave us to understand, that in a certain supposed case, he would violate the Constitution, although sworn to support it, and then throw himself on the mercy of the people for pardon.

He has contended that the act in question should be considered as unconstitutional, because of the abolition of the former circuit courts. His objection proceeds upon the idea, that in abolishing those courts, the act abolished the office of circuit judge, and thereby excluded from office the justices of the Supreme Court, and the district judges.

Upon this point it is to be observed, that there never was, before the last session of Congress, such an office as that of circuit judge of the United States. It is true, that justices of the Supreme Court, with the respective district judges, were authorized to hold what were styled circuit courts. But the justices were all appointed, commissioned and sworn into office as justices of the Supreme Court, and not as circuit judges. In like manner the district judges were appointed, commissioned, and sworn as such, and not otherwise; this was their official character. The title of circuit judge was unknown in the laws of the United States. This objection therefore fails essentially. It is founded on the supposed destruction of the office of circuit judge, which in fact, never had a legal existence, until it was created by the new judicial act.

Another objection relates to certain district judges. It has been mentioned with an air of confidence, as if those judges were deprived of office by the abolition of certain district courts. And yet it is certain, that the office of district judge is not necessarily connected with the existence of what has been styled a district court under the laws of the United States. No office of judge of a district court, by that name and designation, was ever created by any of the laws. The name, however, by which a judicial office is designated at its creation, is perhaps as essential in a legal view as the name which designates a corporation. The only judicial officers of the United States, before the passage of the new judicial act, were the chief justice and associate justices of the Supreme Court, and the district judges resident in the respective districts. This residence is one of the essential qualifications with respect to the office of district judge; and from this the official name is taken. By the original judicial act, passed in 1789, the United States were distributed into districts, and provision was made for having in each of the districts, "one judge, who shall reside in the district for which he is appointed, and shall be called a district judge." In making these remarks, I have reference to the observations of a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) who expressed himself, more logically, perhaps, than the Virginian shepherd.

If I clearly apprehended his observations, the argument was founded on the use of the term court. He treated the subject as if court and judge were completely synonymous, proceeding upon the idea that there was a perfect identity in their meaning; and thence would have it inferred, as a necessary consequence, that you could not dismiss the court without dismissing the judge. Now, if this idea be correct, we might use "court" instead of "judge," and vice versa. How will this answer? Would the gentleman think proper in all cases, to substitute the word judge or judges, instead of the word court, as used in the Constitution and laws of the United States?

The Constitution, in the third section of the third article, speaks of "confession in open court." Would he agree to the substitution of "judge" for "court" in this case? Among the amendments to the Constitution you may find an article where it would be equally improper to use the "judge" as a substitute for the "court." "No fact, tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of common law."

This too, it may be remarked, is a Constitutional recognition of the common law, if the objection about admitting it in courts can be thought relevant to the question on the present bill.

In the fourth section of the judicial act of 1789, after defining the circuits, it is said, "there shall be held, annually, in each district of said circuits, two courts, which shall be called circuit courts." As used in this place, the word courts cannot mean judges, but must mean, judicial sessions. And will any gentleman say that these sessions could not be altered, or that one of them could not be abolished, if necessary, without abolishing the office of judge?

The truth is, sir, that the word court is used in various significations, all of which have reference to objects of a judicial nature. One of its plainest significations perhaps is, a seat of justice, a place where justice is administered judicially. It has another signification, as it is used for a judicial body, or the form of a judicial institution. We have seen that it is used to signify a judicial session. And there is a further use of it, somewhat different from either of these; when, after the session has been commenced for several days, the clerk is directed by the judge to open the court; here the word does not signify either the place for administering justice, or the judge, or a judicial body, or form of institution, or session, but the sitting for a particular day. And there need be no difficulty about understanding the term, although used so variously. The true meaning in any place may be sufficiently ascertained by attending to the subject-matter. And this is a sound rule of construction.

What were the powers of a district judge, as he is legally styled, under the act by which the office was created? In his district court, sitting alone, he might take cognizance of offences, where the punishment could not exceed thirty stripes, or a fine of one hundred dollars, or imprisonment for six months. Besides this, the act gave him cognizance of suits by aliens for any tort in violation of the law of nations, or a treaty of the United States; and of suits against Consuls or Vice Consuls, of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; seizure, and suits of penalties, under laws of the United States, and suits at common law in behalf of the United States, for the value of not less than one hundred dollars. Appeals and writs of error from his decisions to circuit courts, were allowed in admiralty causes, where the value in dispute was more than three hundred dollars, and in civil actions where it was more than fifty dollars exclusive of cost. This was the general jurisdiction vested in the district judges, when holding the ordinary district courts. The principal business related to causes of a maritime nature, and bonds taken of the custom-houses.

The new judicial act has been censured for abolishing the district courts in Kentucky and Tennessee. But what were these courts? The jurisdiction of the district judges, when holding the respective courts for these districts, was materially different from the ordinary jurisdiction. It extended to all causes cognizable in a circuit court, except appeals and writs of error. And for this exception, there was this decisive reason, that the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee exercised the power both of district court and a circuit court: it would have been an absurdity to say, that either of these judges should try appeals and writs of error from his own decisions. As there was this union of district and circuit powers, it was provided, that writs of error and appeals should lie, from their decisions, immediately to the Supreme Court, in the same causes as from a circuit court to the Supreme Court, and under the same regulations.

And it is well known, that the jurisdiction which might be exercised in the circuit courts was of an extensive nature. In criminal affairs it extended to inflicting the punishment of death. In affairs of a civil nature, it extended to suits at common law or in equity, where the value in dispute exceeded five hundred dollars, and might rise above this sum without limitation. Appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court were allowed only in causes for more than two thousand dollars in value.

What, sir, was done by the new Judicial act? It abolished the Judicial sessions that were styled district courts in Kentucky and Tennessee, and established new sessions under the name of circuit courts. But not a single Judicial office was abolished. Will it be said that the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee do not still hold their offices, merely because they are to sit with a third judge, who resides in the circuit and is called a circuit judge? All the former powers and jurisdiction of the courts may now be exercised

MARCH, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. of R.

in the circuit courts to be holden in those districts. For these circuit courts, it should be remembered, are different from the other courts of this name. The general power of ordinary district courts and circuit courts may both be exercised in the courts for the sixth circuit. Where the Judicial powers remain so essentially the same, will gentlemen contend, that this change of the mere name of the courts has abolished the office of those judges? The new Judicial act has drawn a clear distinction between the first five circuits and the sixth. By the seventh section of the act, it is provided that there shall be in each of the aforesaid circuits, except the sixth circuit, three judges of the United States, to be called circuit judges, one of whom shall be commissioned as chief judge; and that there shall be a circuit court of the United States, in and for each of the aforesaid circuits, to be composed of the circuit judges within the five first circuits respectively. With respect to the circuit which includes Kentucky and Tennessee with the district of Ohio, it is provided that

"There shall be appointed in the sixth circuit a judge of the United States, to be called a circuit judge, who, together with the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee, shall hold the circuit courts hereby directed to be holden within the said circuit; and that whenever the office of district judge, in the districts of Kentucky and Tennessee, respectively, shall become vacant, such vacancies shall respectively be supplied by the appointment of two additional circuit judges in the said circuit."

And, by the twenty-fourth section of the act, it is provided:

"That the circuit judges to be appointed for the sixth circuit aforesaid, severally, shall be invested with, possess and exercise all and singular the powers now vested by law in the district judges of the United States."

As the act required from the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee additional duties, although of precisely the same nature with those which they performed before, an addition was made to their compensation. But is there any power which either of those judges might before exercise in his official capacity, from which he is now excluded? This is so far from being the case, that even the circuit judges, who may be appointed to succeed the present judges in Kentucky and Tennessee, whenever their offices respectively shall become vacant, are severally authorized to exercise all the powers vested in the district judges of the United States.

Nor is this last a useless provision. For a district judge, although not sitting in what is legally styled the district court, may exercise various powers in virtue of his judicial office. For example, he may administer the oaths of office, and take depositions under the laws of the United States, and issue writs of habeas corpus, in which case he may decide judicial questions of a very interesting nature. He may also issue commissions of bankruptcy; and in such case may cause a jury to be empanelled for inquiring into facts before him, and after attending to the various proceedings, he may finally decide, as to allowing the bankrupt a certificate of discharge.

As to the question that arises under the Constitution, let me now ask what is the office of a judge of the United States? Is it not an authority or legal right to exercise the power, and to receive the compensation appertaining to a judicial employment? Upon this construction you cannot apply the terms court and office indiscriminately, and say that they have each the same effect. Is not this idea of the judicial office correct? Permit me, sir, considering its bearing on the present subject, to repeat the definition. The office of judge under the Constitution of the United States is an authority to exercise the power, and to receive the compensation appertaining to a judicial employment. An authority to exercise judicial power, a legal right to receive a determinate compensation, are of the essence of the office. While the judge is not divested of either of these essential attributes of his office, the judicial sessions may be altered, new names may be given them, and the jurisdiction may be increased or diminished. But this power of modifying the courts and varying the judicial duties, may not be exercised in such a manner as to produce the effect of depriving the judge of office by circuitous operation. This would be an abuse of power, which ought to be condemned as contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. The letter of the Constitution does not permit you, while a judge behaves well, to divest him at once of every species of jurisdiction. Nor indeed does it permit you wholly to divest him of the jurisdiction appropriate to his office.

With respect to jurisdictions, the Constitution, if you will attend to it, will be found to have marked one great distinction. Some of the judicial officers of the United States are to have authority for deciding in the last resort. Others are to exercise a subordinate power; and their decisions are subject to the revision of a superior tribunal. This distinction is important in jurisprudence; and very different qualifications might be judged requisite in appointing persons to offices so distinguished from each other. The Constitution establishes no other distinction of courts than that of supreme and inferior. It has made no distinction of grades between the various inferior courts which may be established by Congress. The jurisdiction of them all has the character of subordinate. And while you assign only subordinate power to a judge of the inferior grade, you observe the Constitutional distinction respecting judicial offices. The essential difference between them is in the jurisdiction. The decisions of judges invested with none but subordinate jurisdiction, are liable to be controlled by the supreme judicial authority. The justices composing the Supreme Court are invested with jurisdiction in the last resort; their decisions are above all judicial control. Vary, therefore, the judicial sessions and the judicial duties as may be found expedient; yet, if you do not change the jurisdiction from subordinate to supreme, the essential qualifications and rights of the judges of inferior courts may be said to remain inviolate, according to the principles of the Constitution.

Before the passage of the new judicial act, the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee were authorized to exercise judicial power in an inferior court. For this they still have authority; and their jurisdiction, retaining its subordinate character, is perfectly distinct from that of the Supreme Court.

By the Constitution, all the judges of inferior courts are to hold their offices by the same tenure as those of the Supreme Court. In this respect there is no distinction between them; and the principle has never been infringed by any act which has yet been passed concerning the courts of the United States.

The district judges, it may be recollected, were invested with original jurisdiction in admiralty and maritime causes, which might ultimately be removed into the Supreme Court by appeal. But what business of this kind was to be expected in Kentucky and Tennessee? Although officers of the customs have been appointed, I do not see a single suit mentioned in the report, as coming from those States.

Mr. DAVIS made some observations as to the reason of there being nothing from them seen in the returns.

Mr. DANA.—However that might be, so little business is done there that considerable salaries are allowed to the officers in addition to their fees. From all this I would only infer, that there cannot be in that quarter of the Union, many custom-house bonds, nor many seizures under the laws of trade, nor many prizes for the cognizance of any court. It may be presumed that district courts were established there from civility to those States, which had been recently admitted into the Union; for as to the principal business of ordinary district courts there could be none to require them. It was, therefore, no injury to the people of those States to modify the courts there according to the new judicial act. The business, whatever it was, has been transferred to a circuit court, which is to be held in each of the districts within the circuit. In this court the district judges are to sit, and with a circuit judge, are to have cognizance of every cause of whatever nature which was before cognizable by them, sitting in what were styled district courts. The judicial sessions have been varied; but no judicial office has been taken away. The jurisdiction to be exercised by the judges is, in its nature, the same as before; and the objects of it are as before, in all such causes as are cognizable in the ordinary district and circuit courts. The judges continue to hold their offices by their original titles; they remain authorized to exercise judicial power in an inferior court, and are legally entitled to receive their compensation, which has not been diminished, but increased.

There is one other argument in favor of the proposed repeal. It is in substance, that the act should be repealed to manifest the power of Congress over the Judiciary department.

In this view of the question, the bill on the table has been zealously supported. It is certainly a singular principle of legislation that you should legislate merely to show your power. But even if the bill should be passed, will it manifest the necessity or propriety of your exercise of power in the present instance? Although it may prove that you are in possession of power, will it prove your Constitutional right to displace the judges?

"During good behaviour" is the tenure by which every judge of the United States holds his office. If the idea were to be expressed in a negative form, it may be said no judge shall be divested of his office while he behaves himself well. Here the general sentiment is the same as when it is said "the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour."

If the term hold has any appropriate or legal meaning, so the term divest has its appropriate meaning on the other part. And when it is said a person shall hold an office or an estate, it is equivalent to saying that he shall not be divested of it. The question then is, whether the present bill goes to divest the circuit judges of their offices?

Will gentlemen say that this is not the object? What else can they mean? Every part of the bill is calculated for this purpose. It is the very essence of a Judicial office under the Constitution to be entitled to exercise Judicial power, and receive a regular compensation. But this bill seizes on the power and the salaries at once, and deprives the judges of both. It is not the act of the last Congress which directed that certain Judicial sessions should cease, while the judges were to exercise their official power in the same causes as before, although they were to hold their courts according to a new arrangement; their salaries, too, were not only continued, but diminished. By this bill you now strike at the Judicial sessions, at all the power of the judges, at all their services, and the whole are to fall together.

Are we to be told that this bill is directed against the office, and that in this view it is not infraction of the Constitution to pass it? Will gentlemen say that the procedure does not touch the judge, but merely his office? How is it possible to maintain such a position? It has hitherto been understood, sir, that a judge is a person having a Judicial office. If the office is destroyed, although the man may exist, the judge is no more.

We have been told by a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) that the term hold is technical, having reference to a person holding and a person granting. He, as I understood him, would have it believed that the President of the United States is the person granting, and that the judges hold their offices of the President. To support this doctrine, the gentleman reminded us that the President, according to the Constitution, has power to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint the judges and other officers, and to commission all of them. So, too, a gentleman from Vermont (Mr. I. SMITH) has contended that the power of appointment, as vested in the President, implies the power of removal, and, therefore, that the expression "during good behaviour," having reference to this power, is to guard the judges against being removed by the President.

As to the power to remove from office, I believe it is no where in the Constitution given explicitly to the President, with respect to any officer, although of his sole appointment; and it is to be remembered that the Senate have a voice with the President in appointing the judges of the United States. When the Department of State, of the Treasury, and of War, were established, at the first session of the first Congress, the Secretaries, by the terms of the act respecting them, were declared liable to be removed from office by the President. By the Judicial act passed in 1789, the marshals were removable at his pleasure. As the principle was recognised in this manner by acts of Congress, the power of removing other Executive officers has been considered as left to the President, wherever there is no prohibition. But the power of appointment does not, in its nature, comprehend the power of removal. These powers are not the same in essence. They are so different from each other as to be, in some cases, very properly vested in different persons. The marshals in the several Judicial districts may appoint deputies; but these deputies are removable from office at the pleasure of the judges. Under the Confederation, all officers of or under the rank of Colonel, for the Army of the United States, were appointed by authority of the respective States, but were commissioned by Congress, and removable by sentence of a court martial. As it respects Executive officers, however, it may be said that the President should possess the power of removal, because he is supposed to have the whole Executive power, and is to take care that the laws be faithfully executed by those officers. Although I do not question the general propriety of such reasoning, yet I may ask, whether Congress may not regulate the tenure of any Executive office which they establish? Where is the clause in the Constitution to restrain them from doing this? But after what has been done with respect to the heads of the several Executive departments, if the law establishing any Executive office is silent on this subject, the power of removal may be considered as resulting to the President by admitted construction. It is no part, however, of the Executive power, as such, nor does it concern the proper office of the President to remove any of the judges of the United States.

The gentleman from Virginia would have us believe, that the tenure "during good behaviour," as mentioned in the Constitution, has reference solely to the President of the United States. He has attempted to show, by his remarks on the word hold, that the judges hold their offices under the President. Now, if this doctrine can be completely refuted, the argument fails. Let us examine the Constitution. If the terms "shall hold their offices during good behaviour," as used in the first section of the third article, are to be understood according to the use of terms in other parts of the Constitution, it is evident to demonstration, that the judges hold their offices, not under the President, but under the United States. In article first, section third, clause seventh, speaking of judgment in cases of impeachment, mention is made of "disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States." In the same article, section sixth, clause second, "no person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." In the same article, section ninth, clause seventh, "no person, holding any office of trust under them (the United States) shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office or title of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince or foreign State." In article second, section first, clause second "no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector." In article sixth, clause third, "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office of public trust under the United States." Whenever the Constitution speaks of holding an office, and mentions under whom, it is invariably mentioned as being holden under the United States. The officers themselves are uniformly styled officers of the United States, and not of the President. In article second, section second, clause second, mention is made of judges and other officers of the United States. In the same article, section third, the President "shall commission all the officers of the United States." In article sixth, clause third, "all Executive and Judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound, by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution." The third article says, "the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour." And the second article says, "the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years." If all offices are holden under the President, under whom does he hold his office? As it respects the power under which their offices are holden, the Constitution speaks of the judges and of the President, in precisely the same terms. According to the manifest principles of the Constitution, they all hold their offices under the United States.

In England the principle is different. There everything, every office, all landed property, public and private, is supposed to be holden of and under the Monarch, because he is regarded as the Sovereign. There the doctrine of feudal tenure prevails; and, according to this, the whole realm is considered as holden of the Monarch. But it is a novel opinion, that, notwithstanding the express language of the Constitution on this subject, the feudal prerogatives of the British Monarchy are to be adopted as the rule for construing the powers of the President of the United States. I had before supposed, that the principle of tenure in this country, since the establishment of independence, was essentially different from that in England. I had supposed that the doctrine of allodial tenure was the true doctrine here, and that the landed proprietors in the United States were regarded, by the Constitution and laws, as the lords of the soil. Such I know is the declared principle of tenure in one of the States. Is it to be now assumed as a rule of construction in this House, that the President of the United States, like the Monarch of Great Britain, is clothed with sovereign power? Where then is the Sovereignty of the United States?

The Sovereign in this country is not the President, but the great body of the citizens, the whole people of the United States. This is the import of the Constitution. The result of the principle is, that all offices are holden under the people, who have ordained a Constitution, in order to establish justice, and have declared it to be their will, that the judges shall hold their offices by the tenure of good behaviour. The first words in the Constitution, "We the people of the United States," and every succeeding part of it, may be cited to prove, that all the powers of this Government have originated from the people, and that the offices of those in power are all holden under the people as sovereign.

Gentlemen have dwelt on the word services, as used in the Constitution, with respect to the judges: to whom are these services to be rendered? Are they to be rendered to the President, as feudal lord paramount? Or are they to be rendered to the United States, for the public good? Whose judges are they? By whose authority do they sit in judgment? In administering justice the judges of the United States render their services to the people.

In England the principle and language of the Government are different. From the Crown are supposed to be derived power, honor, office, and privilege. According to the feudal principle, the Monarch was regarded as the General, the Legislator, and the universal Magistrate of the realm. Even to this day the style of acts of Parliament has reference to the Legislative powers of the Crown. "May it please your Majesty, that it be enacted, and be enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled." His Majesty's army, his Majesty's Parliament, his Majesty's judges, his Majesty's officers, his Majesty's revenue, the accustomed forms of language, all have reference to the feudal prerogatives of the Monarch. Are gentlemen disposed to imitate all this with respect to the President? And must we now learn to say, the President's army, the President's judges, the President's officers?

If gentlemen are not prepared to go so far as this, the argument about the doctrine of tenure, which has been founded upon the supposed technical import of the term hold, must be given up. And if they stop short of attributing sovereign power to the President, and should wish to avail themselves of the doctrine of subinfeudation, their British precedents utterly fail them; for it was the law of England, as early as the reign of Edward the First, that in cases of feoffment the feoffee should hold only of the chief lord of the fee, and has ever since been the law. Any idea of regarding the President as a sort of intermediate lord, therefore, is inadmissible in the present case.

Indeed, the whole argument drawn from the practice under the British monarchy is inconclusive, even upon the principles of that Government. It is contended, in favor of the present bill, that the same power which can create a Judicial office, may destroy it at pleasure, and thereby deprive the judge of his office. And thence gentlemen would have it inferred, that the office of circuit judge, which was established by act of Congress, may be rightfully abolished by enacting the present bill. But the Constitution has directed, that the judges of the inferior courts, as well as those of the Supreme Court, shall hold their offices during good behaviour. Gentlemen, therefore, give to this part of the Constitution a construction accommodated to their own purposes, and say, that it has reference solely to the President's power of appointing and removing officers, and not to the power by which offices may be established. This is the scope of the argument. Let us now try it according to English principles, on which the gentlemen so much rely for the support of the cause.

In England, according to Sir William Blackstone, the "King is considered as the fountain of justice. The Judicial authority has immemorially been exercised by the King or his substitutes. All jurisdiction of courts are either mediately or immediately derived from the Crown." Of consequence, the Judicial proceedings are held in his Majesty's name, and all delegations of Judicial authority are regarded as grants flowing from the royal prerogative. The whole of the royal prerogative is considered as a family estate, descendable to the heirs of the blood royal. It participates of the nature of an entailment; and the Monarch, for the time being, is accordingly regarded as having an estate in the prerogative but for his own life. It is, too, an acknowledged principle, that a person who has an estate only for his own life, cannot make a grant of any part of it which shall be valid for a longer time. If he should make a grant for the life of another, yet, upon his decease, the person next in expectancy becomes entitled to the whole estate. This idea serves to explain the doctrine, that all Judicial processes were abated, and all commissions discontinued by the demise of the Crown. These, and other public inconveniences, resulted from the principle, that a reigning monarch had an estate in the prerogative but for his own life, and that he could not alienate any part of it to the prejudice of his lineal heirs. The interposition of Parliament was therefore esteemed requisite to enable the King to make grants of Judicial authority, which should be valid after his decease.

These, indeed, are not the doctrines of our Constitution. But, if they were, they would not authorize the measure now proposed. In England, the power which erects courts of judicature, and establishes Judicial offices, cannot abolish the offices at pleasure. This power is uniformly acknowledged to be controlled in every case where the judges hold their offices during good behaviour. Speaking of the King, Sir William Blackstone says: "He has alone the right of erecting courts of judicature." This clearly results from his being considered as the fountain of justice. It is at the same time within his power to determine what number of judges shall compose any of the courts. This is but conformable to the principle, that he is the fountain of honor and of office. It is, in fact, his acknowledged prerogative, to create Judicial offices by his grants, which are matter of public record. These grants, or letters patent, must pass by bill, prepared by the attorney and solicitor general. And yet it is indisputably the law of England, that the offices of the judges cannot be abolished at pleasure by the same power which established them. The offices cannot be abolished while the judges behave themselves well. This is settled by the statute, (12 and 13 William III. c. 2.) "For the farther limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject." From its relation to the Crown, this statute, of course, forms a part of what is called the Constitution of England. There is, therefore, a strong analogy between the two cases. After limiting the succession to the Crown in the Protestant line, the statute contains various provisions which were deemed of importance to the liberties of the realm. One relates to the judges; it directs that their commissions, after the limitation should take effect, be made quamdum bene se gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established.

Since that time it has been the settled principle, that the power by which the offices of the judges are established, cannot constitutionally abolish them during the life of the judges, respectively, unless there should be a forfeiture by breach of the condition of good behaviour. This gives to the judges a title to exercise Judicial power, and to receive determinate salaries. But the provisions respecting the judges were not deemed sufficient; for the King, having an estate in the prerogative but for his own life, was not considered as having the power to make a valid grant of any part of the prerogative of his successor. A subsequent statute was therefore passed, (1 George III., c. 23.) in relation to the commissions and salaries of the judges. By this statute provision was made, that the commissions of judges should be in full force during their good behaviour, notwithstanding any demise of the Crown, and that their salaries should be paid so long as the patents or commissions should continue in force; and the funds were designated out of which the salaries were to be paid after the King's demise.

The Constitution of the United States was, undoubtedly, framed with a view to the provisions of the two statutes. But there is reason to believe it was intended to give to the judges of the United States a greater stability in office than it secured to the English judges. In England, according to both the statutes, any of the judges may be removed, upon the address of both Houses of Parliament. The amount of this is, that the two Houses of the Legislature, together with the Executive, may divest a judge of his office. There is no such provision in our Constitution; but this omission did not result from inattention to the subject. From a message of the first President of the United States to the House of Representatives, in the year 1796, it appears that he had deposited the Journal of the General Convention in the office of the Department of State. The President referred the House to a vote which appeared on that Journal respecting the power of treaties, and alluded to the security of the smaller States under the Constitution, which he considered as being the result of a spirit of mutual concession. On examining the Journal, it is found that a motion was made in the Convention to this effect, that the judges might be removed by the Executive, on application of the Senate and House of Representatives. On taking the question by States, the motion was explicitly rejected. And yet, if the present bill should be passed by both Houses of Congress, and presented to the President, is not this, in principle and effect, an application to the Executive for the removal of the judges?

Evidence too may be found, which goes to disprove the doctrine, that the tenure during good behaviour has reference solely to the power of the President, with respect to appointments and removals. Among the documents deposited in the Office of State, there is a printed draught of a form of Government for the United States. From this it appears that the Convention had agreed that the judges of the Supreme Court should be appointed by the Senate, although they were to be commissioned by the President, and should hold their offices during good behaviour. In this case, the terms "during good behaviour," could not be intended to guard the judges against any supposed power of the President to remove, for he had not the power to appoint. These facts any member of this House may ascertain for himself at the Office of State. They are decisive as to the opinion entertained by the General Convention in 1787, and prove it to have been the reverse of the construction now attempted to be given to the Constitution.

Much has been said about the principle of responsibility, as if that could vindicate the passage of the present bill. The true principle upon this subject, sir, is that of personal responsibility. But where do the gentlemen find their doctrine of a collective responsibility? The President is personally responsible; but not the Executive authority, as such, for this is one of the three integral departments of Government. The members of Congress are personally responsible; but not the collective body. So the judges, as individuals, are responsible; but there is no such thing in the Constitution as a collective responsibility of the whole body of judges.

The President, indeed, may put his negative upon acts of Congress. The Senate may refuse to advise and consent to an appointment where the President has made a nomination. The Judiciary may say, that unconstitutional acts are not obligatory. But these powers of the respective departments in relation to each other, are not what is meant by this principle of responsibility. The President is responsible on impeachment and at elections. The members of Congress are responsible at elections, if not on impeachment. The judges individually are responsible on impeachment, where they may claim the right of justifying themselves against any accusers; as to them, there are no periodical elections. The principle of responsibility is applicable where persons can meet and answer the charges which may be made against them for their official conduct. This may be done by gentlemen, if they think proper, at elections, particularly where such proceedings are customary; they may know the time and place for hearing, and for deciding as to their conduct; and they may prepare their answers to charges, however vaguely exhibited. In cases of impeachment, there are formed articles of charge, a regular trial, and ample opportunity for defence. But, upon the plan of the present bill, the judges are to be divested of their offices, without being either accused or heard. The bill strikes at the collective body, under a vague idea of their being responsible; and yet there is not a single charge against them, and if there were, they have no opportunity of answering for themselves, before the men who undertake to decide against them.—There is nothing in the Constitution to warrant such a responsibility as this.

The gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. I. SMITH,) spoke of the acknowledged power of impeachment as rendering it vain to talk of the independence of judges. He appeared to consider such a responsibility as destructive of this independence. Another advocate of the bill, a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) spoke of the responsibility of impeachment as amounting to nothing in practice. To arrive at a just conclusion, it may be proper to take an intermediate course between these two extremes of opinion. When we speak of an independent Judiciary, the correct meaning is, that this department should not be particularly dependent for existence on the Executive or on the Legislature. This relative independence is perfectly consistent with the principle of personal responsibility. With respect to the departments of Government, their general independence of each other is a common security of them all. But the several judges, individually, ought to be responsible on impeachment for ill behaviour. The mere act of impeachment does not destroy the reputation. A person might be impeached for party purposes; officers have been dismissed on this account; but no man can say, with justice, that they merit reproach merely for this.

It is a decisive reason against admitting the power now claimed over the Judiciary, if they are to judge whether the acts of Congress are conformable to the Constitution. This, however, has been denied by several of the gentlemen who advocate the present bill. It is said, that this question must be decided by Congress. And gentlemen would now decide, for the first time, that the Constitutional validity of the acts of Congress is to be determined only by the result of elections; and that the judges, as composing a Constitutional department, have nothing to do with such questions. We say, if Congress can pass any acts at pleasure, and there can be no judicial opinion as to their validity, Congress might destroy the Supreme Court altogether. As to this power of destroying judges, there is no difference, in the principle, between those of the Supreme and those of inferior courts. The offices of the justices of the Supreme Court have been established by act of Congress. That act may be totally repealed as well as the act now in question. The present bill, therefore, in its principle, is a claim of power in Congress to divest the judges of the Supreme Court of their offices. This is a more serious claim of power than has been advanced before. Whatever may have been said of former administrations, they never claimed to command the whole powers of the Government through the Legislative body. Whatever might be said on the other topics, whatever questions might be made about the constitutionality of measures, there was one principle constantly admitted; and that was, to consider the judges of the United States, while behaving well, as placed beyond the reach both of the Legislature and the President. This gave a security to all parts of the community, against unconstitutional measures. For the judges, being independent of the Legislative and Executive departments, might, in the faithful discharge of their duty, refuse to give effect to acts contravening the Constitution. It was not pretended, that Congress, with the President, were authorized, at pleasure, to deprive the judges of the means of subsistence, by abolishing their offices.

It is for the judges faithfully to administer justice according to the Constitution and laws. No menacing power should exist to bias their decisions by the influence of personal hopes and fears. They are undoubtedly to give effect to acts of Congress in pursuance of the Constitution. But the Constitution, which granted to Congress their Legislative powers, is the supreme law; and the judges, from the very nature of the case, must pronounce on the validity of acts of Congress, as compared with the imperative provisions of the Constitution. When they are called to decide a cause, if they find on the one side an act of Congress, and, on the other, the Constitution of the United States, when they find these placed in opposition to each other, what is their duty? Are they not to obey their oath, and judge accordingly? If so, they necessarily decide, that your act is of no force; for they are sworn to support the Constitution.

This is a doctrine coeval with the existence of our Government, and has been the uniform principle of all the constituted authorities. The contemporaneous use of terms, the undisputed practice under the Constitution, have settled the principle. These determine the sense of the Constitution, by which we should now be guided.

Sir, it is not a new opinion in this country, that the judges have authority to decide against an act of Congress, if unconstitutional. This was the opinion which was practised upon in the year 1792. A question arose from the act of the 23d of March, 1792, respecting invalids. The act had been mentioned already. The judges in the three circuits determined it was unconstitutional, and communicated their opinion to the first President of the United States, who laid the subject before Congress.

From the journals of the House it appears, that the President sent a Message, on the 16th of April, 1792, with a statement of the opinion of the judges attending the circuit court in New York.

The statement, as sent to the House by the President, has been found in the Clerk's office. It is a copy, certified by Tobias Lear, Secretary to the President of the United States.

"At a stated circuit court of the United States, held for the district of New York, at the city of New York, on Thursday, the fifth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, at ten of the clock anti-meridian:

"Present—The honorable John Jay, Esq., Chief Justice of the United States, the honorable William Cushing, Esq., one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; the honorable James Duane, Esq., judge of the district of New York.

"The court proceeded to take into consideration the following act of the Congress of the United States, viz: 'An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions.'

The act, which is that of the 23d of March, 1792, is then recited at full length. It is unnecessary to repeat it now; and I will proceed to the opinion of the court.

"The court were thereupon unanimously of opinion, and agreed,

"That, by the Constitution of the United States, the Government thereof is divided into three distinct and independent branches; and that it is the duty of each to abstain from, and oppose encroachments on either.

"That neither the Legislative nor the Executive branches can constitutionally assign to the Judicial any duties, but such as are properly judicial, and to be performed in a judicial manner.

"That the duties assigned to the circuit courts, by this act, are not of this description, and that the act itself does not appear to contemplate them as such; inasmuch as it subjects the decisions of these courts, made pursuant to those duties, first to the consideration and suspension of the Secretary at War, and then to the revision of the Legislature: whereas, by the Constitution, neither the Secretary at War, nor any other Executive officer, nor even the Legislature, are authorized to sit as a court of errors on the judicial acts or opinions of this court.

"As, therefore, the business assigned to this court, by the act, is not judicial, nor directed to be performed judicially, the act can only be considered as appointing Commissioners, for the purposes mentioned in it, by official instead of personal descriptions.

"That the judges of this court regard themselves as being the Commissioners designated by the act, and therefore as being at liberty to accept or to decline that office.

"That, as the objects of this act are exceedingly benevolent, and do real honor to the humanity and justice of Congress, and as the judges desire to manifest, on all proper occasions and in every proper manner, their high respect for the National Legislature, they will execute this act in the capacity of Commissioners."

The remainder of the opinion relates to extending the session of the court for the term of five days, and need not be read at this time. The judges agreed, that the Legislature had a right to extend the session, and that the direction of the act, as to this particular, ought to be observed.

On the 21st of April, 1792, the President sent another Message, with the copy of a letter, communicating the opinion of the judges attending the circuit court in Pennsylvania.

I have the copy as laid before this House. Permit me to read it:

"PHILADELPHIA, April 18, 1792.

"SIR: To you it officially belongs, to 'take care that the laws' of the United States 'be faithfully executed.' Before you, therefore, we think it our duty to lay the sentiments which, on a late painful occasion, governed us with regard to an act passed by the Legislature of the Union.

"The people of the United States have vested in Congress all Legislative powers 'granted' in the Constitution.

"They have vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress shall establish, 'the Judicial power of the United States.'

"It is worthy of remark, that, in Congress, the whole Legislative power of the United States is not vested. An important part of that power was exercised by the people themselves, when they 'ordained and established the Constitution.'

"This Constitution is 'the supreme law of the land.' This supreme law, 'all judicial officers of the United States are bound, by oath or affirmation, to support.'

"It is a principle important to freedom, that, in Government, the Judicial should be distinct from, and independent of the Legislative Department. To this important principle the people of the United States, in forming their Constitution, have manifested the highest regard.

"They have placed their Judicial power not in Congress but in courts. They have ordained that, the 'judges' of those courts 'shall hold their offices during good behaviour;' and that, 'during their continuance in office, their salaries shall not be diminished.'

"Congress have lately passed an act 'to regulate, among other things, 'the claims to invalid pensions.'

"Upon due consideration we have been unanimously of opinion, that, under this act, the circuit court held for the Pennsylvania district could not proceed:

"1. Because the business directed by this act is not of a judicial nature. It forms no part of the power vested by the Constitution in the courts of the United States, the circuit must consequently have proceeded without Constitutional authority.

"2. Because, if, upon that business, the court had proceeded, its judgments (for its opinions are its judgments) might, under the same act, have been revised and controlled by the Legislature, and by an officer in the Executive Department. Such revision and control we deemed radically inconsistent with the independence of that Judicial power which is vested in the courts, and consequently with that important principle which is so strictly observed by the Constitution of the United States.

"These, sir, are the reasons of our conduct. Be assured, that though it became necessary, it was far from being pleasant. To be obliged to act contrary, either to the obvious direction of Congress, or to a Constitutional principle, in our judgment equally obvious, excited feelings in us, which we hope never to experience again. We have the honor to be, with the most perfect consideration and respect, sir, your most obedient and very humble servants,

"JAMES WILSON,
"JOHN BLAIR,
"RICHARD PETERS.

"The President of the United States."

On the 7th of November, 1792, the President sent a further Message, communicating the opinion of the judges attending the circuit court in North Carolina. Their opinion was against the act as being unconstitutional. The reasons for this opinion were given in a letter addressed to the President. I have before me the copy of the letter as it was sent by the President to this House. It is dated "Newbern, North Carolina, June 8, 1792." It is signed "Ja. Iredell, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; Jno. Sitgreaves, Judge of the United States, for the North Carolina district."

The reasons for their opinions against the act are stated at considerable length. The opinion of these judges is substantially to the same effect with that of the judges in the two other circuits. A part of the letter may be read, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour. In assigning their reasons for being against the act as unconstitutional, it is the first position :

"That the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial departments are each formed in a separate and independent manner, and that the ultimate basis of each is the Constitution only ; within the limits of which each department can alone justify any act of authority."

The question, if any question could be made about the authority of the judges to decide respecting the unconstitutionality of the acts of the Legislature, was now placed directly before Congress and the first President of the United States. What was done by them on this subject? Another act relative to invalids was passed by Congress and approved by the President on the 28th of February, 1793. This act prescribed new regulations for ascertaining the claims to invalid pensions. And the third section directed that no person who was not on the pension list before the 23d of March, 1792, should be entitled to a pension unless he complied with these regulations. It contained, however, a clause for saving to all persons their rights, founded upon legal adjudications under the former act. And there is one provision in the same section which is particularly observable as it respects the present question. It is in these words :

"It shall be the duty of the Secretary at War, in conjunction with the Attorney General, to take such measures as may be necessary to obtain an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States on the validity of any such rights, claimed under the act aforesaid, by the determination of certain persons styling themselves Commissioners."

The force of this provision will be instantly perceived on recollecting that the judges in some of the circuits had agreed to act as Commissioners under the act of the 23d of March, 1792.

We will now attend to what was done in consequence of the injunction laid on the Secretary of War by this second act respecting invalids. From the Journals of the House it appears that the Secretary made his report to Congress on the 21st of February, 1794. The original report has been filed in the Clerk's office.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Feb. 21, 1794.

The Secretary of War respectfully reports to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

That, by the act passed the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to invalid pensions," it was made the duty of the Secretary at War, in conjunction with the Attorney General, "to take such measures as might be necessary to obtain an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States on the validity of the rights claimed by invalids (under the act, entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of the widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions,' passed March 23d, 1792,) by the determination of certain persons, styling themselves Commissioners."

That, in obedience to the said act, an unsuccessful attempt was made in August last, to obtain an adjudication of the Supreme Court upon the claims of the said invalids, as will appear by the report of the Attorney General, herewith submitted, No. 1.

That such adjudication, however, has been recently obtained, and that the determinations of the Commissioners were held to convey no legal rights to the invalids claiming under them, as will appear by the report of the Attorney General, herewith annexed, No. 2.

All which is humbly submitted to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

No. 1.—Copy of a letter from the Attorney General of the United States to the Secretary of War, dated PHILADELPHIA, August 9, 1793.

SIR : In consequence of our arrangement, I moved the Supreme Court of the United States on Tuesday last for a mandamus to be directed to you, as Secretary of War, commanding you to put on the pension list one of those who had been approved by the judges, acting in the character of Commissioners. The decision of one case would have involved every other. But two of the judges having expressed their disinclination to hear a motion in behalf of a man who had not employed me for that purpose, and I being unwilling to embarrass a great question with little intrusions, it seemed best to waive the motion until some of the invalids themselves should speak to counsel. To this end I beg leave to suggest the propriety of a letter from your office to such of the invalids as have been certified to be proper for pensions, and perhaps it may be well to intimate the turn which the affair has taken, and I have just mentioned. It was very unlucky that, although one of the invalids was in court when I made the motion, and heard the difficulty, he omitted to notify himself to me until the court had risen, and it was too late. I have the honor to be, &c., EDM. RANDOLPH.

No. 2.—Report of the Attorney General to the Secretary of War, dated

SIR : I have to report that, in consequence of measures taken to obtain a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the validity of the adjudications of certain persons styling themselves Commissioners under the act of the 23d of March, 1792, the court has this day determined (in the case of Yale Tod) that such adjudications are not valid.

I have the honor to be, with great regard, sir, your most obedient servant,

WM. BRADFORD.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

We here find that the authority of the judges to decide questions arising under the Constitution was fully recognised. The first President of the United States, the Congress, and the Judges of the Supreme Court, all sanctioned the opinion by their official proceedings. And it is well known that many of them were members of the General Convention or of State Conventions, which agreed to the Constitution.

In 1796, the authority of the judges to decide as to the constitutionality of acts of Congress was further recognised. A question respecting the constitutionality of the act laying a duty on pleasurable carriages, was brought forward from Virginia. The Attorney General of the United States for that district had filed a bill in the circuit court against Daniel Lawrence Hylton for not paying the duties on a number of carriages, as required by the act. The material facts in the cause were argued. The defence was, that the act was unconstitutional. Judgment was rendered against the defendant in the circuit court. The cause was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States by writ of error. I have a certified extract from the minutes of the Supreme Court, stating the whole proceedings before that court. The error, for which a reversal of the judgment of the circuit court was prayed, was assigned to be, "That judgment ought to have been rendered for the defendant and not for the plaintiffs; whereas the same was rendered for the plaintiffs, there being no law binding on the citizens of the United States upon which the judgment could be rendered." This assignment of error shows that the constitutionality of the act of Congress was the point in controversy. But if there could be any doubt as to the fact, it is clearly established by an agreement which appears on file. It is in these words:

VIRGINIA January 25, 1796.

"I agree that the writ of error, 'Daniel L. Hylton vs. the United States,' which is now depending before the Supreme Court of the United States, be heard and determined at the approaching session of that court. I certify this agreement, that the cause may not be continued on my account; my object in contesting the law upon which the cause depends, being merely to ascertain a Constitutional point, and not by any means to delay the payment of a public duty.

"DANIEL L. HYLTON."

The Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the circuit court in this cause, and thereby decided in favor of the validity of the act of Congress. Three gentlemen were engaged to assist the Attorney General as counsel in behalf of the United States. One of these gentleman was from Virginia; another from Pennsylvania, and another from New York. It was a cause of peculiar interest and expectation. The Constitutional validity of an act of Congress for raising revenue, was to receive a final decision before the highest court in the United States.

On examining the annual statement of receipts and expenditures for 1796, it appears that the sums paid to the three gentlemen for their professional assistance, amount to nearly a thousand dollars. (The precise amount was nine hundred and sixty dollars, sixty-six cents.) There is no room to question that all this was well understood at the time. The statement was printed and laid before Congress. The payment to the gentleman from Virginia, (whose name is first mentioned in the statement) is expressly said to be "for his fees as agreed with the Attorney General, for arguing the cause before the Supreme Court in February term, 1796, respecting the constitutionality of the act imposing duties on carriages."

You here find the principle was so fully admitted, that the constitutionality of a revenue law was submitted to the decision of the Supreme Court; and, with the full knowledge and sanction of Congress, the sum of nearly one thousand dollars was paid to counsel, on behalf of the United States, for assisting the Attorney General in defending the act as Constitutional.

The principle, therefore, which is now disputed, has been settled for years. It is the established principle of the Constitution.

What, then, is the question under debate? It is a question between the whole people of the United States on the one part, and their delegated authorities on the other. Shall the Constitution continue to be what the whole American people have made it, or shall it be whatever the Congress and President may choose?

Say gentlemen, Congress must be answerable at the period of elections. This is all admitted. But why would you stake the whole control of their power merely on elections? On our part it is said, let there be all the security which elections can give; but let there be at the same time, the further security of the judicial power. If there can be no regular decision of Constitutional questions by judicial authority, if there can be no check except elections, what effectual check will finally exist? Why would you diminish the number of securities for the public liberty? This is too precious to be exposed to needless hazard, by abandoning any of the means established for its preservation.

While I speak of liberty, sir, let me not be misunderstood. I do not mean a liberty, the love of which is nothing but a general hatred of control. I mean the liberty which is guided by wisdom, and venerates the maxims of integrity. This is the liberty which should be valued as the political pearl of great price. But it is said, no man will consent to throw away his liberty, and be a slave. Would you therefore leave him no security for his liberty except elections? Ought there to be no other Constitutional barrier against usurpation? Whence is it, that so many nations of the earth, after breaking their chains have had them riveted again? Others, before ourselves, have had the right of elections; others have enjoyed the fruit of their industry; they have had public virtue; they have had personal integrity and wisdom. But to how many of them have their liberties been lost! The French had their elections, perhaps as free as ours; but we see they have lost their liberty.

What, sir, is the fair import of this language about elections? The principle, as far as it is correct, can amount to no more than this, that the majority should control the affairs of Government, and that the elections ascertain the sense of this majority. Apply then, the principle to this House. How are the Representatives apportioned among the several States? A majority of the whole number of free inhabitants in the United States do not elect a majority of the Representatives. The owners of slaves, besides other advantages allowed them in the Constitution, are privileged to have a greater voice in elections than the free inhabitants who hold no persons in servitude. The State which owns the greatest number of slaves, derives a preponderating influence in this House, from having the Representatives apportioned according to the whole number of free inhabitants, and three-fifths of the persons holden in slavery.

Where then is the Constitutional security for the States whose free inhabitants cultivate their own soil, against the States where the tillage of the earth is the task assigned to slaves? Compare the multitude of slaves to the south of the Delaware or Potomac, with the small number to be found in the States north! What is there to counterbalance the advantage given to the States where the slavery of the blacks is most prevalent? The Constitutional security is not to be found in the result of elections, according to the present rule of apportioning representatives. A security might be found in a judicial body, composed of men venerable for their virtues and talents, and placed beyond the reach of this House.

For such a security the Constitution was understood to have made provision, when it was ratified in the several States. By what right can you now rescind the compact?

Will gentlemen say, the Government cannot go on if there should be this check against unconstitutional acts? This might be pronounced a bold assertion, when it is remembered, that the Government has gone on, and gone on for twelve years, in the exercise of its acknowledged powers, with this principle uniformly admitted in practice, any of the people being at liberty as freemen to object, in court, against any act as unconstitutional; and yet laws have been enacted, and carried into full effect.

If any unconstitutional act is passed, what must be done for relief against it, according to the plan of gentlemen who advocate the bill on the table? Under all the disadvantages to which the free inhabitants of certain States are liable, in consequence of the number of representatives allowed for three fifths of the slaves, will gentlemen explain in what mode any of those inhabitants are to obtain relief? Must persons be subjected to the operation of an unconstitutional act until the period of elections comes round, and in the mean time be sending from State to State with a view to influence the electors not to vote for such representatives again?

Instead of all this sufferance, instead of all these efforts, which may at length be found wholly ineffectual for obtaining redress, especially under the present apportionment of representatives, why may not the injured citizen appear before wise and upright judges, and present to them the Constitution of his country, and receive from their decisions that relief to which he is justly entitled? While there are judges who are dependent on no party, but dependent on the fidelity with which they exercise their functions, men of learning and wisdom, who are placed under no bias from persons in power, but act according to the impulse of duty alone, I should suppose that they might be trusted to expound your laws, and guard the Constitution. Such an establishment is every man's guard against despotism. It is the protection of integrity against violence. It affords a covert against the tempest of party. It is the strength of the feeble against the mighty. Here the honest man might appear with confidence, assured that in trial and in judgment, truth and justice, and these alone, will prevail. Although covered by political clamor, with the opprobrium of guilt, while meriting by his conduct the honors of virtue, he might stand alone, strong in his innocence, and put to confusion a host of accusers.

Yet such an establishment is what is now complained of as an evil. Those who make the complaint, indeed come forward in the humble guise of respect for the wishes of the people, and claim to hold a control at pleasure over the judges. But who are such novices as to be regardless of the event of compliance with their views? When gentlemen arrogate to themselves a power never claimed before in the United States, it ought to teach them, and others, to be cautious. Gentlemen at least ought to hesitate, and reflect, that those who framed and adopted the Constitution, and have practised under it, knew something of its true import. If it is now supposed doubtful on this subject, where should we look for the rule of construction, if not to contemporaneous opinions and usage? Usage forms the standard of language. And whatever might be thought of the phraseology of the Constitution if now introduced for the first time, yet the sense in which it is known to have been understood, when adopted, and a period of years immediately subsequent, is that sense of the Constitution which the people of the United States have ratified, and which we are bound to support.

A number of interesting questions might be expected to arise, when the Constitution was formed. They were to be expected from the nature of a system intended to unite in one Government a variety of States, each of which were to retain their particular powers. When the system changed, from the terms of the Confederation to those of the Constitution, the riches and the forces of the United States were to be placed directly within the command of the Government; and the several States were no longer to have an equal voice in Congress, as before. But there were, at the same time, various restrictive provisions in the Constitution, which appear framed to guard against evils which might be apprehended from the change of system. Restrictions were imposed on the powers of Congress, and the respective States. Some of the restrictions, undoubtedly, were to guard individuals against public oppression; and some, to guard the particular States against the Government of the United States, or against each other. Controversies were known to exist between particular States, and others might be expected to arise, as well as controversies between a State and the United States. The parties in such controversies would be powerful; each might put armed forces in motion. When provision was to be made for questions of this nature, who could hesitate to acknowledge the importance of establishing an impartial tribunal, beyond the immediate control of either party? A tribunal, the constitution of which might inspire general confidence, and thereby prevent the recourse to a very different mode of deciding conflicting pretensions. And how were the restrictions on the powers of Congress to be rendered effectual, except by the intervention of such a tribunal? In what other mode could a fair construction of the Constitution be uniformly secured to the respective citizens and to the several States? This impartial tribunal, independent of party, and placed beyond suspicion of undue influence, should be formed into a Supreme Court, vested by the Constitution with power to decide in the last resort. Will you say that Congress may give a construction to the Constitution? So, too, a State Legislature may give it; and there might be as many constructions as there are State Legislatures. Will you then say, that the State Legislatures shall submit without reserve, to any construction that may be given by Congress? The members of the State Legislatures are bound to support the Constitution; and may they not judge of their duty as well as yourselves? Will you force them to submit? Remember the particular States divide the power of the militia with the Government of the United States. With respect to the acts of Congress, and of the State Legislatures, as compared with the Constitution, and with respect to the acts of particular States, when in opposition to each other, who shall decide questions so interesting as these? The Constitution has provided for having them determined by a Supreme Court of the United States. But if this court can be put down at pleasure by Congress, if the judges of the United States can be divested of office as often as parties change, what will be said by the several States? Will they not be naturally led to attend to the great disproportion between States, and the consequent power of one over the other? Virginia, for example, is extensive, and to add to her influence in this House, there are to be representatives allowed for three-fifths of the slaves. With all the preponderance of such a State, could a small State place a reliance on the decisions of this House, where the interests of the two States should be in competition? So, too, if a judicial controversy should arise between the preponderating State and one of the smaller members of the Union, will the small State have equal confidence in the decision of the judges, if they may at any time be divested of office by act of Congress? No, sir! In common sense it will be understood, that the power which may displace the judges at pleasure, and thereby deprive them of subsistence, can be master of the decisions. Establish then the principle of this bill, and who will be the lords of the Judiciary? If this principle should be ultimately established, you may look for such lords to the south of the Potomac—you may look for them among the masters of the three hundred thousand slaves that stock the plantations of Virginia.

MARCH, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

The establishment of an impartial tribunal to decide on the fundamental principles of the Government, is totally unknown under the British monarchy. The opinion of Sir William Blackstone is express, that in one and the same nation when the fundamental principles of their common union are supposed to be invaded, the only tribunal to which the complainants can appeal is that of the God of battles; the only process by which the appeal can be carried on is that of intestine war. Sir, it was because there was no such impartial tribunal to check the progress of usurpation, that the appeals to arms have been made in England, and "one monarch was sent to the scaffold, and another was hurled from his throne." It was not to weep over a fallen monarch, that these examples were mentioned by my friend from North Carolina (Mr. STANLEY.) It was to seize the spirit of history, and to remind us of the instruction to be derived from its admonitions. It was to prove, that when there are great and powerful parties in a country, with arms at command, if there is no impartial tribunal to decide between them the violence of their prejudices, when provoked, will prompt them to make the extreme appeal.

Sir, is it possible, in the nature of things, that injustice should result from allowing the judges of the United States to be independent of the Legislature? If they are once appointed to office, and you have no power to displace them, will not their regard to reputation influence them to do what is right? If they are men of talents, if they understand their duties, and are perfectly secure of being in office, so long as they behave well; if, when in office, they are rendered completely independent of the party by which they were appointed, there can be but little cause of apprehension respecting the decisions of the judge, whatever may have been the particular politics of the man. Place any gentleman of professional ability in such a situation, and he will know and feel, that he has an official reputation to support, and while he is free from any dependence on party, he must be weak indeed if he will sacrifice his character and rights of office, by submitting to be but the tool even of the party by whose influence he was appointed.

In the course of observations which have been made by some of the advocates of the present bill, there has been mention of what could be done in the case of extreme events. I hope none of the opposers of the bill has any idea of doing any thing unbecoming his situation, or injurious to the country. But it is not the part of wisdom to be blind to the tendency of measures. It therefore cannot be improper to reflect on the probability, if there is no independent judiciary, of seeing the States at length brought into collision. Unless there is a common tribunal which they will believe to be impartial, and to which they may resort for settling the Constitutional distinctions between their respective powers in a satisfactory manner, what must be the event but a return to the state of things under the Confederation, or a worse, as my friend from North Carolina (Mr. HENDERSON) has depicted? Reflect on the rival pretensions of different States before the adoption of the Constitution! Their rivalries and interfering claims were producing animosities which menaced the country with civil discord. And what enmity is more direful? Advert but to the scenes of the Revolutionary war, especially in those parts of the country where the inhabitants were most divided in political views, and were arranged against each other under the well known names of the different sides which they espoused!—When they were thus divided into hostile parties, was not their animosity far more violent than is known in any contest against a foreign Power? When the nearest relatives become open enemies, are they not of all enemies the most bitter? So when the people of the same country are rent asunder by the violence of civil dissensions, and are armed to contend against each other, are they not then their worst of enemies? And is there no danger of a condition of things like this? From this evil, it is peculiarly the duty of those entrusted with the Government to endeavor to save the people. An impartial tribunal, in which all may confide, is a great Constitutional security against such a calamity. This security, my friend from North Carolina (Mr. H.) is zealous to preserve.

We have been told of officers of the Revolutionary army who knew how to fight, and could fight again. When gentlemen tell us what they can do, we should not be unwilling to believe that such is their opinion. But would it not be better for the country to maintain the judges of the United States in office, and pay their compensations annually, rather than hazard a decision of this kind? When gentlemen speak in such a manner, do they expect all who are against them to be crushed in an instant? Sir! There are also men who fought in the war of our Revolution, who think this bill unconstitutional; men who have given as decisive proofs of their military spirit and talents as any on the other side. Can it be the wish of gentlemen, that these gallant defenders of the country should be arrayed against each other? Say, they have their officers! Have gentlemen also considered, what are their various means for so serious a trial? If they would have us judge, are they prepared to say what is the amount of their strength? What is the population of those parts of the country on which they rely? What is the number of the free men, which they might think expedient to be sent from home? What is the whole number fit to bear arms? What their state of equipment and discipline? And what their resources for supporting troops in the field? Are their armies already prepared? Since so much has been said about this very undesirable resort, let me observe, that, to the north of the Hudson, there is a single division of militia, respecting which perhaps it is not too much to say, that if, with a conviction of its being their public duty, and on the call of proper authority, they should be assembled complete in arms, for the defence of their Constitutional rights against usurpation, they would not easily be subdued by any force which could soon be sent against them, from the South, by the present Administration. They are commanded by a gentleman who is now a member of this House. But, sir, let me not be understood to say, there would be any disposition to rebellion in that section of the country to which I allude in general, although they should believe the present bill, if passed, to be an infraction of the Constitution of the United States. To say this, would not be doing justice to their character. No, sir! Whatever unconstitutional measures may be adopted, whatever powers may be assumed over the Constitution, gentlemen may rest assured, with respect to that portion of the country, in any event of the opinions of the inhabitants, that there will not be a rebellion.

In making these remarks, I speak of the tendency of measures. The principle, sir, of an impartial tribunal to decide questions respecting the fundamental rights of the society and Government, is an original principle of this country. When adopted in the United States, it was a novelty in the history of nations. The experiment thus far has been successful. To have established this principle of Constitutional security, is the peculiar glory of the American people. It enables the respective parts of the country to assert their Constitutional rights, and at the same time secures internal tranquillity. If you now destroy it, will not the people of particular States have cause to complain that they have been deceived, in the event, and that their property and liberties are not secured according to their just expectations? When the Constitution was adopted, was it not right to expect, that the observance of it would be guarded by the judicial authority, which might hold in check the Legislature and the Executive, if ever they should unfortunately be disposed to overleap the established barriers? Without this, what is the protection for the feeble States, if any of the large and powerful States should influence Congress and the President to concur in unconstitutional acts, and to raise armies, and to draw forth the treasure of the United States, to confirm their usurpations? The union of the States, according to the true principles of the Constitution, is highly, very highly to be prized, as it interests the whole American people. You might talk of this Union as a blessing, after the Constitutional security, which renders it precious, should be utterly destroyed. But there might then be many who will feel that the empty sound, although retained, is such a blessing as but afflicts them with the recollection of their ruined hopes.

Mr. DANA closed his remarks against the bill at twenty minutes past nine o'clock.

When Mr. BAYARD moved the rising of the Committee. Motion lost—yeas 32, nays 58.

Mr. PLATER.—I did hope, sir, from the proceedings of Saturday, that gentlemen who are advocates for this bill would have manifested a similar spirit of accommodation at this late hour of the night in granting us further time to express our sentiments. It is now ten hours since I have been in the possession of my seat, and I would put it to the candor of gentlemen, if the fatigue of the day does not incapacitate them from fully discussing a subject of such magnitude. I confess I feel myself unable to do that justice to the question which an earlier hour would have afforded, I shall, therefore, forbear a reference to the variety of notes I have been at the trouble of taking, and only state a few of the principles (without illustration) which will influence my vote, and then resign myself to the consequences resulting from the adoption of the bill. I cannot, however, avoid expressing my surprise that an honorable member from North Carolina (Mr. HOLLAND) should say everything which has been delivered in favor of striking out the first section of the bill is declamation, and nothing can shake his opinion. I very much fear, such is the temper of mind of most gentlemen on his side of the Committee, if an angel was to descend from heaven with a view of conviction, the attempt would be vain. I believe, if we recur to the President's Message, we shall discover he suggests a consideration of this subject, grounded on a statement of the number of causes instituted and decided since the establishment of these courts. Notwithstanding the document showing this statement is admitted by all gentlemen who have spoken on each side of this question to be inaccurate and fallacious, yet I will myself give it the authority they wish, and it will demonstrate that there is a sufficiency of business to justify the continuance of these courts in the circuits of Pennsylvania and Virginia. Is it then reasonable or right to deny the inhabitants therein law, justice, and protection, for the reason the same quantum of business does not exist in the eastern and southern circuits? This would be measuring justice with a partial and sparing hand indeed. Sir, the paucity of suits in these courts is the strongest evidence to my mind that injuries, wrongs, and oppressions have been prevented by the speedy and faithful manner in which justice has been administered, or the legal remedy in the old system was so great as induced suitors to give the State courts a preference to the Federal; consequently, its abolition, for the purpose of a change to the former establishment, must be productive of great delay of justice, great inconvenience and hardship to the judge. I did expect the ability and ingenuity of gentlemen, particularly some who have the advantage of being frosted by experience, would have given stronger reasons for discontinuing a system which was considered so requisite as to induce the most intelligent characters who sat on the floor of the last Congress to organize and mature, but in this I am disappointed.

Sir, the exclamation of the day is retrench, retrench! In my soul would I unite in this system of retrenchment, did I conceive it for the benefit of society; but when I see gentlemen determined to explode from office a certain set of men who are personally obnoxious to them, and thereby pull down and destroy a law before it is tried, it is impossible, under these circumstances, I can concur in this system of retrenchment. Permit me the liberty of asking if twelve months are sufficient to test the utility of this law? No, sir, they are not; neither any law whatever—the business of a court is not complete in extent in this limitation of time; but as commerce flourishes, population increases, and the transactions of men become more general and extensive, so are objects for the jurisdiction of a court promoted and augmented. How can it be expected we shall have characters valuable for integrity, legal information and respectability, to fill the Judiciary, when we destroy the very inducements to their acceptance—I mean the tenure of office? Is it to be presumed that men who are in the habit of acquiring a plentiful support by their profession will relinquish that for an appointment liable, on account of its uncertainty and instability, to terminate at a succeeding session of Congress? No, sir, your courts will be filled by needy adventurers seeking a support for the object of speculation, men of small talents, perfectly inadequate to gather the fruits produced by superior abilities. When I look into the Constitution and read, "the judges 'both of the superior and inferior courts shall hold 'their offices during good behaviour,'" these last words so clearly show the intention of making the judges independent of others for continuance in office, that every construction tending to pervert this meaning must assail and radically destroy the fundamental principles of the Constitution. There is no proposition more generally admitted and agreed to, and I can say with truth on which the judgment of the people of this country is more completely made up than that of the independence of the judges; it is esteemed essential to the security of life, liberty, property, and reputation, and this the Constitution has wisely guarded by its express provisions. If it is considered an office held during good behaviour is removable by the Legislature, you make good behaviour and legislative will of the same meaning and synonymous terms; this is so contrary to the common acceptance of these words among us, and the contradiction apparently so great, that I really have not heard one gentleman unfold and explain it; but they tell us we must resort to the jurisprudence of England for the definition of it. Can it be possible gentlemen are satisfied the men who compose the Parliament of Great Britain should be the expounders of a Constitution made by the people of America? This would, indeed, be a resignation of all law and language. A case which arose in Virginia has been frequently mentioned, whether an office held during good behaviour was subject to Legislative interference? The greatest law characters of the State determined unanimously it was not; in which the Legislature acquiesced. I repeat this in order it may bear on the mind of an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) who is now in his seat. When a petition not many weeks past was before this House, the subject-matter of which had received a previous judicial decision, he rose from his chair and expressed an anxious wish that the House would not interfere with the decision of a court. Now, sir, the bill upon your table is well assimilated, the judges of Virginia have unanimously decided on its constitutionality, and it is known that nine-tenths if not all the judges of the United States are of the same opinion, and nothing but the mere form of a record is necessary to make the case the same. I therefore should presume, if consistency is to characterize the legislative proceedings of the honorable gentleman, he must withdraw his support from the bill upon your table.

Sir, it is a principle universally acknowledged that no man shall be a judge in his own cause; once you transfer the judicial power to courts under the influence and control of a Legislature you frustrate the impartial administration of justice. I consider the Judicial department as the protector of the Constitution; it stands between the people and the Legislature to check the abuse of a trust committed to them; it is a particular province to determine the constitutionality of all laws—the case may arise wherein it will become the duty of the Judiciary to decide between the Legislature and the President. Should the judges be dependent on either, great apprehensions might exist; they would lean to that side on which their dependency existed. And should the Legislature and Executive unite to invade this Constitution, we should be left without a tribunal to give an impartial and disinterested decision. Thus, sir, you are dispensing with the only check to the oppression of an uncontrolled and unlimited power. And thus this fair and beautiful fabric, so much admired, by being deprived of its greatest ornament and best support, in consequence of this night's decision, before to-morrow's sun fulfils his usual course, will, I fear, vanish from your view.

Mr. FOSTER moved, that the Committee should rise. The motion was supported by Mr. GODDARD, and opposed by Mr. DAWSON.

For rising—yeas 33, nays 57.

Mr. TALLMADGE.—Mr. Chairman: Before this honorable Committee had, by their vote, decided the question a second time that they would not rise, I had fostered the hope that from compassion to the Chairman, (who has been confined to the chair more than ten hours,) they would have consented to postpone the further consideration of the question under debate, until to-morrow. I was encouraged in this belief from a consideration of the great fatigue which every member present must have experienced from the close attention which has been paid to the subject; and especially from a regard to any gentleman who might wish to offer his sentiments on the occasion. Since I am disappointed in this wish, notwithstanding the extreme bad state of the air within these walls, the very late hour of the night, [ten o'clock,] or my own lassitude and fatigue from these circumstances combined, I must beg the indulgence of this honorable Committee, while I submit a few remarks for their consideration.

The subject now under examination having been so ably and so minutely discussed by gentlemen of different political sentiments on the floor of this House, I had almost determined to signify my opinion by a silent vote, but when I reflect on the solemnity and importance of the present question, involving in my view, the dearest interests of society, I cannot excuse myself to my immediate constituents, to my country at large, or to my own conscience, without briefly stating the reasons which will influence my mind in the vote I am about to give. In doing this I will not trespass long on the patience of the Committee, which from the length of the discussion must be nearly exhausted; and especially when I reflect that the system to which the bill on your table immediately refers, is most probably devoted to destruction.

The first question naturally presented for consideration is, whether the law now under discussion, can be constitutionally passed by this House? And secondly, if it be lawful, whether such a measure would be expedient at this time?

Before I proceed to make a single remark on the merits of the present question, I take the liberty to assure this honorable Committee, that I shall not follow some gentlemen in their wild excursions after objects of extreme irritation and mutual re- crimination. I fear, sir, they have already been too freely indulged, in the course of this debate, to be useful to this Committee, or beneficial to our constituents. It would, however, be improper to pass over the whole unnoticed and unrefuted.

Very early in the debate, an honorable member from Virginia (Mr. GILES) introduced by way of preliminary remarks a prospectus of the foregoing Administrations. As if delighted with those subjects, which, in their nature are calculated to excite popular odium, he has, with much industry, selected those which would be most likely to make a deep and lasting impression on the public mind. We have been told, sir, that the creation of a public debt, which in court language has been called a public blessing, that the origin and establishment of the funding system, with all its attendant evils; the assumption of the State debt, &c., took early root and flourished under the fostering hand of the illustrious WASHINGTON.

With equal candor and similar good intentions has the odious system of internal taxation and excise been called in to his aid; the formation of banks, moneyed capitals and loans, with exorbitant interest, have been also held up to view; and what is more astonishing than all, the former Administrations have been accused of wantonly provoking an Algerine war, three thousand miles from our country, and an Indian war on our frontiers, for the purpose of extending Executive influence, by the creation of an army and a navy. Not contented with the imposition of burdens almost too grievous to be borne, they are held up to public view as inviting the barbarians of Algiers and the savages of the wilderness to indiscriminate pillage, torture, and death. To finish the picture, we have been kindly informed that when the authors and abettors of these national evils were about to be hurled from their power, the late Judiciary establishment (now about to be immolated) was formed as a sanctuary, or city of refuge, into which a few might escape to avoid the impending storm. These and similar remarks have been offered to the consideration of the Committee, during the discussion which has taken place; and to my astonishment and deep regret, the name of the illustrious WASHINGTON has been drawn in, if possible to tarnish his unrivalled glory, and to grace the triumphs of those who have but recently been advanced to power. On what other ground is it possible to account for this wanton introduction of characters and principles into the present debate?

Without attempting a reply to any one of those charges (all of which I think capable of the most complete refutation, and which have been particularly noticed by the honorable gentleman from Delaware) I cannot but express my astonishment that any such remarks should have been offered to the consideration of this Committee. For, in the first place, they could have no possible relation to the question under debate; and secondly, the great sensibility which was thereby excited, has been but too apparent to all who have attended to the subsequent debates. It was impossible to suppose that such bold and unfounded attacks would not be repelled with asperity and warmth. I shall, therefore dismiss the whole, with a most sincere desire that no occasion may again occur which shall induce gentlemen to wander so widely from the path of strict propriety and duty.

It has been well remarked by some who advocate the passage of this law, that if they supposed the Constitution would thereby be infringed, no consideration whatever, either of inconvenience or expense, which may be supposed to grow out of the present system, would justify so dangerous an experiment. To this point, therefore, it becomes proper that we particularly, though briefly, attend.

In the first section under the third article of the Constitution of the United States, it is thus written: "The Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Here appears to be a provision, exhibiting a positive injunction on the Legislature to form, and an assurance to the people of the United States that they should have a Judiciary establishment, to consist of one Supreme Court and other inferior courts, the number and titles of which should depend solely on the discretion of the Legislature.

In the same article it is further ordered "that 'the judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their office during good behaviour.' In this clause, the tenure or condition on which the judges hold their offices is expressly pointed out.

"And shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." By this clause express provision is made for the salaries of your judges, which cannot be diminished, but may be increased.

In searching after truth, it is always deemed prudent and wise to make use of such terms to convey ideas as are most familiar and obvious; and in deciding on the meaning of words, not above ordinary comprehension, it will never be deemed unsafe to give them that construction which they usually convey in the common occurrences of life.

As the very essence of the question now under debate depends materially, if not solely, on the true import of the terms made use of in the article recited, "during good behaviour," it must be of primary importance that their meaning be well understood.

In forming the three great branches of our Government, the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judicial, the Constitution has very wisely prescribed to each the manner of its election or appointment; the powers they shall severally exercise and enjoy, and the duration of their services, or their continuance in office. The members composing the House of Representatives are elected to serve for two years, the Senate for six years, and the President and Vice President for four years, after which they all return to the mass of citizens from whence they were taken. But when the courts are ordained, their continuance in office is expressly declared to depend solely on the contingency of their good behaviour. By what construction of language, I beg leave to ask, Mr. Chairman, is it found that the exercise of their functions, thus particularly marked out, can be construed to depend on Legislative will? Surely, sir, there must be something mysterious and unintelligible in these words, "during good behaviour," which in common life are vastly easy and familiar, if they can possibly be construed to mean during the pleasure of the Legislature. I think I have endeavored, in the integrity of my heart, to discover the true intent and meaning of that article or clause in the Constitution which ordains and establishes the Judiciary system, and I am constrained to acknowledge that I can hardly conceive of words more emphatical or more explicit than those which are made use of.

Let me invite the attention of the honorable Committee to the following plain proposition, and, aside from the question now under discussion, let each member decide for himself what would be the fair and honest construction of the contrast. A landlord offers to his tenant the occupancy of a farm, or any other privilege, which, for the consideration of his service, he conveys over to him to hold and enjoy during good behaviour. In process of time, and confessedly without any complaint of misconduct on the part of the tenant, the landlord turns him off, and deprives him of his living. What verdict would this Committee render if such a cause was now under trial? Or, in other words, may I not venture confidently to declare, that every honorable member on the floor of this House would advocate the cause of the tenant against his landlord, as the cause of innocence and justice against violence and oppression? I humbly trust I may. The same remarks will hold equally good when applied to a privilege or benefit granted, or covenanted to be bestowed on an individual, or on persons in their collective capacity. If this inference is correct, on what principles of justice or equity can the Legislature of the United States assume to itself the right of violating a contract, the outlines and leading features of which are expressly laid down in the Constitution?

When a court is constituted by a Legislative act, the proposition made, or the inducement held out to the candidate, through the Constitutional organ, is the honor of an appointment as a judge, and the salary which by law is attached to the office. The Constitutional obligation on the Government is, that it shall not deprive you of your office during good behaviour. When the appointment is thus constitutionally made, and the judge shall have accepted of the same, the contract is ratified and becomes complete in all its parts. The Legislature having thus fulfilled their duty by obeying the injunctions of the Constitution, has nothing farther to do in the business. The court thus constituted becomes a constituent or co-ordinate, not a subordinate branch of the Government, subject only to Constitutional control. Thus it appears demonstrably clear that the Constitution founds the tenure of office solely on the contingency of good behaviour; the Legislature affixes the salary to the office, and the judge cannot be deprived either of office or salary but in the mode expressly pointed out in the Constitution. Is not this the plain interpretation of the Constitution? Is not this a construction which may very emphatically be termed legal, political, and moral, accommodated to the understandings of all men, even of the most ordinary capacities?

But, sir, if gentlemen are determined on having the judges of your courts subject to removal, on other grounds than by impeachment, why is this power to be vested in the Legislature? Those who advocate the right which the President so freely exercises, of making removals, and thereby causing vacancies to happen at pleasure, would probably be more consistent if they would allow him the power of removing the judges also. If it should be objected that the Constitution gives to him no such power, I answer, that the Constitution gives no express power to the President to make any other removals. In the one case, the Constitution is silent with respect to removals from office, while in the other (viz: in the case of the judges) the tenure of office is expressly mentioned, and the negative may be fairly implied.

Our Constitution guarantees us a Government of checks and balances, so organized that the several branches of it have a necessary dependence on each other. No legislative act, however useful or desirable it may appear, can be performed by one branch of the Government without the consent and concurrence of the others, constituted for this purpose. Hence is derived to our constituents a degree of safety and prudence of immense value; and every day's experience demonstrates to us the benefits and blessings of these mutual checks. There is a responsibility attached to the Executive, very different from that which belongs to the Legislative branches of your Government; for while the latter are responsible only to the people, by whom they are appointed to office, the former is amenable for all his official conduct, immediately to the two branches of your Legislature, by one of whom he may be impeached and by the other removed, if found guilty, and absolutely disqualified from holding any office under the Government. If therefore the power of removal, now contended for, is about to be assumed, I ask gentlemen, whether, on the principles of our Government, the power would not be more safely lodged in the hands of the President than with the Legislature? Not that I would for a moment consent that this power can be constitutionally exercised by either; but if the independence of the Judiciary must be prostrated, I submit to the consideration of those who advocate the passage of the law which annihilates the late Judiciary system, whether the exercise of a power, which I conceive to be fraught with so much danger, would not be more safely lodged in the hands of the Executive.

If the doctrine of independency is taken away from the Judiciary, is there no danger that the Legislative power may be degraded to gratify the most vile and malignant passions? Surely, Mr. Chairman, there must be some radical evil, some very powerful difficulty, which needs the strong arm of the Legislature to correct and remove. This physical strength, I know, may accomplish the end, but in my view of the Constitution, it cannot sanction the wrong; it may indeed inflict the wound, of which I very much fear this magna charta of our independence will linger and die. The very circumstance of strength, or power, which the Legislature possesses, affords cause for apprehension, that when the barriers of your Judiciary are thus thrown down, it may at any time be wantonly assailed by superior force.

The Judiciary being a co-ordinate branch of the Government, with the Legislative and Executive, is a wholesome check upon their proceedings, and in this way may very justly be considered the guardian of the people's liberties. These three legitimate branches of the Government when united, may defy any attack; but the Judiciary from its very nature, being the most feeble, if unprotected by the others cannot long endure. Whenever a predominant faction shall exist (and factions may always be looked for under free and popular Governments) and your Judiciary shall interpose to arrest its progress towards any unconstitutional end, how unsafe and precarious must be our situation! It is therefore not only forbidden to assail her walls by any form of attack, but the contrary duty is forcibly impressed, to nourish and cherish this helpmate of the Constitution, as every noble and honest heart would the fair partner of his domestic bliss. In executing this duty, the Legislature perform one of the implied functions of their appointment, and a very important duty attached to their office. If this doctrine is correct, then it will undeniably follow, that every attempt to prostrate the dignity and independence of the Judiciary system, is an attack upon an important constituent branch of your Government, and ought to be resisted. Encroachments by the Legislature are perhaps the most dangerous, because the least suspected and accompanied by the most power.

Having thus briefly explained the unsophisticated meaning of the words in the Constitution, by which the Judiciary system is established, I shall forbear to make any remarks on the construction which some of the States may have given to the same expressions in their State Constitutions. Nor will I detain the Committee at this late hour of the night, to draw the parallel between the Judiciary establishment of Great Britain and that of the United States, in point of independency and inviolability. Had I time, I might quote copious extracts, from high authority, in point; I mean from the writings of the President of the United States. In his Notes on Virginia, he appears to have handled this subject with great perspicuity and precision, placing the independence of the judges on high ground. For the present I must content myself by referring gentlemen to that treatise, and particularly to that part of it which proposes a constitution for the State of Virginia. Indeed these points, with others which might be noticed, have been accurately explained and enforced by gentlemen who have preceded me in their remarks.

In determining the true meaning of the Constitution of the United States, it must be vastly important to know what were the arguments of the leading members of the Convention, when that memorable instrument was framed. Had I time, and was not the patience of the Committee nearly exhausted by the very lengthy discussion which has taken place, I would read many extracts from the debates of some of the most prominent speakers on that occasion. By these, we might with great accuracy test the opinion of the General Convention on almost every article of the Constitution. My honorable friend from South Carolina (Mr. RUTLEDGE) has favored us with some of those sketches, with great correctness, which must be in the recollection of this honorable Committee. One very important fact I shall not feel justified to omit. A motion was made in the General Convention, when the article respecting the Judiciary establishment was under consideration, to authorize the President of the United States to remove a judge from office, on the joint application of both Houses of Congress. This motion, after being thoroughly debated and maturely considered, was negatived. Sir, I am happy in being able to lay before this Committee such high authority; and in remarking that the enlightened framers of our Constitution, viewing the independence of the Judiciary of such vast importance, rejected the propositions as dangerous to the liberties of a free and independent people. What strong and irrefragable evidence does this, afford, Mr. Chairman, that the principle which I contend for is correct, and that the ground on which we wish to place this important branch of our Government is the same which it occupied when the Constitution was framed? Should any gentleman wish further information on this head, give me leave to refer him to the original documents in the office of the Department of State.

A further proof in favor of our position is derived from the reception which it met with in the State conventions. When the Constitution was sent to the several States for adoption, every article and clause of it underwent a severe scrutiny and a most critical examination. Perhaps no article was more minutely examined than that which respects the Judiciary establishment, and from what I then heard and have since been informed, I am induced to believe that the Constitution would not have been adopted, if the independence of your judges had not been deemed to be secured by that instrument. In most of the States, where the debates were preserved, it appears that this particular clause was discussed in direct reference to the independence of the judges, or the tenure by which they hold their offices. In Virginia, the doctrine which we contend for, has always been strenuously and honorably maintained.

It is objected to the doctrine that I contend for, that if the Legislature cannot annul the courts when once organized agreeably to the Constitution, they are paramount to the Legislature themselves. A very slight attention to this subject, I am persuaded, will prove this reasoning very incorrect. Legislative provision is necessary to bring into office the President of the United States. Yet the Legislature, as such, cannot remove him. Does it hence follow that he is paramount to the Legislature?

It is also remarked by those who advocate the passage of the law on your table, that the power which creates or necessity possesses the right and ability to destroy. The same Legislative power necessary to call a court into being, is also necessary to lay a tax, or pass any other law. I beg leave here, also, to take a difference in the two cases. The Judiciary is a constituent part or branch of the Government, by an express provision in the Constitution, and the Legislature only pursues the Constitutional will, as its organ, by giving to it existence and form; but its inherent powers are all expressly derived from the Constitution, which, I trust, will not be claimed to belong to any other law. The absurdity of this objection will further appear if the Constitutional mode of organizing the Government is but slightly examined. When the census of the United States is laid before Congress, a law must be passed apportioning to each State its number of Representatives. This law is again brought under the Legislative direction of the several States before the House of Representatives can be formed. Will this give to the Legislature a power to extend or limit the periods of their service, or in any shape to vary or alter their duties, different from the Constitutional provisions? I presume it will not. The same remarks will, in a certain degree, apply to your President, Vice President, and Senate.

It may be further remarked, that the salary of the President of the United States is fixed by law, even by an act of this omnipotent Legislature; and, by the Constitution, "it may not be increased or diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected." Will any gentleman of this Committee contend that the Supreme Legislature have a right to vary that compensation, even by the wholesome corrective, a refusal to appropriate? I trust not.

Of equal avail do I consider another argument, which is much relied on by our opponents, viz: that if you cannot constitutionally remove the judge, you may, nevertheless, take away or destroy his office. Really, Mr. Chairman, there appears to be a degree of chicanery and cunning in such a proposition, highly unbecoming the Legislature of any country whatever.

All laws, human and divine, require that the parent and the master should both feed and clothe the child or the servant. Yet if the master should neglect to furnish necessary clothing, and the servant should die in consequence of such neglect, the master, by this novel construction, would be clear. The judge, in this case, is not removed from his office, but the office from the judge.

It is further urged, that the national sentiment is expressly in favor of the repeal. But, now, sir, does this appear? Because a majority of the members, returned to serve in the present Congress, are in favor of this measure, does it conclusively follow that the great body of our constituents wish such an event? Is it not true, beyond contradiction, that many of the most prominent features of the late Administrations have been represented as involving our country in the most disastrous evils, and even tending to establish a monarchy over the people? Need I call to the recollection of this honorable Committee, the base attempts which have been made use of, to calumniate and traduce some of the fairest characters that have appeared during our glorious struggle for liberty and independence? For the honor of my country, and the dignity of human nature, I wish a veil could be drawn over the conduct of some who were so base as to assert, and others who were so scrupulous as to believe that the great founder of our independence had become an apostate. Well may America blush, when she is told that the illustrious WASHINGTON, whose bravery and wisdom so eminently contributed to establish our independence, has been libelled as a monarchist, and accused of renouncing those principles of rational freedom in which he embarked. If the virtues of his private life, and the more glorious and resplendent actions which adorn his public character, could not secure him from the envenomed shafts of envy and malice while he lived, it could not be expected that his political administration would pass unnoticed and uncensured when he should sleep in the tomb. Had the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) respected the feelings of those who venerate the memory, as they value the services of the unparalleled man, the ashes of the hero and the patriot would not have been disturbed on this occasion. Attempts like these have been but too successfully employed to excite the popular clamor against measures which have proved vastly beneficial to our country, against men whose services and sacrifices merit the gratitude of all. And permit me, Mr. Chairman, in this place, to deplore the prevalence of that party spirit which our great political father and friend, as in prophetic vision, foresaw would, if indulged, commit the peace and destroy the happiness of our rising Republic. I have indulged these few desultory remarks, founded, I trust, on solid fact, that I might hence infer the true ground of popular clamor, and that the repeal of the late Judiciary system has been called in to aid the design. How is it possible, Mr. Chairman, that the great body of the people should be so unfriendly to the late establishment, as the advocates for the repeal assert, when neither time nor opportunity has been afforded them to judge of its merits or defects! Surely, sir, there can be no solid weight in this objection, and I trust it will be abandoned.

I am not, sir, a professional man myself, nor have I any kinsman, however remote, who is to be benefitted in the smallest degree by the late Judiciary establishment; of course I can have no motive in defeating the passage of this law, but what is connected with the general interest of my fellow-citizens. So far as my knowledge and information have extended, I should have pronounced very favorably of the late system, as promoting dispatch in the administration of justice, and remedying many defects which were apparent in the old law.

Many other objections have been made to the independence of the judges, on the principles that we contended for, of which I will briefly state a few as they have occurred.

Say our opponents, if putting down or annulling a court violates the Constitution, this was effectually done by enacting the law now proposed to be repealed. If the fact should be admitted, what argument can possibly be drawn from hence to favor the proposed repeal? If a former Legislature has done wrong, is the evil remedied by continuing the practice? But I trust, sir, the principles and provisions of that law are capable of the most complete and perfect defence; nor would I now omit the reply, had I not a full belief that this honorable Committee must be impressed with what has been urged on that subject, especially by my colleague, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) viz:

The expense and dangerous tendency resulting from such a number of judges.

The small number of causes which have been brought into those courts.

The peculiar benefits to be derived from State tribunals.

MARCH, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

The omnipotence of Federal courts, and the aspiring ambitious views of the judges, manifested in their calling States to bow to their sovereign mandates, and using the late Sedition law as a political engine for persecution.

Judges becoming Federal apostles, preaching up federalism when on the duties of their circuits, and looking for objects on which to satiate their vengeance.

The peculiar state of the Legislature when the law now under consideration was passed.

These and a variety of similar objections have been stated, and the same have been so fully and repeatedly refuted, that any further attempt on my part to obviate their force, or expose their absurdities, I am aware, might be deemed by many, but useless repetitions. I cannot but consider them as calculated for no better purpose than to inflame and mislead the public mind, and to divert its attention from a consideration of the true merits of the question now before the Committee.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) has thought proper to introduce the teachers of religion into his argument for abolishing the Judiciary. They have been represented as converting their pulpits into political forums, and stirring up all the angry passions of the human mind. If these assertions were literally true, it is not perceived that they could have any possible bearing upon the present question. But in justice to that venerable class of our fellow-citizens I feel constrained to declare that I think them undeserving so general and so illiberal an attack. Throughout New England, they have long and deservedly been considered as a learned, pious, unassuming, and very useful class of men. Devoted to study and instruction, and relieved from the cares and the burdens of State, their time and talents are devoted to moral pursuits. To this, as one of the most prominent features in the establishment of the Northern and Eastern States, may it safely be asserted, that we owe much of that sobriety and regularity which has heretofore so eminently contributed to our prosperity and glory. When suitable occasions present, wherein consists the political sin, or even the impropriety, that the teachers of morality should also be instructors in the science of good government? Through the late Revolutionary war, no class of men were more eminent for their exertions in the cause of our country, and at no period have they been found opposing the general good, manifested in the Constitution and laws of our country. Among this class of men, so far as my knowledge has extended, anarchy and disorganization have found few, very few, abettors. However irrelevant these remarks may appear to the subject now under discussion, I deem no apology on my part necessary, when it is known that a meritorious class of our citizens have been wantonly attacked, without the power of vindication or reply.

But, Mr. Chairman, I beg leave further to remark, that if the constitutionality of the law in question admitted of no doubt, still the expediency of the measure, at this juncture, is very questionable indeed.

The importance of having Federal tribunals open to all who may prefer them to the State courts.

The prospect of obtaining speedy and prompt decisions with the least possible expense.

The favorable reception on which the new establishment has met with, evidenced by declarations and memorials from those the most competent to estimate its utility and worth.

The special and peculiar benefits hence resulting to the commercial interest, from which your revenue is almost exclusively drawn. And the manifest inconveniences and defects of the old system, which are in a great measure remedied by the new, are reasons of no small or trifling consideration, to induce the continuance of the new establishment. On each of these I might dilate, but presume that every member of this Committee must feel impressed with their importance. Innovations on established principles and forms have ever been deemed dangerous; at any rate it is a mark of prudence not to run hastily into them. In the case before us, time has hardly been given for a fair experiment; and if the institution is to be tested by its usefulness, no prudent and unprejudiced man can say that we are ripe for such a decision. If it should, therefore, only be doubtful as to its utility and expediency, may it not be hoped that a majority of this Committee will declare, by their vote, that they will at least give it a further trial. If, on further experiment, the system should be found defective, or inexpedient, will it not then be as fully within the power of the Legislature to repeal the law in question as at the present time? If gentlemen who advocate a repeal of the late Judiciary establishment are correct in their ideas, that a majority of our constituents prefer such a measure, surely there can be no danger of their losing either the power or the inclination to accomplish so desirable an end. I would further remark, that if the accession of moneyed men to the community, may be considered of any avail, no circumstance of governmental interference will contribute so effectually to this end, as the establishment and maintenance of an independent Federal Judiciary. To this branch of your Government, men of property always look with confidence for support. Without stability in this important branch, your moneyed capitals will be drawn off, and those which were designed for this country will be turned into some other course. The same remarks will apply with equal force to the sale of your wild lands. Need I turn the attention of this Committee to those States which have been recently formed for examples. The iniquities and evils which have been practised on non-resident proprietors, under State Legislatures and State Judiciaries, have been incalculably great; and if your Federal tribunals should be prostrated, or the confidence of the community in them weakened, these evils would undoubtedly increase, and the value of your new land would greatly diminish. Let it not be remarked that the State courts are sufficient for all these salutary purposes, as well to excite confidence as to protect property. These institutions of our State governments, I venerate as much as any man, but where strangers and foreigners are concerned, or even citizens of different States, the objection is of no avail.

Mr. Chairman, we have now progressed thirteen years, under the auspices of a constitution, ordained for the express purpose to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, and until very lately I have never heard the independence of your Judiciary called in question. Give me leave, sir, to call on gentlemen, from whom I differ in sentiment on this subject, to inquire coolly and dispassionately of each other, whether they would have contested this principle if the late appointments in the Judiciary had not taken place. Sir, if this barrier should be broken down, I see nothing to prevent a future Legislature, if it should be so disposed, from prostrating your Supreme Court at their feet. In fact the principle now contended for by the advocates of the present bill, goes all lengths towards prostrating the independence of your Judiciary in all its branches. Are gentlemen prepared to adopt such a system as this? Are the advocates for this novel doctrine willing to declare that the temple of justice shall be broken up, her purity violated, and her glory, honor and independence buried in ruins? Surely, sir, these are not visionary ideas; but they appear to me to result naturally, if not necessarily, from the success of the present measure. I am by no means disposed to excite needless alarm; far less do I wish to portray the evils attendant on civil war. Too much, it appears to me, has been said on that subject already. Some gentlemen talk of a civil war, of a revolution in our country, of swords and bayonets, and of friends and relatives set in hostile array against each other, as of the most trifling, and common occurrences in life. Indeed one gentleman (Mr. NICHOLSON) has borrowed an unusually bold metaphor and has told us of a cloud of bayonets: and, as if not contented with calling in domestic force to his aid, it would seem as if celestial interference was expected. Sir, I have passed through one revolution, and shared in its toils from its commencement to its issue, and most devoutly do I pray never to behold another. The language sometimes held upon the floor of this House, looks more like preparation for battle, than for cool and deliberate discussion. Although I accord with the honorable Speaker in his remarks on this particular point of the subject, yet I cannot believe him correct in the full extent of his doctrine. He supposes it would be hardly possible to bring our country to such a state of irritation as to take up arms against each other. Sir, the seeds of every evil passion are the native production of every heart, and suitable excitement will bring them into exercise. Let this Government and Constitution be prostrated, and I have no hesitation in declaring that a civil war must be our portion. For heaven's sake, for our country's sake, let every thing tending to such an issue, be most carefully avoided!

Although I am not about to say, that if you pass the bill on your table, a revolution will ensue, yet I do say that such terrific declarations as are held up to our consideration, have a tendency to prepare the public mind for such a deplorable issue. The National Legislature not only gives law but also a kind of political tone to our country. It ought therefore to be a school not only of sound policy and good Government but also of urbanity and politeness. When our constituents are persuaded that our conduct is influenced by a regard to their interests and the public good, it may be hoped that they will imitate our example.

The blessings of peace and independence were but half secured, before the Constitution of the United States was formed and adopted; and give me leave to add that the brightest star in this new political constellation is your independent Judiciary.

In the present constitution of human nature, Government and efficient laws are absolutely necessary; in the structure of which passion and party views too frequently mislead the judgment and obscure the understanding. A sober and dispassionate corrective becomes, therefore, absolutely necessary. Your tribunals of justice afford the necessary relief. Here the rich and the poor, the strong and the weak, meet on equal ground; and what I claim to be a principal excellence, inherent in their very nature, may here be found, viz. a right to decide between the Constitution and the law. However terrific this may appear to some gentlemen, who advocate the omnipotence of the Legislature, I consider the power which the Judges from the very nature of their office possess, of declaring a law null and void which contravenes the Constitution, to be of the highest importance, and attended with the happiest effects. What safety is there to any individual, or even to the community at large, if this Constitutional check should be removed! If the Legislature are to judge in the last resort on the constitutionality of their laws, what hope can there be entertained of redress, even should they violate the principles of the Constitution in the most flagrant manner? A consolidated Government is the direct result of Legislative and Judicial powers being vested in the same body. No people can long remain free, whose Legislature assumes the right first to enact and then to expound her laws. The late revolutionary tribunals in France advanced but one grade further, and executed their laws themselves, and surely no people were more wretched, and no tyranny more complete. Every encroachment on Constitutional prerogatives, tends to absolute and complete despotism. If a law should be declared unconstitutional by a court, it would by no means follow from thence, that they claimed superiority over the Legislature; but that in the exercise of their functions, they pronounce the sovereign will of the people, expressed or implied in the Constitution, which is superior to both. Indeed, if this part of their duty should be omitted their oaths would be ineffectual, and perjury would be justly imputed to them. I am happy that on that point of the argument, one of our opponents (Mr. Bacon) fully accords with us in sentiment and allows to all courts the discretion of pronouncing between the Constitution and the law.

Between a government of laws and a government of force there is no medium. If your fountains of justice are pure, independent, and free from restraint, your land will enjoy prosperity, and your people will be tranquil and happy; but if the law on your table should have a tendency (as I very much fear is the case) to make the Judiciary the subservient panders and tools of the Legislature, too late will posterity bewail the decision of this inauspicious day.

Mr. T. concluded his remarks against the bill a quarter before eleven, after which, Mr. LOWNDES spoke for a few minutes against the passage of the bill.

When the main question was taken, on striking out the first section of the bill, and lost—yeas 31, nays 60.

Mr. BAYARD rose and stated his desire to offer certain amendments, the objects of which he specified; and his preponderating wish that they should be discussed in the Committee of the Whole. But he added, that he should not object to the Committee rising and reporting the bill, provided an opportunity were allowed in the House to offer them.

Mr. GRISWOLD was of opinion that it was most proper that the amendments should be made in the Committee; he therefore moved that the Committee rise and ask leave to sit again, in order that the amendments might be submitted to-morrow. The question on rising was taken and lost—yeas 37, nays 54.

The remaining sections of the bill were then read, without any amendments being offered. When the Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendments; and then the House adjourned, at a quarter past eleven o'clock.

TUESDAY, March 2.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting letters recently received from our Consuls at Gibraltar and Algiers, presenting the latest view of the state of our affairs with the Barbary Powers.

The Message and letters were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed, on the fifteenth of December last, to prepare and bring in a bill or bills further and more effectually to protect the commerce of the United States against the Barbary Powers.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Wayne, in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, was presented to the House and read, stating certain inconveniences to which they have been, and are now, subjected, in consequence of the Indian claims to lands in the said Territory not having been yet extinguished, and the right of the same vested in fee simple to the petitioners; also, of the want of post roads extended to their settlement, and praying relief in the premises; also, that one or more townships of land may be granted for the purpose of erecting and endowing an academy or college in the said county of Wayne, for the instruction of youth in that Territory.

Ordered, That so much thereof as relates to an establishment of a seminary of learning in the said county of Wayne, be referred to the committee appointed on the twelfth ultimo, to whom was referred a petition of the Trustees of "Jefferson Academy," at Vincennes, in the Indiana Territory; that they do examine the matter thereof and report the same, with their opinion thereupon to the House.

Ordered, That the residue of the said petition do lie on the table.

Memorials of sundry merchants of the city of Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, and of sundry inhabitants of the town of Washington, in the State of North Carolina, were presented to the House and read, respectively praying relief in the case of the capture and condemnation of their property by the cruisers and courts of the French Republic, during the late European war.—Referred.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of Treasury, accompanying annual statements of the district tonnage of the United States on the thirty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred, formed from the quarterly abstracts rendered by the several collectors, together with certain observations explanatory of the said statements; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his reports on the petitions of James Bell, by Peter Mills, his attorney, and of Isaac Sawyer and others, referred to him by order of the House, on the twelfth and seventeenth ultimo; which were read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to convey certain parcels of land therein mentioned;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was twice read and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a statement of the emoluments of the officers employed in the collection of the customs for the year 1801, and a letter, to him, thereon, from the Comptroller of the Treasury; also, a statement of the sums paid into the Treasury of the United States, by the Collectors of each port, during the same year; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House then proceeded to consider, at the Clerk's table, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes," to which the Committee of the whole House, on the first instant, reported no amendment: Whereupon,

Mr. BAYARD moved to strike out the first section of the said bill in the words following, to wit :

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act of Congress, passed on the thirteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled 'An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the Courts of the United States,' from and after the first day of July next, shall be and is hereby repealed:"

And, on the question thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 55, as follows:

Mr. BAYARD moved to amend the bill, by adding to the end thereof, a new section, in the words following, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That all proceedings of a criminal, penal, or a civil nature, which have been commenced in the circuit court created and established by the act first herein mentioned, and whereof the circuit courts existing prior to the passing of the said act, had not cognizance, shall be cognizable in the circuit courts revived by this act, and may be proceeded in, in the same manner, and with the same effect, as they could have been in the circuit courts established by the aforesaid act:"

And, on the question thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 39, nays 49, as follows:

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to amend the bill, by adding to the end thereof a new section, in the words following, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That all suits, process, pleadings, and other proceedings of what nature or kind soever, depending in the circuit court in the district of Ohio, and which shall have been commenced within the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, shall be, and hereby are, from and after the first day of July next, continued over to the superior court of the said Territory, next thereafter to be holden; and all other suits, process, pleadings, and other proceedings of whatever nature or kind soever, depending or existing in the circuit court of the said district, shall be, and hereby are, from and after the first day of July next, continued over to the next superior court of the Indiana Territory of the United States next thereafter to be holden."

Messrs. GRISWOLD, FEARING, DANA, LOWNDES, EUSTIS, BAYARD, and RUTLEDGE, spoke in favor, of amending, and Messrs. GILES, BACON, ELMENDORF, S. SMITH, and HOLLAND, spoke against amending the bill.

Mr. EUSTIS.—In the negative given to the several amendments which have been offered, I perceive a determination to pass the bill in its present form. This I regret. I have voted for those amendments from a conviction that they were proper and necessary, and that others ought to be made before the bill should pass; that the defects of the old system be supplied at the same time and by the same act which abolishes the present system.

Satisfied in my own mind of the Constitutional right to pass the bill, I have hitherto been silent on that and every other part of the subject; but as two of my honorable colleagues have brought the sentiments of Massachusetts into the scale of the unconstitutionality, I may be permitted to state one fact expressive of the ideas which which have prevailed in that State. Several years past, and when no party spirit mingled itself with the consideration, repeated attempts were made to abolish the whole set of inferior courts, and to establish circuit courts in their stead. A bill for this purpose passed one branch of the Legislature after a long discussion, was considered and debated in the other branch; an election intervened, the subject was again revived, and I have never heard that the Constitutional right was called in question. The judges of these courts, of our Supreme Court, and the judges of the courts of the United States, hold their offices by the same tenure; the cases are similar; and so far as my information extends, the sentiment which prevailed in the Legislature pervaded the State. Had this House been equally free from the spirit of party, I cannot believe this objection would have arisen to such an height. Confining themselves to the use of terms, and under the influence of other circumstances, gentlemen appear to me to be wrought up to a zeal which has beguiled their judgments. With a proper respect for those who differ from me, I am perfectly satisfied of the Constitutional right to abridge or abolish, as well as to extend and establish courts, as the public good or the public necessity may require. For the soundness of this doctrine, without a comment on the Constitution, without opening it in this place, I should be willing to trust to the construction which would be given by the common sense of the people of the United States, and to rest my reputation on their decision.

The doctrine contended for by some gentlemen, is so foreign to the meaning and fair construction of the instrument, so fatal to a primary and elementary principle, and ultimately and in its consequences so destructive to the very independence of the Judiciary, for which they contend, that I would consent to pass the bill, imperfect as it is, was there no other way to repel it. But this is not necessary; the Constitutional question was decided by the vote of last evening.

The right having been established, in what manner should it be exercised? Not on ordinary occasions or light causes. A high and solemn discretion should preside over and direct its use. Is this an occasion which requires it? On what ground is the bill on your table predicated? On a conviction that the courts, as established by the law of the last session, are not required by the wants or circumstances of the country; that the provisions therein made are unnecessary and burdensome to the people; and that they ought, therefore, to be reduced. This the bill is intended to effect; it abolishes the present and revives and restores the past system. But the system revived is allowed to be materially defective. The judges of the Supreme Court have not been able to comply with the duties required of them. The association of the supreme with the district judges has occasioned a want of uniformity of decision, and an increased uncertainty of the law, different judges being called to preside in the same court, and often over different stages of the same cause; whole terms have failed; Legislative acts have repeatedly been found necessary to continue action.

What, then, is to be done? At the same time that you restore the one and abolish the other, that which is restored ought to be amended and rendered competent; the act should carry on the face of it its own justification. But, say gentlemen, we will first repeal the existing law, abolish the present system, and afterwards, by another bill, we will provide for the defects of the old. One of my honorable colleagues believes neither to be perfect, but that the old is preferable to the new. This belief will justify his voting for the bill. Perfection is not to be expected. But what is the fact? By passing the bill as it now stands, we take away a system too competent, and restore one superior in principle, but practically defective. To justify the change, that which is restored ought to be rendered competent to the due administration of justice, or we may be accused of legislating for men and not for measures. One honorable gentleman objects to amending this bill, because amendments were not permitted by the last Congress to be made to the act which is now intended to be repealed. This, surely, is not a good reason. The gentleman would not have us pursue a line of conduct which he, on a former occasion, disapproved.

It is objected that, in attempting to amend, the bill may be lost. How can it be lost? Will it not be under a constant control of the majority? If there be danger of losing the bill, there is greater danger of losing the necessary amendments after the bill is past. Should this be the case, what is hazarded? The imputation of having abolished the present system, because you had the power, or because you had the will, or from some motive not honorable or satisfactory. If the repealing act, on the other hand, restores the old system, superior in principle, competent to the due administration of justice, and free from objection, (and I would amend it until every reasonable objection was satisfied,) what is the impression? You have abolished a system which was unnecessary and burdensome, and have restored another and a better in its place. You shut the mouths of your enemies; you command the public confidence.

Let the true reason be assigned. The patience of the House is exhausted. They have seen two weeks wasted in a wild deviation from the subject. Far from a wish to revive, I would throw a veil of oblivion over the past, impenetrable, if possible, to the eye of a discerning people; too often already has the public repose been disturbed by alterations within these walls. Let them cease. Let us recollect that we owe something to the community—to ourselves. For once let us bring our prejudices and passions to the law of our country.

Let the bill rest on the table for a few days, until the necessary amendments can be prepared. In the mean time let the other business of the session go on. Take the collected wisdom of the House, take the assistance of the minority. Gentlemen say they cannot be confided in, as they have declared the act unconstitutional. Make the trial. If they refuse their aid they give you a triumph; if they discover the disposition to embarrass, take the business out of their hands and complete it. Much has been said of public sentiment. Sir, the people of this country are weary of professions. They require the evidence of facts to satisfy them. They ought, in my opinion, to have that evidence in the present case; this bill ought to carry on the face of it unequivocal evidence of the good faith with which it is enacted; in forming this opinion, I acknowledge that I look beyond the walls of this House.

This is the course which an honorable gentleman from Virginia has stated his wish that the business should have taken at first. This is the course it ought to have taken, and which it ought now to take; it is not too late.

With perfect confidence in the sincerity of gentlemen who tell us that the amendments will be made in a supplementary bill, I have also learned, from some small experience, that there is no certainty for the future, especially in public bodies. Gentlemen cannot command or engage for others. After the bill is passed, I am very apprehensive the amendments may be disagreed to, and finally lost. As no hazard is required, so none ought to be incurred.

This has been my view of the subject from its first origin. Every day has confirmed me that it was a just view. It has governed my conduct hitherto, and will direct the vote I shall finally give.

The question being taken on Mr. GRISWOLD'S amendment, it passed in the negative—yeas 37, nays 52, as follows:

Another motion was then made, and the question being put, that the said bill be read the third time on Monday next, it passed in the negative.

And then the said question being taken that the said bill shall be read the third time to-morrow, it was resolved in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, March 3.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States, and for other purposes," was read the third time.

Mr. CLOPTON rose and said—Mr. Speaker, having voted against striking out the first section of the bill before you, and intending to vote for the passage of it, I wish that the principal reasons which govern me in that vote should go forth with it. I, therefore, am induced to ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes, in order to state those reasons. In doing this, I beg leave to assure the House, that I shall not depart from the question to wander into remote regions, but shall confine myself closely to the bill itself; that I shall endeavor strictly to avoid the introduction of extraneous matter; that, as I have risen purely for the purpose of announcing the reasons on which my vote is grounded, so shall it be my particular care, not to trouble the House with any remarks which do not apply to the important subject on which that vote is to be given.

Gentlemen opposed to the bill have contended that it is both unconstitutional and inexpedient.

With respect to the latter point of discussion, I will remark, in a very few words, that I am strongly impressed with a belief, that it is expedient, from a view of the business now before the courts, which it proposes to discontinue. From the decrease of that business, which has, in fact, been brought about under the old system; from the actual decrease and great probability of still further decrease of the sources of future litigation on subjects properly of Federal jurisdiction, it appears to me, sir, that the new courts are entirely unnecessary. The document, which has furnished a statement of the business, though it has been much cavilled at, and, by some gentlemen, declared to have been improperly communicated to the House, I consider, not only a very proper subject of communication, but as furnishing a degree of information highly useful to guide our inquiries on this point. To me, I confess, it has afforded a view of the subject, which contributes very much towards convincing me of the inutility of the courts, to discontinue which, is the object of this bill. Under these circumstances, while I believe it to be a good maxim not to multiply offices unnecessarily, nor to create expensive systems that are useless, both from political considerations and from considerations of economy, my impressions are, that the bill is expedient and proper.

On the other point of discussion, much, indeed, has been said. On this ground, gentlemen have declaimed with great vehemence. They have displayed much animation, much pathos, and with abundant zeal, they have contended that the Constitution gives no authority to pass this bill.

In support of this doctrine, that part of the Constitution is taken for its strong ground, which is contained in the first section of the third article; for reading which section, I hope the House will pardon me, although it has already been often read—in these words:

“The Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour; and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.”

Gentlemen opposed to the bill have contended that this section secures a perpetuity to all courts. They have contended that, if Congress shall, at any time, have exercised the power granted in the first article—that of “constituting tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court,” by this section they are inhibited from annulling any of them on any account whatsoever. They have contended that, if a power to abolish is admitted, the independence of the judges will vanish; and that an act to abolish will deprive the judges of an absolute right, which, they say, is vested in them by this section of the Constitution.

In considering this part of the subject, I beg leave, first, to make a few remarks on that independence, a theme on which gentlemen have dilated very copiously.

Here, sir, I would beg leave to ask, are not the judges as completely guarded as they can be, against any arbitrary removal from office? It is by all acknowledged, that they are placed beyond the reach of the Executive department. They are also placed above any dependence on the Legislature for compensation for their services, by having salaries previously ascertained by law, which cannot be diminished during their continuance in office. So long as they behave well, they cannot be removed from their offices, but are entitled to hold them, if the offices exist so long, and their salaries cannot be reduced. During their continuance, therefore, in office, while in the actual performance of their duties, the actual exercise of administering justice, the great end of securing their independence in the exercise of the duties of their offices, under the construction contained in this bill, is, I conceive, as effectually answered, as if the courts were immovably fixed, and were to exist for ever. If at any time it should be found that any of the courts are unnecessary, and that it will be more for the public interest to abolish, than to continue them, with their abolition their duties cease; and then the judges will have no services to render, and, consequently, no longer need to be shielded from improper influences.

For what reason, I would ask, was the principle of securing the independence of judges adopted? Was it not for the purpose of promoting a faithful and upright discharge of their duties in office? Surely, it was; and in order to place them beyond the power of removal by one branch of the Government, and beyond the fear of having their salaries reduced by the other branch, lest, if they should be left subject to either of those impressions, they might, in the exercise of the duties of their offices, be too much inclined to subserve the other branches; this provision, I apprehend, was inserted in the Constitution in order to secure that important object, their independence in office, which independence, I believe, remains unshaken by the principle of the bill, as to all the purposes intended, and fully satisfies the Constitution. It is sufficient that this object be secured so long as there is a necessity for it; that is to say, so long as there is a necessity for keeping up the courts. If that necessity ceases, or if courts have been created when there existed no necessity for them, can it be a rational, can it be a proper construction of this part of the Constitution, or, indeed, of any other part of it, to say that, although the courts should be unnecessary, (for such is the extent of the doctrine opposed to the bill,) and, although the independence of the judges is complete during their continuance in the offices, nevertheless, the courts must be for ever kept up? Does such a construction necessarily result from these words: “the judges, &c., shall hold their offices during good behaviour?” Is there any idea of perpetuity attached to the word “offices,” or to any other words, in this sentence? Sir, I cannot perceive any such necessary construction. I cannot perceive that any such idea is involved in the sentence. I cannot discover any natural connexion between any such idea and this sentence, or any part of it. The phrase, “during good behaviour,” is a phrase well understood, as contradistinguished from the phrase “during pleasure,” and attaches no idea of perpetuity to the office. It has no reference to the duration of the office. It imports, indeed, that the office shall be holden, not at the will of another person, but on the good behaviour of the officer. It does not follow, therefore, that the duration of the office must necessarily be commensurate with the good behaviour of the person on whom the office had been conferred, or his own will to hold. I believe that an office may be created expressly for a term of years, and be filled by an officer to hold during good behaviour. Although he continues to behave well beyond the term, yet, at its expiration, there is an end of the office. Thus an office may be created for a term of ten years. A may be appointed to hold this office during good behaviour. You cannot remove him from this office at all, while he behaves well; but, at the expiration of ten years, the office ceases, of course. A cannot be said to be removed from the office by its cessation; for he cannot be removed from a nonentity. But if he hold at the pleasure of B, at any time before the expiration of the term, B may deprive him of the office; and then he may be said to be removed from the office, because it still continues in existence. So, also, I think, an office created for an indefinite term, as these courts are, may be discontinued; and, although the officer hold during good behaviour, he cannot be said to be removed by its discontinuance; but, if he hold at the pleasure of another person, he may, by him, be removed before a discontinuance of the office. The cases are analogous, I think, at least in relation to the effect produced by a cessation of the offices in both cases. For, as in the first case, the officer is entitled to hold the office during the term of ten years, which is the whole term of its existence, if he continues to behave well; so, in the latter case, the officer is entitled to hold during the existence of the office, if he exists so long and continues to behave well.

H. or R.

It will not be pretended that the tenure of the office, in the first case, is violated by its cessation at the fixed period of ten years, the term for which it was created; neither can it be justly said that, in the latter case, the tenure is violated by the determination of the office, although no definite term of existence was affixed to it at the time of its creation. In each case the tenure of the office rests equally on the ground of "good behaviour," and continues on that ground, without interruption, during the existence of the office. Hence, the words, "shall hold their offices during good behaviour," can only apply to existing offices, and designate the species of tenure, by which they are holden during their existence; but do not refer to the duration of the offices, or determine the period of their existence. The whole reasoning of gentlemen against this principle is grounded on the position, that the phrase gives a kind of perpetuity to the offices. This is, undoubtedly, begging the question. It is first assumed as a datum that the offices derive such a perpetuity from those words, and then it is inferred that the power of the Legislature cannot reach them. On the other hand, the converse of this proposition is believed to be true. It is contended, in favor of the bill, that a contrary construction is most natural; that it is more apparent that the words give no such perpetuity; that, consequently, the offices may be abolished by the same power which created them; and that such abolition does not violate the tenure by which the judges held them. Sir, from such a view as I have been able to take of this subject, and which I have had the honor just now to submit to the House, this deduction appears to me to be a fair and a regular one.

I will now proceed, sir, to consider the other position, which has been laid down by gentlemen, that the judges have a vested right in their offices, from whence it has been argued, that an act to abolish courts deprives the judges of that right; and upon that ground it has been contended, that the section of the Constitution which has been cited, inhibits the Legislature from passing any such act. It has been strongly insisted that, from these words, "the judges, &c., shall hold their offices during good behaviour," the duration of the offices, that is, of the courts, shall be at least commensurate with the duration of the good behaviour of the judges; indeed, the idea seems rather to be that, when once created, they cannot be constitutionally abolished; that, so long as the judges behave well, the offices belong to them; and that the court must be continued in existence for their benefit, whether the public interest requires it or not, or even although a continuance of them should be injurious to the public interest.

In considering the force of this reasoning, though I have already troubled the House with some remarks, which, I think, apply to this point; yet, I hope to be pardoned for taking a further view of it, in doing which I beg leave to revert to the first clause of the section which has been cited—"the Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." This clause, I think, in express terms, recognises in the Legislature a full power over this subject. Here, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary, it is clear that the words, "may from time to time ordain and establish," do leave a discretion with the Legislature; and if it were to be admitted, as seems to have been contended for, that the Constitution, by designating and limiting the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, presupposes the expediency of establishing some inferior courts; yet I apprehend that it will not be denied, but by all acknowledged, that the clause gives to Congress a discretionary power of determining the number and the kind of courts. If so, and if, in the exercise of this discretionary power, at any time, the Congress discovers that too many courts of improper structure have been created, does there not exist in the Congress which discovers this evil, the same and equal power to correct it, with that which existed to authorize the former Congress to create those courts. To deny this, would be to deny this Congress powers of legislation equal to those which the former Congress possessed.

Again, would it not be preposterous to say, that the Congress have a discretionary power of fixing the number of courts, and yet shall exercise that discretionary power but in one way; that is, in augmenting the number, but shall never exercise it in diminishing the number. This would, indeed, be a curious kind of discretion. It would be the acme of absurdity to call it a discretion. They must, therefore, have the discretion in the latitude contended for, or they have none at all;

and, if they have any at all, they have the power to annul courts when the public good requires it, as well as to create them. It is evident, therefore, that such a discretionary power as this which I have stated does exist; and that the section of the Constitution which has been adduced for the purpose by the opponents of this bill, does not vest in the judges such a right, such an absolute property in their offices, as to place them beyond the reach of the Legislature, and so as to inhibit the Legislature from annulling such of the courts as it shall be found necessary or expedient for the public good to annul.

Further to test the accuracy of this deduction, permit me, sir, to take a view of the Constitution, and to analyze its principles. Whenever I contemplate this valuable system, I perceive, from its nature, as a Federal Government, that it is a Government of specific, limited powers. I perceive, to a demonstration, that, wherever power is granted, the benefit or good of the people must always be understood to be the primary object of the grant; that the powers granted are special powers for special and particular purposes, which are secondary objects and means of attaining the primary one; that the department to which a power is entrusted should be always responsible to the people for a proper application and use of that power towards the attainment of both objects; and that it must be competent to the particular purposes for which it was granted; otherwise, there would be a responsibility on the department, without sufficient power to discharge its obligation to the community.

I will now beg leave, sir, to apply these principles to some of the grants of power enumerated in the Constitution; and, if they apply to any, they apply to all. I will begin with the first grant.

The Congress shall have power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States." These are the special purposes for which the power is granted. The Congress is the department, in exercising this power, to effect these purposes in the best manner it can, and most for the interest and convenience of the people, under the restrictions specified in the grant; herein consists its responsibility. Its power must be competent to make such laws immediately connected with these objects, as shall be necessary to effect them; otherwise, it would be responsible, without sufficient power to discharge that obligation.

Passing over other grants, for the sake of brevity, I will proceed, sir, to a grant immediately relating to the subject, which has been debated.

The Congress shall have power "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." Here the special purpose for which the power is granted, is to "constitute inferior courts." Again, the Congress is the department to whom the power is entrusted. It is responsible to the people, to provide, from time to time, for the due administration of Federal justice, in the best manner it can, and most for the interest and convenience of the people; and it must be competent. Here, sir, is the important point in question—it must be competent to what? According to the principles which have been stated, it must be competent to enact, from time to time, such laws immediately relating to that subject as shall be necessary and proper for making such provision; otherwise its responsibility would be unattended with power adequate to a full discharge of its obligation. The friends of the bill before you contend, sir, that towards the establishment of such a provision that bill is necessary and proper; that the interest and convenience of the people will be better served by abolishing the system than by its continuance.

But gentlemen have contended that the power in this case does not extend so far as to authorize the repeal of a law which had already created courts; for, that the clause only expresses a positive grant of power to constitute courts; that the grant merely authorizes a creation of new courts, in addition to the old, or a new organization of the old courts. Sir, the same feature marks every clause in the enumeration. How, then, is that inference drawn in this particular case? Is it contended for, because a power to repeal is not expressed in the grant? No such power is expressed in any of the grants. Will it, therefore, be also contended that a law "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, or excises," cannot be repealed; or that, if any law should be passed relative to either of those subjects, it must be a law either for laying and collecting new taxes, duties, imposts, or excises, in addition to the old, or for new modelling the old ones? Sir, I can undertake to vouch for gentlemen, that such an absurdity will not be assented to; and yet I do not see how it can well be avoided, if the inference is insisted upon in the other case. The power of repeal, I believe, sir, equally exists in both cases; and the responsibility attached to this department of the Government requires an exercise of that power, in both cases, whenever it is found to be expedient for the public good, as well as in all other cases where that power exists. To deny this, would be a denial of all discretion to the Legislative department; a denial of sufficient power to support its responsibility, or to effect the purposes for which the special grants of powers had been confided to it.

Mr. Speaker, having endeavored to show (and, to my mind, the deductions are perfectly clear) that the doctrine which has been contended for by gentlemen opposed to this bill, is not supported by the section of the Constitution which has been often cited, and on which they have much relied, that it is not adverse to the principle of the bill, but reconcilable to it, and will not be violated by its operation, either as it respects the required independence of the judges, or as it regards the tenure of their offices, I will now, with permission of the House, proceed to state a few ideas resulting from a comparison of their doctrine and their construction of that section with the general principles of our Government.

MARCH, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

I presume, sir, that in the construction of an instrument it must ever be incorrect to give such interpretation to any clause of that instrument as would militate against the main design or end of the instrument. I apprehend that every construction to be correct must support that object. This I hold to be a good rule in respect to any instrument, however small its dignity. If this be a correct idea, of how much importance must it be to adhere to the rule in constructions of the Constitution of our Government!

Sir, I profess not to be a legal character, or to derive ideas on this head from that kind of research which professional gentlemen are accustomed to pursue. I form my opinion from the reasonableness of such a rule, and the obvious tendency of a contrary rule. I figure to myself a striking distinction between the two modes of construction. While the one cherishes and preserves the Constitution in its true and natural state of energy, the other must unquestionably enfeeble it, and eventually annihilate its vital principles.

The American mind is so well instructed in the great and essential principles which form the basis of our Government, the leading characteristic features of which are so strongly marked; its pre-eminent attributes so clearly distinguished from the genius of the corrupt systems of the old world, and springing, as it does, from the only legitimate source on earth—the people; that its first and greatest object is universally recognised, and would have required no explicit declaration to the world to show what it was, yet it is seen in the preamble of the Constitution. Among other important purposes for which the people of the United States have declared that they ordained and established this Constitution, one is to promote the general welfare. This indeed may be said to comprehend all the other specific objects of its institution; and every benefit and advantage derivable to the United States from a just and proper exercise of the powers delegated to them by this Constitution may, not improperly, be concentrated in this expression. I consider the term as synonymous with the public good. I believe, therefore, that I am bound to keep steadily in view this great object, whenever I venture to put constructions on any part of the Constitution, and to explode all constructions not compatible therewith.

Sir, when I listened (as I have with close attention) to gentlemen, and heard them contending with unusual degree of warmth, that the Legislature have no authority to annul courts, and urge for reasons that the judges have a property in their offices, I was induced to believe from the course of their arguments that, if we are to be guided by them, they would direct us to this conclusion, that, if no salaries were involved in the question, in discussing the constitutionality of this bill, proposing a repeal of "certain acts respecting the organization of the courts of the United States," there would be no inquiry into the right of merely abolishing the courts; that it is the effect which the abolition will have in relation to the salaries, and not the effect which it will have in respect to the administration of justice, which is considered as rendering the repeal unconstitutional, or rather the constitutionality of it would not then be questioned at all. This object, so zealously contended for, is called the independence of the judges. It is not deemed sufficient security for their independence that they really possess it by having salaries, which cannot be diminished while they continue in office, and from which offices they cannot be removed while they behave well, even if it be to the end of their lives, if the office exist so long; but it is urged also that the offices must be perpetual, in order to perpetuate the salaries. Considering this object, therefore, as the mainspring of the doctrine which has been thus advocated, I contend, sir, that it cannot stand when tested by sound principles. I feel certain in my mind that it is incompatible with the genuine republican principle which ought ever to be maintained as a vital, essential attribute of our Government—incompatible with that fundamental principle, which makes the good of the people the paramount object of our Constitution.

In this Government, then, where the good of the people so confessedly is the supreme object, I believe it is dangerous to sanction a doctrine like this, which goes to declare that in fact no considerations of public utility are allowed by the Constitution to be of sufficient avail to abolish any courts which have once been created, merely because such abolition will affect the interest of the judges.

This doctrine may suit the genius of despotic government, wherein not the welfare of the people, but the aggrandizement of their rulers is almost the sole object; where the body of the people are indeed considered as mere property, and even preserved in existence more for the purpose of swelling the pomp, the pageantry, the splendor and magnificence of those who domineer over them than for any other purpose; where the great mass of the people, so far from having any rights protected by the Government, are the miserable subjects of oppression in every shape which fancy can devise, and which a mixture of whim and cruelty can inflict. In that kind of Government there is indeed color for a doctrine, which would perpetuate offices for the benefit of those who hold them, in exclusion of every consideration in respect to the people.

But does not the genius of our free Government utterly forbid that the interest of any individual should be consulted in preference to the good of the community, when the good of the community and the interest of that individual shall come in competition? Surely it does, and yet what is the scope of the doctrine which has been so strenuously contended for in opposition to a repeal of the law in question? It positively maintains that, although the present Legislature should have the strongest evidence that the courts created by that law are unnecessary, or even if there should be unquestionable ground to believe that a continuance of them would be injurious to the interests of the community; nevertheless, because an abolition of them will be followed by a cessation of salaries to the judges, whereby their interests will be affected—the interests of those particular individuals shall preponderate and forbid the repeal. Does not this position flatly contradict that valuable principle of our Government, which maintains that the good of the community should be the great object of all our institutions? To my mind, this conclusion is perfectly clear, and the doctrine is in complete hostility to that principle.

If, sir, we retrace the course of discussion in this case, how has it stood? On the one hand the bill has been advocated and supported, as to its expediency, on the ground that the courts in question are unnecessary and productive of useless expense to the community; that this circumstance of itself would be good reason, if no other existed, though it is deemed that other strong reasons, taken in connexion with this, do exist, why the courts should be discontinued. On the other hand, the doctrine contended for in opposition to this bill is tantamount to a positive affirmation that, whether the courts are necessary or unnecessary, you must not put them down; that, in whatever manner the public interest may be affected, the courts must be suffered to remain in force; that the interest and convenience of the public in this case, must yield to the particular interest and convenience of the judges; that the courts were no sooner created than they were enshrined within the veil of the Constitution; that the Constitution is to them a sanctuary, which should protect them against the rude hand of legislation; that you break through this sanctuary, you sacrilegiously violate it, if you dare to enter and interrupt the permanence of the courts; that you strike with unhallowed hands, if you presume to strike out of existence any of those offices, after having once been in possession of the judges; that howmuch-soever you may think the public good requires it, however detrimental to the public interest you may think a continuance of the courts will be, you must not touch the law which creates them, at least, any further than to amend; that the courts are sacred, because, if you undertake to annihilate them, the consequence will be that the judges will sustain the loss of salaries; and you have no authority to cause such a loss to the judges, in order to promote that which you conceive to be the public good, or to discontinue what you apprehend to be injurious to the public interest; that the Constitution secures to those officers salaries for life, and inhibits you from any act, which directly or indirectly, mediately or immediately, has a tendency to operate a deprivation of them, notwithstanding any such public considerations. Such, sir, is the very essence of the arguments adduced by gentlemen opposed to the bill before you, so far as they apply to the question of constitutionality. But, good God! can this be the language of our Constitution? If every page in the volume of this sacred instrument was to be carefully unfolded, and examined with the strictest eye, is there a single sentence to be found which breathes such language? Can the eye trace out by the most laborious search even a single word which can bear such construction? I am persuaded, Mr. Speaker, that I should commit an high offence against the sanctity of this venerable instrument, were I for a moment to indulge a belief that such a sentence, such a word, could be found.

In another point of view, Mr. Speaker, I consider the tendency of this doctrine to be highly objectionable. It is confidently believed, as has been before stated, that the courts proposed to be annulled by the operation of this bill are unnecessary; that consequently a continuance of them will be attended with an useless expense. If, then, the due administration of justice, the only object for which courts ought to be established, does not require the aid of those additional courts in order to effect that object, they must be an useless burden upon the country.

Contemplating these circumstances, therefore, as attending this case, and supposing the doctrine which has been advocated to operate as gentlemen have contended for, I am inevitably drawn to this conclusion, that, if it should be established as a principle that courts once constituted, though on experiment, cannot be abolished by any power existing under the Constitution, however unnecessary, however burdensome they may be found to be; then will the Constitution exhibit that singular phenomenon in the political world, which will be capable of producing an evil, to which it will not be capable of applying any remedy, after that evil is found to have been produced. It will then be determined that this instrument gives power to legislate so as to create an evil, and then to augment that evil, but that it gives no power to legislate so as to diminish the evil; that it authorizes an extension of the mischief ad infinitum, but that it denies all right or authority to contract the sphere of the mischief.

There is another consideration of no small moment, and highly worthy of remark. Public institutions in all governments, particularly in their infancy, and still more particularly in the infancy of Republics, are more or less experimental. What a solecism, then, does this doctrine present to us! It pronounces this strange and contradictory proposition that, although a system, originated merely by legislative act, should be tried and found useless, defective, or even vicious, nevertheless it cannot be subject to any radical correction; that the power which formed the system is incompetent to cure its defects; has no right or authority to ameliorate the system in such a manner or to such extent as that power should deem necessary and proper. Sir, what would be the consequence of the establishment of such a principle as this? Would it not have a direct tendency to arrest the benefits derivable to society from the progress of experience? Such undoubtedly would be its operation—an operation which would in fact go to defeat one of the greatest advantages accruing to mankind from the social state.

Experience must be acknowledged to be a great source of improvement, and it is an important attribute of free government, which requires that its institutions should receive such improvements, as shall be discovered from that source to be essential for the benefit of the people. Hence the doctrine, which has been contended for, presents itself in an attitude extremely hostile to that principle, inasmuch as it does not allow that extent of improvement in judicial systems which experience might dictate; for it is not to be imagined that these systems any more than other institutions can always receive the highest degree of improvement from merely a new modification of the existing arrangements; but that sometimes more radical alterations may be necessary in order to the attainment of that end. The system now proposed to be discontinued is believed to be precisely in that predicament. I am not unmindful, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen have said that this system has not been tried long enough to test its propriety or usefulness. On the other hand it has been equally contended that the system, although it has not been for any considerable time in operation, is nevertheless attended with sufficient evidences of its inutility; and, indeed, that the circumstances of the country did not require it at the time of its creation; that it had all the marks of impropriety about it when first brought into existence. But, independently of these circumstances, I cannot accede to the doctrine. Its principle is the same, and would equally apply, if the system had been commenced with the first transactions of the Government, and had been found from an experience of twelve years to be palpably useless. It is the principle of the doctrine, which would operate universally, and apply as well to a long as to a short term of experience, that I explode.

MARCH, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

Mr. Speaker, I have submitted to the honorable House these reasons, which are most impressive on my mind, in favor of the vote which I am about to give on the very important subject of the bill before you. Those which have reference to the great Constitutional question that has been agitated, are the result of such a view of the Constitution, as my own judgment has been able to take on a serious and diligent examination of it. On a subject so momentous, I have deemed it a duty which I owe to my country and to myself to pursue this course of investigation. While I have approached this subject with a degree of awe, I have endeavored to bestow upon it the most deliberate consideration. I have also attended closely to the arguments of gentlemen against the bill, and, weighing them dispassionately and with candor, I must say that I have heard nothing which has convinced me that the issue of my researches is an improper one; on the contrary, I feel confirmed in the belief that the doctrine which gentlemen have advocated in opposition to the bill, is neither supported by any express provision in the Constitution, nor compatible with its essential principles.

In this discussion gentlemen have taken a wide range, and travelled into fields far remote from the real object of debate. But, not content with such a latitude of argument, some have intermingled with their remarks many insinuations that the friends of this bill are careless whether they violate the Constitution or not. Sir, I regret that sentiments so uncharitable should have been fostered. At the same time I owe it to myself utterly to deny the justice of the imputation. I owe it to myself to assert, that, notwithstanding, all the noisy declamation we have heard, and all the pompous declarations of zeal for the Constitution which have been uttered, I will not consent to yield to any of those gentlemen, either in veneration for its sacred instrument, or in solicitude for its defence against any kind of infraction. I entertain not the smallest doubt but that those gentlemen with whom I have the honor to act are animated with similar sentiments.

Sir, we have been warned, frequently and solemnly warned, against passing this bill. Alarm upon alarm, and threat after threat, have been sounded in our ears. The cry of "unconstitutionality" has been reverberated again and again. In language strong, positive, and unequivocal, we have been repeatedly told that we are about to break down one of the main pillars of our Constitution, and to unsettle the whole foundation of our Government. We have been emphatically called upon to stop—to pause—to reflect—to reconsider, and to desist from this attempt!

Sir, I should not have waited for either the threats or the admonitions of those gentlemen, if I had felt any apprehension that this bill would violate the Constitution. Far, very far be it from me to sanction any act whatsoever of such a tendency. Had I believed, or had gentlemen convinced me by argument, that the bill before you is a measure of that sort, instead of advocating, most assuredly I should give it my decided negative. If such was my impression, neither threats nor admonitions would have been necessary to impel me to take such a part. Neither threats nor admonitions can influence me to take such a part without conviction of its propriety. But far from believing that it is a measure of that description; and at the same time believing that it will be for the interest of my country so to do, I shall vote for the passage of it: and I assure the gentleman from Delaware that this vote will not be given under the impression of Executive influence; as he has been pleased very plainly to insinuate that those who favor this bill are acting under such an influence. I assure him, and I assure others, who may have thought proper to indulge similar sentiments, that although I highly revere the eminent virtue, patriotism, and abilities of the great man who now fills the Executive Department—

[Here the SPEAKER said, that remarks of this kind were not in order.]

Mr. CLOPTON, after premising that nothing could be farther from his intention than any wilful transgression of the rules of the House, observed that the remark was intended solely to vindicate himself against an imputation, in which he felt himself included, as the insinuation pointed generally to the favorers of the bill—that although with the utmost deference to the opinion of the SPEAKER, he believed that, situated as he was, the rules of the House would justify him; he should conclude (as he was near a conclusion at the time when his remark was objected to) with saying that his object was to declare that although the great endowments of the Executive Magistrate commanded his highest esteem—although his opinion at all times merited the utmost respect, and whenever known were respected by him in the first degree; yet his decision on this important occasion, as well as on all others, had been pursuant to the dictates of his own judgment, by which he should be guided in every instance, where he should have the honor of voting in this House.

Mr. VARNUM said, he had determined to content himself with giving a silent vote on the question before the House; but the observations made by two of his colleagues, (Mr. CUTLER and Mr. HASTINGS,) induced him to make some remarks, in which he would endeavor to show, that the sense of the people, in the part of the Union in which he lived, relative to the constitutionality of the question, was, at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, directly the reverse of that which they had stated. Sir, in the consideration of this subject, we ought to bear in mind the nature of the Government, and the very small number of causes cognizable in the Federal Judiciary, when compared with those cognizable in the State judiciaries, in order, with correctness, to ascertain the extent to which it is necessary to carry the one, and at the same time to avoid any encroachment on the other.

Nothing would be clearer in my mind than the Constitutional right, in Congress, to repeal the law, which the bill before you contemplates. By article first, section eighth, in the Constitution, Congress is vested with power, "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court," precisely on the same principle, and under similar expressions, with the other powers vested by the same section "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies;" "to establish post offices and post roads;" "to raise and support armies;" "to provide and maintain a navy," &c. And it never has been contended, that Congress have not a Constitutional right to repeal any law which may have been passed on any of these subjects, except the judiciaries, whenever the good of the public may require it. If, then, it is admitted that Congress have a Constitutional right to repeal laws which may have been passed on these subjects, when the public good requires it—and to deny it, would be subversive of the best interest of the people—from what principle of the Constitution is it found to be unconstitutional to repeal a law relative to the establishment of inferior courts, when it is conceded that the power to legislate on that subject is delegated by the Constitution on precisely the same principle with the other powers which have been mentioned? The principal reason relied on is, that the judges are to hold their offices during good behaviour, that therefore Congress have not a Constitutional right to repeal a law, which will in any degree affect their offices or salaries. But this objection applies quite as strong against the repeal of a law on the subject of post offices and post roads, as it does in the other case, for Congress have no more power to remove the postmaster from office, than they have to remove a judge from office. The judge holds his office during good behaviour; the postmaster holds his office during the pleasure of the President of the United States; it will also, in like manner, apply against the repeal of a law upon any other subject, which creates an office held during the pleasure of the President, with equal force. So that, if the objection has any weight in the case to which it has been applied, it will go to the subversion of the principle, that Congress have a right to repeal laws on other subjects aside the Judiciary creating offices held during the pleasure of the President. If the principle is correct, where is the advantage of successive elections of the Legislature? By the third article and first section of the Constitution, it is provided that the Judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. Which provision, in connexion with that which vests Congress with power "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court," clearly evince, that the Constitutional establishment of the inferior courts of the United States, places their existence exactly commensurate with the will of the Legislature, expressed by law, from time to time, as the circumstances of the country, and the public good, may require. The judges are to hold their offices "during good behaviour," but it would be absurd in the extreme to pretend, that this tenure could entitle a man to hold an office which has no Constitutional existence, and hence, the tenure of office of a judge of an inferior court of the United States cannot extend beyond the existence of the establishment by which such office is created.

But, should the construction of the Constitution contended for by the opposers of the bill prevail, it is impossible to foresee all the evils which would necessarily result. As a demonstration, I will put only one case. Suppose the existence of a war with the most powerful nation in Europe, and the necessity which in that case there might be, of the establishment of Admiralty Courts in all your principal seaport towns, for the trial of prizes which your armed vessels would send in for adjudication; and at the close of the war, when no further services could be rendered by these courts, the Constitutional question meets you, and forbids their abolition, because it will affect the salary of the judges; and the people must be taxed to pay these sinecure officers. If such was the true construction of the Constitution, in vain have the people declared in its preamble, that it is ordained and established to promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and posterity.

In addition to the construction of the Constitution, in regard to this question, which seems to me indisputable from the face of it; the construction given it by the people, at the time of its adoption, or, in other words, the sense in which they viewed it at that time, ought to have great weight in the decision; and, perhaps, that sense will be the best ascertained, by a recurrence to the State constitutions, and the practice of the States under them. The Constitution of New Hampshire, in the thirty-seventh article of the bill of rights, very happily expresses the sense of the people of that State, in regard to the independence of the Judiciary, in these words:

"In the Government of this State, the three essential powers thereof, to wit, the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial, ought to be kept as separate from, and independent of, each other, as the nature of a free Government will admit, or as is consistent with that chain of connexion that binds the whole fabric of the Constitution in one indissoluble bond of union and amity."

The constitution of that State vests in the Legislature, forever, full power and authority to erect and constitute judiciaries, and courts of record, or other courts, with all the powers incident to a Judicial department: and with special power to abolish the courts of common pleas, and courts of general sessions of the peace, and establish other courts with the same power, as they may, from time to time, judge expedient for the due administration of law and justice, yet the tenure of the office of judge in that State, is the same as under the United States. And, sir, notwithstanding the entire dependence on the Legislature for the existence of the courts of common pleas, I cannot imagine that the independence of the judges has ever been affected by it. There is an honorable gentleman from that State now on this floor, a judge of one of those courts, who, with his associates, had the independence, since the adoption of the Constitution, in their official capacity, to declare an act of the Legislature unconstitutional. This is a demonstration that the independence of judges does not, in all cases, depend on the certainty of holding their offices, or on receiving the emoluments thereof for life.

The constitution of New Hampshire was revised and amended shortly after the adoption of the Federal Constitution; many parts of it are assimilated to the corresponding parts in the Federal Constitution. And I cannot doubt, that the power vested in the Legislature, relative to the superior courts of the State.

In Massachusetts, the judges both of the supreme judicial court, and of the inferior courts, hold their offices under the same tenure as is by the Federal Constitution attached to the judges of the Supreme Court, and inferior courts of the United States. By the Constitution of the United States it is provided, that "The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour; and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." By the Constitution of Massachusetts, it is provided that "All Judicial officers duly appointed, commissioned, and sworn, shall hold their offices during good behaviour, excepting such concerning whom there is different provision made in this constitution." This exception has relation to justices of the peace, whose commissions are, by the Constitution, limited to seven years, and not to the judges of the supreme or inferior courts, except so far as it respects the courts of general sessions of the peace, formed by the justices within their respective counties. Therefore, the tenure of office is the same under both constitutions.

The Legislature is vested with power co-extensive with the Constitution, to establish judiciaries, and all kinds of judicial courts which the welfare of the Commonwealth may require. This power is couched in such terms as I think will not admit of a doubt, of its extending, as well to the abolition of inferior courts, which may be found not to promote the best interest of the community, as to the establishment of those which may be deemed useful and necessary. And further, the Constitution has vested the Governor, with the consent of the Council, upon an address of both Houses of the Legislature, with power to remove the judges of any of the State courts; and this may be done without assigning a reason. And in addition to this Constitutional definition of the paramount power of the Legislature over the establishment of Superior Courts, we have, from time to time, for fourteen years past, at various periods, been furnished with the most ample testimony of the uniform and invariable sense of the people of that State on the subject. A short time after the adoption of the Federal Constitution in Massachusetts, a committee appointed by the Legislature for revising the code of laws in that State, (on which committee, if my memory is correct, were all the judges of the Supreme Judicial Court) made a report to the Legislature in favor of the abolition of all the courts of common pleas in the State, and for establishing circuit courts with similar powers; this report was accompanied with bills for carrying the principle into effect; the plan would have discharged from service about sixty judges. The same system has been brought forward within these seven years, at every session of two or three succeeding Legislatures, and strongly advocated by able men learned in the law; in one Legislature, a bill for carrying the system into effect passed the House of Representatives, but failed in the Senate. In a succeeding Legislature the bill passed in the Senate, but failed in the House; and it has finally failed. But, sir, neither the judges of the supreme judicial court, who reported the system, nor the gentlemen, learned in the law, who supported it, could have entertained an idea that it was unconstitutional; and I have been repeatedly informed, from indisputable authority, that through all the different discussions of the subject, the idea of its being unconstitutional was never suggested by either party: but that the expediency of the measure was the only ground of debate, and ultimate decision.

I was not a little astonished to hear my colleagues (Mr. CUTLER and Mr. HASTINGS) avow on this floor, that the people in Massachusetts never would have adopted the Federal Constitution, had they not viewed it in the same light with those gentlemen who are opposed to the bill under consideration, when they must have been acquainted with the State constitution, and the proceedings under it, which I have mentioned. It is in effect charging the people of that State with the inconsistency of providing by the Constitution for the establishment of inferior courts, which cannot be abolished by the Legislature during the life of any of the judges; although they might be found unnecessary, burdensome, and oppressive; and with vesting in the judges of these courts power, not only over the establishment under which they hold their offices, and over the salaries granted at a time when the establishment might be thought necessary, but a controlling, independent power over the Legislature of the Union, and all the departments in the Government, and were I to say, over the Constitution itself, I do not think it would be an exaggeration of the construction contended for by some gentlemen on this occasion.

Now, sir, while the constitution of Massachusetts vests the Legislature of that State with powers respecting Judicial establishments under the State government, exactly similar to the powers vested in Congress, by the Federal Constitution, respecting Judicial establishments under the General Government; when the people of that State have, by the same constitution, so clearly defined the independence of the judges, and their continuation in office, by the power delegated to the Governor and Council, upon the address of both Houses of the Legislature, to remove them from office, and by the paramount control vested in the Legislature over the establishments by which their offices are created; and when it is so well known that the judges of the supreme judicial court, and gentlemen of high legal knowledge and reputation, have, for many successive years and under different aspects, been advocating the abolition of the inferior courts in the State, and the people of all classes and denominations, constant and uniform in exhibiting their unanimous acquiescence in the constitutionality of the measure; what foundation is there for the declaration made by my colleagues? Is there the least color of reason for the assertions? But, on the contrary, is it not fair and candid to conclude, from the statement which has been made, that the people of Massachusetts entertain the same opinion as to the constitutionality of the repeal contemplated, which has been avowed by the friends to the bill now under consideration on this floor? Is not this the only conclusion which can result from the evidence in the case? I presume, sir, that every impartial inquirer will answer in the affirmative; and, may I be permitted further to observe, that the people of Massachusetts are true friends to order and good government, strongly attached to the Federal Constitution; and whatever may have been their difference of sentiment in regard to the administration of the General Government, this difference has arisen, generally, from honest motives, grounded on the broad basis of general welfare, although accompanied with a diversity of ideas as to the mode of administration best calculated to effect this object. They are industrious and economical, and wish to have their honest earnings secured to them by the Government; but they have an innate opposition to useless expensive establishments and sinecure offices. In Rhode Island all the Judicial officers are chosen annually by the Legislature, yet we do not hear any complaint of the want of independence in the judges.

But, sir, when I recur to the charter under which the people act in the State of Connecticut, I am astonished to find the members from that State in Congress, advocating the necessity of an absolute independence in the judges of the inferior courts of the United States; not only an independence above the control of the Legislature, but completely dictatorial of its measures, in order, as they tell us, to secure the rights of the people. It would seem, from the system of jurisprudence in that State, at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, that a radical change had, since that time, taken place in the minds of the people, if they are now truly represented on this floor, which I am by no means disposed to dispute. In that State the judges of all their courts, both supreme and inferior, are appointed annually by the Legislature; and in addition to the complete control which the Legislature have a right to exercise over the judges annually, they have the power of calling to an account any court or magistrate for any misdemeanor and mal-administration; and for just cause (the Legislature being the only judges of the justice of the cause) may fine, displace, or remove them. The people of that State have continued this kind of Judiciary from the commencement of their government to this time. And, sir, what injuries have arisen to the people of that State on account of the subordinate dependence of the Judiciary on the Legislature? Has not justice been as fairly and promptly administered there as in any other State in the Union? Has there ever been a complaint that the judges were deficient in a degree of independence necessary to support the dignity of their stations, or for the impartial administration of justice? Is there a State in the Union; nay, sir, is there a State or nation in the world, where the people exhibit a greater degree of politeness, urbanity, steady habits, knowledge, and morality, than is to be found in Connecticut? And yet, sir, all these excellent qualities have been acquired under a Judicial system, the principles of which are profoundly execrated by the members from that State as well as others, and considered totally inefficacious when applied to that State, and to the other States in the Union under the Federal Government. But, sir, is it not natural to conclude, from the happy effects which the Connecticut system has had in that State, and from the universal satisfaction which, through the experience of ages, it has afforded the people, that it is at least as good as any one which can be devised? Under this view of the subject, will any rational man believe, that the people in Connecticut had any apprehension that the Federal Constitution relative to the national Judiciary now contended for at the time they adopted it? Or would anything save the part which the members from that State have taken in the question before you, have convinced this House that the people of that State do wish at this time to see the construction prevail, which is calculated to tax themselves, their fellow-citizens in the other States, and posterity, with the support of unnecessary, expensive judiciary systems, so diametrically opposed to that under which they live in their own State; and which is so universally approved and admired by them? In the State of Vermont the constitution provides, that "The Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary departments, shall be separate and distinct, so that 'neither exercise the powers properly belonging to the other.'" But, sir, the judges of all the judicial courts are chosen annually, or oftener, if need be, by the Legislature. From this view of the constitutions in the five Northern or Eastern States, it appears, that the Legislatures thereof are all vested with complete control over the establishments of inferior courts, either with power to abolish them, and establish others, as they may judge most conducive to the public good, or by a periodical election of the judges.

From an examination of the constitutions of the other States in the Union, and the construction which has been given to the State constitutions in some of the States, it will be found that the Legislatures in all of them have the same control over the establishment of inferior courts. It may be further observed, that the State constitutions of all the States in the Union except six, to wit: New Hampshire, New York, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee, provide for the removal of the judges from office, either by a periodical election or by the Executive, upon an address of both Houses of the Legislature, in some cases requiring the concurrence of two-thirds of each House: and, sir, notwithstanding the State Legislatures have this complete control over the establishment of inferior courts within their respective States, independent of any regard to the judges which may hold offices under them; the judges in all the States, except where they are periodically elected, hold their offices precisely on the same tenure by which the judges of the inferior courts of the United States hold theirs.

Mr. Speaker, when the Constitutional establishment of the State judiciaries is compared with the national Judiciary, their similarity impartially viewed, and the construction which has uniformly been given to the State systems by their Legislatures and gentlemen the most eminent for law knowledge, with the perfect acquiescence of the body of the people, is attended to with candor and without party views, do they not exhibit the most incontestable evidence, that the people of the United States, when they adopted the Federal Constitution, did it with the impression that Congress was thereby vested with the power of repealing any establishment of inferior courts, which might be made by them, and afterwards prove useless or burdensome, as well as to establish such as they might consider unnecessary?

Yes, sir, this must be acknowledged by all who would not charge them with the gross inconsistency of adopting a language in their State constitutions, to which they have given one uniform construction, and precisely the same language in the Federal Constitution, with a construction diametrically opposite; which character, however it may be calculated to promote party views, I apprehend never can be ascribed to the great body of the American people. For what purpose is this might Constitutional objection set up? Gentlemen who urge it can best answer the question. But let me entreat them to consider the principles of the law about to be repealed, and compare them with the bill under consideration, by which they must see that the law which they brought forward, supported and passed the last session of Congress, embraces the same great principle which they now contend is a violation of the Constitution. That law, in express terms, abolished all the circuit courts established in the United States under the General Government prior to that time, which were then in existence, and established other circuit courts with similar power. The bill under consideration contemplates the abolition of the circuit courts established by the law of the last session, and the re-establishment of those abolished by that law. Where, then, is the difference in the principles of that law and those in the bill before you? I can conceive of none as it relates to their constitutionality. If, therefore, that law is a Constitutional law, the bill must be Constitutional also; and the same gentlemen who oppose the bill, have decided the principle and established a precedent, which will have weight in future procedure in like cases by the passage of the law. If the law is unconstitutional, those gentlemen who are now sounding the tocsin of alarm for the fate of the Constitution, are the very men who have given it the vital stab; and, even in that case, there can be nothing unconstitutional in the bill, for no one will contend that it is unconstitutional to repeal, abolish, and annul, an unconstitutional law.

As it relates to the expediency of the repeal, we should take into consideration the quantum of business to be transacted in the circuit court, and the capacity of the judges to perform it without an interference with their duty as judges of the Supreme Court and district courts; and if we bear in mind the small number of objects embraced by the Federal Judiciary when compared with those which arise under the State governments, there is every reason to believe that the state of the business in the circuit courts will, for a long time to come, be such, that it can be performed by the judges of the other courts with facility, and without any interference with their other functions. A recurrence to fact clearly evinces, that this has been the case from the commencement of the Government up to the time of the passage of the law which abolished the former system. But, say gentlemen, there have been instances in which the circuit courts have failed of transacting the business before them on account of the non-attendance of the judges. This is true; but the circumstances which produced those failures were such as never ought to be imputed to any defect in the system. Over such an extensive territory as the United States, it is to be expected, that some failures of this kind will occur, unless indeed you do carry those courts to every man's door, (as some gentlemen have been pleased to express themselves,) and appoint your judges so nigh the place of holding the courts, that neither freshets in rivers, the breaking down of bridges, or other natural impediments, (which often occur in the country, and especially in the Southern States, so as to prevent travelling for many days together) could operate to prevent the attendance of the judges; and, even in that case, such failures could not be entirely guarded against, for sickness, or the sudden death of the judges, over which you can have no control, might produce them. But failures of the kind have not been so frequent as was to have been expected, from the nature of the case; nor is it by any means certain that the system now in operation is better calculated to prevent them than the old one. Nothing of the kind has ever happened in the State of Massachusetts. The business in the circuit courts of that State has always been despatched with great promptitude, and without delay, unwished for by the suitors: the business has been so inconsiderable, that the sessions of the courts have always been short; and, until the existing system was brought forward in the House, I never heard a single person suggest that the old one was inadequate to the purposes of its institution.

It has been further urged, on the expediency of this question, that it was highly necessary and important to extend the powers and jurisdiction of the Federal Judiciary, on account of the inadequacy of the State courts, to decide on important questions. This, upon impartial investigation, will be found to be a frivolous, unfounded pretext. If it was in my power, I am sure, I have no inclination to derogate from the high character of the judges of the courts of the United States; nor shall I in any respect do it, when I state to you, as my opinion, that there never has been a court of the United States, of which the judges possessed more eminence of character, ability, law knowledge, impartiality, correctness of decision, and moral principle, than has adorned the bench of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, from its first establishment, under the present State constitution, to this time. In this opinion, I presume my colleagues will acquiesce, notwithstanding we are so unfortunate as to disagree on some other important points; and, sir, I can conceive of no reason to doubt of the other States in the Union being provided with alike respectable judiciaries; and there never has been an instance in which a State court has refused or neglected to decide with their usual promptitude, all actions which have arisen under the Federal Government, and come within their cognizance. Is there any reason, then, for extending the Federal Judiciary, on account of any judicial imbecility or inattention, in the State courts? No, sir, it would be highly derogatory to our country to admit the idea. The observations seem calculated solely to affect the eminent and important character of the State courts; but I trust, in the wisdom of my country, that every attempt of that kind will be rendered abortive.

Much has been said on the part of the opposition in regard to the security of life, liberty, and property, afforded by the act about to be repealed, and that the repeal would lay prostrate the great bulwark of our prosperity and independence, the national Judiciary. Can gentlemen be serious in these declarations? What is the fact? Sir, it is well known, that, by the old judiciary system, about to be revived, there is a Supreme Court, to hold its sessions at the seat of Government; a district court in each State in the Union, and a circuit court in each State in the Union, except Kentucky and Tennessee; that the duties of the circuit courts were performed in the respective States by a judge of the district court, except in the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, the judges of the district courts performed the duties incident to the circuit court without the aid of a judge of the Supreme Court. By the existing system, which is about to be repealed, the Supreme Court possesses the same powers which were delegated to them by the old system; the district courts in each State also retain the same powers under the present system, which they were vested with under the former one, and the principal powers of the circuit courts in each State are the same as under the old system. Where, then, is the mighty difference in the two systems as it relates to the administration of justice? Why do gentlemen exclaim, and so often reiterate the exclamation, the destruction of the Judiciary! the destruction of the Judiciary! when they know that the bill before you provides for keeping, in full force, precisely the same Judiciary system under which the people have enjoyed so much prosperity, from the adoption of the present Government to the last session of Congress, and that the denomination of the courts are the same, and the powers similar to those designated in their favorite system? It is not my intention to dilate on the motives of gentlemen; but I must take the liberty to observe that the declarations which insinuate that the bill under consideration goes in any respect to the destruction of the Judiciary, or to impede the due administration of justice, are futile and unfounded. The old system, which the friends of the present bill wish to see revived and continued in force, was adopted after much labor and investigation, (in which I have understood that great law character, the late Chief Justice of the United States, took a conspicuous part) as the most propitious mode of administering justice under the Federal Government which could be devised. I have always conceived it much better calculated to promote general justice, by producing a greater uniformity of decision in the different parts of the Union, than that adopted the last session; because the judges of the Supreme Court, after riding the circuits, have an opportunity, on their assemblage at the seat of Government, to compare their decisions, and, from time to time, agree on uniform principles, to be observed, both in the decision of great questions, and the forms to be pursued in the circuit courts. No such advantages can be derived from the system of the last session, the judges of each circuit are distinct; they have no immediate connexion with the judges of other circuits, or with the judges of the Supreme Court, and therefore their rules of procedure will vary according to the practice in the State courts, and will probably be different in each circuit; their decisions will probably be different in different parts of the Union, in many instances, where the questions are similar, which will cause additional appeals, produce a delay of justice, and subject the suitors to additional expense, trouble, and fatigue; and, in addition to the reasons which have been offered in favor of the old system, the saving of an expense of more than forty thousand dollars annually ought to have some weight with faithful Representatives of a free people, unless a public debt is in fact to be considered a public blessing.

MARCH, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

I am of opinion, said Mr. V., that some amendments which have been moved, and for which I have given my vote, would render the bill more perfect, and that it would be better to incorporate them in this bill than to make them the subject of a separate bill; but in this I have been overruled. The question now is on the passage of the bill without amendment; to which I shall give my yeas, believing the Judiciary system to be revived and continued in force by the bill, to be preferable to that which it repeals. At the same time I rest assured, that if the defects which have been named, or others, do actually exist, the wisdom of the Legislature will discover them, and speedily provide a remedy.

Mr. LOWNDES moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until the first Monday in December next; on which a debate of considerable length ensued; when, the question being taken thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 32, nays 59, as follows:

[The following remarks of Mr. BACON, supplemental to his speech on the Judiciary, delivered in Committee of the Whole on the above bill, on the 17th of February, should follow the conclusion of his remarks on that subject on page 564 ante, immediately preceding Mr. F. MORRIS. These supplemental remarks were written out and published subsequently to the first report of his speech in the National Intelligencer, and did not find their way to the Collection of the Debates on this subject afterwards printed in an octavo volume.—Editors.]

Mr. BACON, in continuation.—However I may differ in opinion from some with whom I have the honor generally to agree, I may not deny, but must frankly acknowledge the right of judicial officers of every grade to judge for themselves of the constitutionality of every statute on which they are called to act in their respective spheres. This is not only their right, but it is their indispensable duty thus to do. Nor is this the exclusive right and indispensable duty of the Judiciary department. It is equally the inherent and the indispensable duty of every officer, and I believe I may add, of every citizen of the United States. The Constitution is emphatically the law of the land. It certainly cannot be less so than the statute made present pursuant thereto. It is indeed paramount with us to all other human laws that can be made. In whatever capacity I may be called to act, where the law is to be the rule of my conduct, if two laws are found to clash with each other, in such case I cannot be governed by them both. Of necessity, therefore, I must either not act at all, or reject both, or else determine which shall give way. Should the Constitution and statute be found to contradict each other, the former, with me, must be preferred. But although this is a right of which every officer of the United States, as such, is constitutionally possessed; yet, for the due exercise of this, as also of all other such rights, he is responsible. He is not vested with a right to do wrong.

We have heard much of late about the peculiar and absolute independence of the Judiciary. Although this is a term unknown in the Constitution as applying particularly to the Judiciary department of the Government, yet it may, and ought to be admitted to be, in a certain sense, and in some respects true. The Judiciary are so far independent of the Legislative and Executive departments of the Government, that these, neither jointly or separately, have a right to prescribe, direct, or control its decisions. It must judge for itself, otherwise the decisions made in that department would not be the decisions of that, but of some other department or body of men. The Constitution, and the laws made pursuant thereto, are the only rule by which the Judiciary, in their official capacity, are to regulate their conduct. The same is the case with other departments. The Judiciary have no more right to prescribe, direct or control the acts of the other departments of the Government, than the other departments of the Government have to prescribe or direct those of the Judiciary.

The Judiciary are occasionally dependent on the President and Senate for their offices. They are in like manner dependent on the Legislature for the salaries which are assigned them for their services; although when once obtained, they cannot be deprived of either, unless in certain ways prescribed by the Constitution. The same is the case with all other offices. Some are independent in one respect, others in another.

The Judiciary are at all times dependent for their continuance in office on the judgment which the Senate and House of Representatives, acting in separate capacities, may pass on their conduct, so that whatever may be the case with judges in other countries, or in the particular States, or whatever pretensions may be made to the independence of the Judiciary of the United States the fact is, that agreeable to the Constitution our Judiciary are on the whole, much more dependent on the other departments of the Government, than the other departments, as such, are on the Judiciary. This being the case, it is in vain to exclaim about the dreadful consequences which may result from the doctrine for which we contend. For my own part, after all that I have heard, I am not at all alarmed at the imaginary consequences that may result from this doctrine. I see, at least I think I see, much greater reason to be alarmed at the consequences resulting from the opposite doctrine. But be the consequences what they may, the only remedy must be, either to alter, or to pervert the Constitution.

If we honestly and sincerely wish to understand in what respects our judges are independent, (if indeed they are so in any,) we are to recur to the Constitution, and that alone, and not first assume an independence for them such as we would wish, and thence infer such a meaning of the Constitution as will support the independence thus assumed, as seems to be the practice of one description of men among us. This is no other than reasoning in a circle, and drawing premises from conclusions—a species of logic which I do not understand.

Much has also been said by the opposers of the bill about checks and balances, and the same improvement is made of these alleged ingredients of our Government which has been made of that independence which has been assumed for the judges of our courts. Unfortunately, however, for them, these favorite and important terms are, in the Constitution, equally unknown with the independence of the judge. Perhaps it may be true that our Government is, in some respects, a Government of what may be termed checks and balances. But what those checks and balances are, we must learn from the same authentic source from whence our information is derived respecting the independence of our judges. It is a novel kind of logic with which we find ourselves assailed. In this case, as in that of the alleged independence of judicial courts, such checks and balances as suit the taste are first assumed, and from such assumed balances and checks the meaning of the Constitution is inferred, to prove the assumed fact. In any other case, and from any other men, we should be led almost to suspect such reasoning as this to be sophistical.

If such provisions as I will name are to be denominated checks and balances, we are happy to find that the Government of the United States is filled with them. The House of Representatives may pass a bill; the Senate may negative it, and vice versa, the Senate and House may both concur in the passing of a bill; the President has power either to approve, or to pass a qualified negative upon the same. The Senate and House can, in their turn, provided two-thirds of each agree, destroy the whole effect of such negative. The Judiciary may judge of the meaning of a law, when made, but they cannot make the law. The judges on the trial of a cause can neither acquit nor condemn which party they please; the jurors have a power to determine, as to the suit at least. The Executive is vested with power to execute the sentence of the judge, to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint and commission to office, and to perform other duties assigned to him by law; but he has not power, as I contend, to create either the law, the sentence, or the office. If the Executive or Judiciary, in their official capacity, violate the Constitution, or the laws made pursuant thereto, the House of Representatives may impeach and the Senate may try, condemn, and evict from office both the President and the judge. The Senators and the Representatives are originally dependent on the people for their appointment to office, and at certain periods, are in like manner dependent for a re-appointment. If these are to be considered as checks and balances, they are abundantly provided in the Constitution. Such checks and balances as these comport with that construction of the Constitution which we contend for. If there are others, either of a similar or of a different kind, let them be first pointed out, and they will be candidly acknowledged and respectfully received, at least by me.

But, with the Constitution open before me, and knowing, as I do, that all civil rule, power, and authority that exists in the community to which I belong, are to be brought to the test of that supreme, plain, and finished instrument, I can hardly be induced to act the preposterous part of recurring to the vague and doubtful postulates of men like myself to learn its contents

THURSDAY, March 4.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed, on the twenty-ninth of January last, to whom was referred the census of the inhabitants of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, with instructions to report whether any, and what measures ought, at this time, to be taken, for enabling the people of the said Territory to form a State Government for themselves, to be admitted into the Union upon the same terms with the original States; and to whom were also referred petitions from sundry inhabitants of that Territory to the like effect, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Lyon Lehman." Whereupon, it was moved that the further consideration of the said amendment be postponed until the first Monday in December next; and, the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative; and then the main question being taken that the House do agree to the amendment proposed by the Senate to said bill, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on the bill for revising and amending the acts concerning naturalization; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

FRIDAY, March 5.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, on the part of this House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, for the purpose of laying out, agreeably to law, the unexpended balance of a sum of five thousand dollars, heretofore appropriated to purchase books and maps for the use of the two Houses of Congress:

And, the question being taken thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. RANDOLPH, be appointed of the said committee on the part of this House, pursuant to the foregoing resolution.

The House then went into a Committee on the bill for revising and amending the acts concerning naturalization; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, provisions ought to be made, by law, for allowing pensions to persons who do, at this time, labor under disabilities in consequence of known wounds received in the actual service of the United States, and who have not heretofore been provided for; and that the committee report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. GILES, Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. LEWIS R. MORRIS, and Mr. GREGG, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The House went into Committee on the bill for the accommodation of persons concerned in certain fisheries therein mentioned. The Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time on Monday next.

The House went into Committee on the bill for the rebuilding the light-house on Gurnet point, at the entrance of Plymouth harbor, for rebuilding the light-house on the Eastern end of New Castle Island, for erecting a light-house on Lynde's point and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House. The said bill was then further amended; and, together with the amendments ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the nineteenth ultimo, on the petition of Francis Duchouquet; and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That there be paid to Francis Duchouquet, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of two hundred and ninety-one dollars and eighty-four cents, in full compensation for moneys by him advanced to redeem certain American citizens captured by the Indians.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. J. C. SMITH reported, from the Committee of Claims, on the petition of Jonathan Snowden.

The report was, that the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted. The reasons urged were, that the claim was barred by the statute of limitation.

Mr. GILES moved its reference to a Committee of the whole House, as the case was a peculiar one; the petitioner having been wounded, but whose wound was healed, and did not again break out until after the statute was passed. Being now a cripple, he prays a pension.

This gave rise to a lengthy discussion upon the general principles of doing justice to these unfortunate men, by again opening the pension list.

Mr. EVRIS strenuously pressed these cases generally upon the justice of Congress. The subject was postponed till Monday.

Mr. GILES afterward moved the appointment of a committee to consider of the subject, with leave to report a bill generally.

STATE BALANCES.

Mr. THOMAS, from the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the claims of the United States, for certain balances, which, by the Commissioners appointed to settle the accounts between the United States and the individual States, were reported to be due from several of the States to the United States, made a report, as follows:

That the following balances were, by the said Commissioners, reported to be due from the States herein-after mentioned, to wit: From the State of New York, two millions seventy-four thousand eight hundred and forty-six dollars; from the State of Pennsylvania, seventy-six thousand seven hundred and nine dollars; from the State of Delaware, six hundred and twelve thousand four hundred and twenty-eight dollars; from the State of Maryland, one hundred and fifty-one thousand six hundred and forty dollars; from the State of Virginia, one hundred thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine dollars; and from the State of North Carolina, five hundred and one thousand and eighty-two dollars.

That, as none of these States has evinced a disposition to pay any part of those balances, except the State of New York, which has been credited on the books of the Treasury for two hundred and twenty-two thousand eight hundred and ten dollars and six cents, for money expended in erecting fortifications, pursuant to an act of Congress, passed the 5th of February, 1799; but as it would be unequal to ask a further payment from that State exclusively, and as it does not appear that any measure of coercion can ever be resorted to, a further continuance of the demands against those States, the justice and equity of which they do not admit, will, in the opinion of the committee, answer no useful purpose; but, on the contrary, is calculated to occasion perpetual irritation and disquiet, as well to the creditor as to the debtor States.

The committee are, therefore, of opinion, that it is expedient to extinguish the claims of the United States for those balances, and for that purpose report a bill, which is herewith submitted.

The report was laid on the table. The bill was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Wednesday next.

NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GRISWOLD called for the resolution of Mr. LIEB, for the appointment of a committee to consider the propriety of abolishing the Navy Department. He thought it very improper to let a resolution of the importance this was, lie on the table so many days, as it certainly excited much alarm, from the impression that it was an opening wedge to the destruction of the Navy altogether.

Mr. LEIB said it would be recollected that when he proposed the resolution, the House were engaged on the Judiciary bill, and consequently there was not time to call it up till after the subject was settled. The time since that had not allowed of it.

Mr. GILES did not wonder that a state of alarm existed, when it was recollected that, during the late debate, gentlemen had descanted so largely on the destruction of these institutions. Mr. G. proceeded to vindicate himself from the charge made by some gentlemen, during that debate, of being opposed to the Navy altogether. He declared he was not opposed to a Navy under certain restrictions. He did, to be sure, vote against building the frigates, and he was not yet sorry for it. The professed object of them was to go against the Algerines, who were at that time molesting our commerce. But what did they do towards that service? Nothing. But, added to the expense of building those six frigates, was the payment of an enormous sum of money to purchase the peace.

Mr. RUTLEDGE hoped the subject would soon be gone into; he had heard of the proposition creating alarm. The motion might now be taken up, and made the order for some other early day, which would, in some measure, subside the alarm.

Mr. GREGG hoped it would now be taken up, and decided upon, as a saving of time.

It was taken up, when Mr. LEIB relieved the embarrassment of gentlemen, and their fears of alarm, by withdrawing the resolution.

And the House adjourned.

MONDAY, March 8.

An engrossed bill for revising and amending the acts concerning naturalization was read the third time: Whereupon, a motion was made, and the question being put, that the fourth section of the said bill be re-committed to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House to-day, it was resolved in the affirmative.

An engrossed bill for the accommodation of persons concerned in certain fisheries therein mentioned was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for rebuilding the light-house on Gurnet Point, at the entrance of Plymouth harbor, for rebuilding the light-house at the eastern end of Newcastle Island, for erecting a light-house on Lynde's Point, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed, on the fourth of January last, to inquire whether any, and what, alterations should be made in the judicial establishment of the United States, and to report a provision for securing the impartial selection of juries in the courts of the United States, to whom was referred, on the fifth of the same month, a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Pennsylvania, settled on the lands claimed under grants from the State of Connecticut antecedent to the trial before the court of commissioners between the said States of Pennsylvania and Connecticut, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the settlement of the claims to the lands held by settlers and traders at Detroit, and within the jurisdiction and precinct thereof, which they may have a right to, by virtue of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States; and that the said committee report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. FEARING, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. TENNEY, Mr. ELMER, and Mr. BOUDE, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the laws laying duties on stills and domestic distilled spirits, on refined sugar, licenses to retailers, sales at auction, pleasurable carriages, stamped vellum, parchment, and paper, and postage on newspapers, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the same committee, presented a bill to repeal the internal taxes; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the whole House last appointed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States,' with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Francis Duchouquet; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States:" Whereupon,

Resolved. That this House doth agree to the first, second, third, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth amendments proposed by the Senate to the said bill.

On the question that the House do agree with the Senate in their fourth amendment to the said bill, to wit: section fourth, line second, strike out "twenty-five," and insert "forty," it passed in the negative—yeas 24, nays 59, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, Robert Brown, John Campbell, John Condit, Richard Cutts, William Eustis, John Fowler, William B. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, George B. Upham, Isaac Van Horne, Peleg Wadsworth, and Robert Williams.

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the said amendment.

On the question that the House do agree with the Senate in their fifth amendment to the said bill, to wit: section fifth, line sixth, strike out "twenty," and insert "forty," it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the said amendment.

On the question that the House do agree with the Senate in their fifteenth amendment to the said bill, to wit:

Section twenty-fourth, strike out all the words after "discharge" in the third line, and insert as follows, viz: "To each officer, whose term of service in any military corps of the United States shall not have exceeded three years, three months' pay; to all other officers so deranged, one month's pay of their grades respectively, for each year of past service in the Army of the United States, or in any regiment or corps, now or formerly in the service thereof:"

It passed in the negative—yeas 36, nays 35, as follows:

TUESDAY, March 9.

A memorial of sundry merchants of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, and citizens of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying relief in the case of depredations committed on the vessels and cargoes of the memorialists, while in pursuit of their lawful commerce, by the privateers of the French Republic, during the late European war.

Also, a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the county of New London, in the State of Connecticut, and citizens of the United States, to the same effect.

Ordered, That, the said memorials be referred to the committee appointed on the fifth ultimo, to whom was referred a memorial of sundry citizens of the United States, and resident merchants in the city of Baltimore, to the same effect.

A petition of sundry merchants residing in the city and State of New York, importers of cotton hides, and other raw materials, for manufacture, was presented to the House and read, stating the inconveniences and expense to which the petitioners are subjected, by being obliged, under the quarantine laws of the said State, to unlade and deposit, for a limited time in every year, the said articles on Staten Island; and praying that they may be permitted to keep the same in the public storehouse of the United States erected on the island aforesaid, free from storage, during the period of such quarantine.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed, on the eighth of January last, to inquire and report whether any, and what, alterations are necessary to be made in the "Act respecting quarantine and health laws."

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States.'" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the first, second, and third amendments.

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the fourth amendment of the Senate to the said bill.

The House went into Committee on the bill for the relief of Francis Duchouquet; which was reported without amendment and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the fourth section of the engrossed bill for revising and amending the acts concerning naturalization; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported an amendment thereto; which was read, and being further amended at the Clerk's table, was again read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said fourth section as amended, together with the bill, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Francis Duchouquet," was read the third time, and passed.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufacture, of the tenth ultimo, on the memorials and petitions of sundry manufacturers of gunpowder, of hats, of types, of brushes, and of stone-ware, within the United States; and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, without coming to any decision.

DANIEL W. COXE.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendment, reported on the fourth ultimo, from the Committee of the whole House, to the bill for the relief of Daniel W. Coxe and others, in the words following, to wit;

Section first—lines fourth and fifth, strike out the words, "by Daniel W. Coxe."

And on the question that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the said amendment, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 43, nays 36, as follows;

YEAS—John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, Rob't Brown, William Butler, Samuel J. Cabell, Matthew Clay, John Condit, Manasseh Cutler, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, Thomas T. THURSDAY, March 11.

A memorial of the Illinois and Ouabache Land Companies was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will be pleased to devise some speedy and effectual mode for a final investigation and decision of the claims of the memorialists, as proprietors of lands purchased from the Indians prior to the American Revolution, either in the courts of the United States, or by law commissioners, specially to be appointed for that purpose.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the committee appointed on the fourth of January last, to inquire whether any, and what, alteration should be made in the Judicial Establishment of the United States, and to report a provision for securing the impartial selection of juries in the courts of the United States; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was re-committed on the twenty-seventh of January last, their report on the memorial of Thomas K. Jones, made an amendatory report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Collector for the port of Boston and Charlestown be, and he hereby is, authorized to issue to Thomas K. Jones the debentures on ten pipes of wine, imported by said Jones in the ship Juno, Captain Thomas Dingley, and exported on the fifteenth of June last, in the ship Enterprise, Captain Hearsay, for Havana, on full and satisfactory proof being made to the said collector of the actual quantity of wine in the said pipes, at the time of their being shipped, as aforesaid: Provided, that every other requisite shall have been pursued, agreeably to law, for obtaining the said drawback.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred on the thirteenth of January last the petition of David Mead Randolph, made a report, which was read and considered: Whereupon

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to apportion to the several Marshals of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, respectively, who have been employed or concerned in taking the late Census, the compensation allowed by the “Act providing for the second census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States,” according to the service each Marshal may have performed.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with the committee appointed, on the fifth instant, on the part of this House, “for the purpose of laying out, agreeably to law, the unexpended balance of a sum of five thousand dollars, heretofore appropriated to purchase books and maps for the use of the two Houses of Congress.”

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sum of — dollars ought to be appropriated to the erection and repair of piers in the river Delaware:

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of certain districts therein mentioned; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. GRISWOLD laid the following motion, in substance, on the table:

Resolved, That it is proper to make provision by law towards indemnifying the merchants of the United States for French spoliations, so far as claims for the same have been abandoned by the convention with France.

Ordered to lie on the table.

WYOMING CONTROVERSY.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Pennsylvania, settled on the lands claimed under grants from the State of Connecticut, antecedent to the trial before the court of commissioners between the State of Pennsylvania and Connecticut.

The report of the committee embraces an historical view of the Wyoming controversy, recites the act of Pennsylvania, for preventing intrusions upon land in Northampton, Northumberland, and Luzerne counties. The report then proceeds to state:

“The petitioners complain of these acts as unconstitutional, and pray that provision may be made by law for transferring the proceedings under these laws from the State Courts of Pennsylvania to the Courts of the United States; and that further provision may be made by law, that in the trial of any prosecution in virtue of the said acts the defendant may have a venire facias to summon juries from some State, other than Pennsylvania. Your committee conceive, that the right of jurisdiction was finally settled by the decree of Trenton, of the 30th December, 1783, and that by the decision of the circuit court for the district of Pennsylvania in April 1795, the whole question of the right of soil was fully taken up and decided by the court, in a case the most favorable for the defendant; which decision not having been revised and reversed, should also be considered as final and conclusive.

Your committee therefore, upon the whole circumstances of the case, are of opinion, that the measures contemplated by the petitioners would tend very much to increase the embarrassments already experienced by the State of Pennsylvania, in extending and enforcing its lawful jurisdiction over the lands in question, and that it would be highly inexpedient on the part of the United States to interfere with the regulations of the States in that respect, or to countenance, by any means whatever, any circumstances of insubordination to the State authority.

Your committee are therefore of opinion, that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted."

After a debate, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the report.

A motion was made and lost to recommit the report to a select committee.

It was then moved to postpone the further consideration of the report till the last day of November next. Not carried.

The question was then taken on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their report, by yeas and nays, and agreed to—yeas 60, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Archer, Theodorus Bailey, James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, Robert Brown, William Butler, Samuel J. Cabell, John Campbell, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Manasseh Cutler, Richard Cutts, John Dennis, William Dickson, Lucas Elmendorf, Ebenezer Elmer, William Eustis, Andrew Gregg, Seth Hastings, Joseph Heister, William Helms, Joseph Hemphill, William H. And so the petition was rejected.

FRIDAY, March 12.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the marshals of certain districts therein mentioned was read the third time and passed.

The House being informed that NARSWORTHY HUNTER, the Delegate from the Mississippi Territory, in this House, died last evening:

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of NARSWORTHY HUNTER, late a Delegate from the Mississippi Territory; and that this House will attend the same.

Resolved, That the members testify their respect for the memory of the said NARSWORTHY HUNTER, by wearing a crape on the left arm, for one month.

Resolved, That the SPEAKER of this House address a letter to the Governor of the Mississippi Territory, to inform him of the death of NARSWORTHY HUNTER, the Delegate from the said Territory in this House, in order that measures may be taken to supply the vacancy occasioned thereby.

Ordered, That Mr. LEIB, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. RUTLEDGE, and Mr. LEWIS R. MORRIS, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the first resolution.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill for the relief of Thomas K. Jones; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was re-committed, on the fifth ultimo, the bill for the relief of Isaac Zane, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making an appropriation for defraying the expenses which may arise from carrying into effect the Convention made between the United States and the French Republic; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that the funeral of NARSWORTHY HUNTER, late a Delegate from the Mississippi Territory, who died last evening, will be attended to-morrow, at twelve o'clock; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

STATE BALANCES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to extinguish the claims of the United States for balances reported against certain States by Commissioners appointed to settle the accounts between the United States and the individual States.

Mr. THOMAS.—Mr. Chairman, I rise, with a great deal of diffidence, to deliver my sentiments on this floor, as I have not been accustomed to public speaking; however, a sense of my duty as a Representative of the United States, as well as the immediate Representative from the State of New York, impels me, on this occasion, to ask the indulgence of the Committee while I make a few remarks on the subject of the bill now under consideration.

Sir, a number of the debtor States, and particularly the one which I have the honor to represent, have always believed that they were prodigiously injured in the settlement that was made; they have always believed that there was something radically wrong, grossly unequal, in the accounts exhibited by the individual States, and allowed by the Board of Commissioners; in this belief, they have frequently called for information on the subject, for a re-examination of that settlement, and have as often been denied it.

Much might be said to prove that the very economical system adopted and adhered to by the State of New York in limiting the prices of produce, and in liquidating the accounts of her citizens for supplies furnished during the Revolutionary war, operated particularly prejudicial to that State in the settlement. I shall, however, waive any remarks on this for the present, and confine myself principally to the rule which was adopted for apportioning the expenses of the war among the several States. Sir, the Committee will recollect that by an act of Congress passed in the year 1789, the enumeration of inhabitants made in the year 1791 was adopted as the rule for apportioning this debt among the thirteen States.

I shall in the first place examine the original contract entered into by these States, and under which these expenses were incurred, and then endeavor to show the effect which, adopting an enumeration made seven or eight years after the close of the war, had upon the several States different from what the same rule would have produced had the apportionment been made according to the numbers in each State at that period, say 1784.

In the year 1778, the people of these States entered into a Confederation for various purposes, one of which was, to prosecute the war against Great Britain. In the eighth article of this compact it was expressly agreed that—

“All charges of the war, and all other expenses that should be incurred for the common defence and general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, should be defrayed out of a common treasury, which should be supplied by the several States in proportion to the value of all lands within each State granted to or surveyed for any person as such lands and the building and improvements thereon should be estimated, according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled, should from time to time direct and appoint.”

This, Mr. Chairman, was the agreement under which this debt was incurred; and here allow me to ask the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) whether he was correct when he told us the other day that this settlement had been made agreeably to the articles of Confederation; and, further, whether, agreeably to that compact, the State which he represents would have been allowed for her losses in the Penobscot expedition, which has enabled her to become a creditor State of upwards of one million two hundred thousand dollars, and more than one-third of the whole amount of the balances. Sir, had the original agreement under which these expenses were incurred been adhered to in the settlement, no one ought now to complain; but, in order to comply with it, the expenses of the war ought to have been apportioned among the several States according to the value of the lands and buildings at the time these expenses were incurred, and I do contend that the period immediately after the termination of the war was the only proper one for carrying into effect this stipulation. I am persuaed that no gentleman on this floor will deny that the existing circumstances of the several States at that period was the most proper to determine the just proportion which each State ought to pay of these expenses, by whatever rule might be adopted. Admitting, then, that Congress had the power, and it was judged expedient to deviate from the original contract, and adopt as the rule of apportionment the enumeration of inhabitants as a more practicable one, ought it not to have had reference to the numbers in each State at the close of the war? Most unquestionably, Mr. Chairman, no gentleman will deny this, and that the year 1784 was the proper time. It may, however, be said that no enumeration was made till the year 1791, seven years afterwards. I grant it. But will this alter the justness of my position? Not at all. It must be obvious in the mind of every gentleman who has reflected on the subject, that the relative numbers in each State had changed materially between the year 1784, when this settlement ought to have been made, and the year 1791, when it was made. In order to establish this fact, I have adopted this method; I have admitted what I believe every gentleman who hears me will, without hesitation: that there has been no material variation in the increase of population in the several States since the year 1784; that the increase was nearly, if not correctly, in the same ratio between the years 1784 and 1791, with the increase between the years 1791 and 1801; that is, that the relative increase of population in the several States was nearly, if not correctly, in the same proportion for the seven years previous to the year 1791 that it was for the ten years subsequent to that period.

This I have established as my data, by which I have ascertained the numbers in each State in the year 1784, and having apportioned the whole debt among the several States, according to the enumeration, I find the following to be the result:

That the State of Massachusetts, instead of being a creditor of $1,248,801, she would have been a creditor for only $863,267; that the State of Connecticut, instead of being a creditor State of $619,121, she would have been a debtor State for $235,419; that the State of Rhode Island, instead of being a creditor State for $299,611, she would have been a debtor State for $13,212; that the State of New Jersey, instead of being a creditor for $49,030, she would have been a debtor State for $300,201; that the State of New York, instead of being a debtor State for $2,074,846, she would have been a creditor State for $965,921, &c.

This, Mr. Chairman, would have been the situation of those States had the apportionment been made according to the numbers in each State in the year 1784. As for the accuracy of this statement I think I can with safety pledge myself; it is, however, open for any gentleman who will give himself the trouble to examine it for himself. The principles on which it has been made cannot be disputed, as it respects the State of New York; if anything, it does not make enough in her favor, for it is evident that the emigration into that State from the neighboring States was greater for the first seven years after the close of the war than it has been for any subsequent seven years.

State Balances.

H. OF R.

Will, then, Mr. Chairman, any gentleman hesitate a moment to pronounce the rule of apportionment which was adopted unjust, unequal, and erroneous? Will any gentleman say, sir, that the rule of apportionment was a just one, or as just as the nature of the case would admit of, which brought the State of New York in debt upwards of two millions—two-thirds of the whole amount of the balances—when, on the principles of righteousness, on the principles of legal contract, or any other principles, but an unauthorized act of Congress, that State would have been a creditor State for nearly a million?

Mr. Chairman, I admit, as the settlement has been made, and the creditor States have received their balances, that it would be improper now to take up this subject de novo, and endeavor to compel those States to refund what they have received more than they were entitled to; this is not expected—it is not asked; all that is asked of you is, that you render such justice to those injured States as the present situation of this transaction will admit of; this is all that is contemplated in the bill now before us.

Sir, as to the present situation of the State of New York with respect to this subject, she has not acknowledged the justice of this claim, as was stated by some gentlemen when this question was under consideration the other day; she has uniformly denied it. It is true she did comply with the act of Congress passed in February, 1799, and has expended and been credited on the books of your Treasury for $223,810 under that act; she did this, not from a conviction of the justice of the claim, but from motives which have always actuated her conduct, as well during the Revolutionary war as since, to do everything in her power for the general welfare of the nation, whenever its exigencies required it, and also from an expectation that the other States called debtor States would do the same, and thereby get rid of an evil which she considers as having a tendency to alienate the good will and cordial affection so necessary to be cherished between these States—a cause, sir, which has and will, while it is suffered to exist, occasion perpetual irritation and disquiet, as well to the creditor as to the debtor States, and which may at some future period produce consequences more fatal.

I say, sir, these were her motives in agreeing to that measure; and did she not evince a magnanimous spirit by doing it? A willingness to suffer an additional injury herself, rather than not remove a cause which might put in jeopardy the peace and harmony of these United States? But, Mr. Chairman, as it can answer no useful purpose to have the remainder of the money expended in the manner directed by the act—and this I am warranted in stating to the Committee, not only as my own opinion, but as the opinion of the gentleman who was employed under Government as an agent or commissioner to superintend the expenditure already made—as no other State has evinced a disposition to extinguish these balances by paying any part of them, or by complying with any of the terms heretofore offered by Congress; and as it must be admitted on all hands that Congress have no power to effect it by eviction, I ask gentlemen if it would be just or reasonable that the State of New York, who has been injured more in the settlement than any other State in the Union; who has already paid upwards of $220,000 towards these balances, and who is the only State that has, or in all probability ever will, pay a cent towards them—I say, I ask gentlemen of the Committee whether it would be just that that State should now be driven to one of two alternatives; either to draw near a million of dollars from her citizens and expend it where it will answer no useful purpose to the State nor to the nation, or to withhold any further appropriations, and thereby incur the imputation of having violated her faith? I call upon gentlemen seriously to consider whether it would not be prodigiously unjust to hold that State in this predicament; whether it would not be adding injury to injustice to do it?

Mr. Chairman, I do flatter myself that the representatives of this nation, convened here to legislate on fair and equitable principles, will not suffer a new wound to be inflicted on that State, but that they will unite with one accord in passing the bill now before us, and thereby not only heal the one already made on that, as well as several of her sister States, but remove a rock which may endanger our Federal ship.

The bill was supported by Messrs. RANDOLPH, VAN RENSSELAER, HILL, VAN NESS, GREGG, BAYARD, SMILIE, MACON, S. SMITH, CLAIBORNE, and HOLLAND—and opposed by Messrs. ELMER, BACON, EUSTIS, HASTINGS, and BUTLER.

The question was then taken on the Committee rising, and reporting the bill without amendment, and carried—yeas 47, nays 33.

A motion was then made that the bill be engrossed for a third reading on Tuesday, and carried—yeas 47, nays 35.

A motion was then made by Mr. LEIB to recommit the report of the select committee on which the above bill was founded, in order to correct an erroneous statement in relation to Pennsylvania.

SATURDAY, March 13.

The House met, but no quorum being present, adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, March 15.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee appointed, on the seventh of January last, “to inquire whether any, and, if, any, what, addition it may be necessary to make to the military stores of the United States,” made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire whether any further compensation, than is already provided by law, ought to be made to the Commissioners of the direct tax, or any of them; and that they report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. THOMAS, from the committee to whom was re-committed, on the twelfth instant, a report of the same committee, appointed "to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the claims of the United States for certain balances, which by the Commissioners appointed to settle the accounts between the United States and the individual States, were reported to be due from several of the States to the United States," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RANDOLPH called for the order of the day on the bill for repealing the internal taxes.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, that he hoped the resolution which he had laid on the table for indemnifying for French spoliations would be first taken up. It was important, before a decision was made on the repeal of the internal taxes, that the extent of indemnities made by Government should be known. He therefore moved a postponement of the bill on internal taxes till to-morrow, that, in the meantime, his motion might be acted upon. He concluded by desiring the yeas and nays.

The motion of Mr. GRISWOLD is as follows:

"Resolved, That it is proper to make provision by law towards indemnifying the merchants of the United States for losses sustained by them from French spoliations, the claims for which losses have been renounced by the final ratification of the Convention with France, as published by proclamation of the President of the United States."

Mr. LOWNDES observed, that it was nearly two months since the Committee was raised, to whom had been committed the petitions of merchants praying indemnities; notwithstanding this length of time, the Committee had not yet met. He hoped this resolution would induce the Committee to meet.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that he had presented the first petition on the subject of French spoliations, and that it had been immediately referred to a select committee, who, though they had made progress in the business committed to them, had not considered it fair to decide until all the petitions expected on the subject had been received. One indeed had been presented only this morning. Mr. S. asked if this mode was not perfectly just and fair? For himself, on this subject, he was precluded from voting, as he was deeply interested in the decision of the House. He mentioned this circumstance that the reason might be understood why particular gentlemen from different parts of the Union did not vote on this question in its several stages.

Mr. LOWNDES said he did not consider the right of deciding the principle delegated to the select committee. That must be decided in the House. It was the duty of the committee barely to make arrangements to protect the House from imposition on the score of facts. If it shall be determined by the Government, that it is improper to make compensation—though he thought such a decision scarcely possible—the select committee may be discharged. If, on the other hand, it is thought proper to compensate, the committee may go into the investigation of details.

The order of the day is called for on repealing the internal taxes. But ought not the House to understand the amount with which the Government will stand charged on these indemnities, before those taxes are repealed? Mr. L. said he was of opinion the claims could not be rejected. They were too just to be disregarded. It was the duty of the Government to protect its citizens from the depredations of an enemy. Government, for a certain national good, had thought proper to abandon the claims of its citizens on the French Government. Surely no man would say, the Government possessed the right to seize the property of a certain description of its citizens, and appropriate it to general purposes. He repeated, that these claims must be paid by the Government. Was it not then proper to determine their extent before the internal taxes were taken off?

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH submitted it to the candor of the gentleman from Virginia to waive his motion until that made by the gentleman from Connecticut, respecting French spoliations, should be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MITCHELL felt it an obligation, that the case of those whom he had the honor to represent, and that of the other merchants in the United States, should be taken up and receive from this House the most deliberate and serious consideration. He had before submitted to the House his ideas on the proper course to be pursued, which it was not necessary for him to repeat. He would, however, observe, that the resolution now made was so broad as entirely to defeat its object. The first reference of this business was to a select committee instructed to examine all the papers and documents in relation to it, with an instruction to report their opinion to the House; on receiving which the House might be able to come to a decision. On the other hand, the present proposition goes to commit the House on the whole extent of the subject without any examination whatever.

Mr. M. said, he would suggest a few reasons, which satisfied his mind that a decision should not be too rapidly pressed. The vessels taken by the French admitted of various classifications. One class consisted of those that were captured before the dissolution of our treaty with France; another class of those which were captured after that event; another class of those that were captured by pirates without commissions; and another class, where captures were made on account of contraband goods. All these classes involved distinct considerations; and when the subject was presented to the House in a form so complicated, was it proper precipitately to decide a principle that might bind the Government to make indemnity for all cases whatever?

Mr. M. said he had no doubt but that such property of the citizens of the United States as came fairly under the character of spoliated property, would be considered as a fit subject of indemnity. He was one of those who thought that in such cases payment ought to be made. He considered the merchants as a very important class of citizens, and that their interests ought to be protected. This he thought the more necessary from the consideration of the bill on the table, which, when passed, will render the Government very dependent on mercantile credit.

MARCH, 1802.

French Spoliations.

H. OF R.

Mr. M. was of opinion that the best way of accomplishing the object of the merchants was not to precipitate the subject. On the other hand, he was of opinion that the best chance of success would arise from an examination of the various classes of spoliations, from separating them from each other, thereby enabling the House to act understandingly upon them. The resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut was so vague as not to be susceptible of any distinct meaning. He hoped, therefore, the subject would be suffered to undergo a full and deliberate investigation in the select committee, which he, as a member of that committee, assured the House was progressing as fast as a sense of justice and a regard to our merchants require.

Mr. DANA.—The object of the present motion is to take up the resolution of my colleague, and to take order upon it—not to decide definitely upon it. This being the true question, I hope the gentleman from New York will not think it improper in me to say that many of his remarks do not apply to it. As the question is not whether we shall immediately decide the point, but only place it in a train for decision, it must be discussed either in a Committee of the Whole, or in a select committee; and we ask the House now to decide which, that it may be progressing towards a final decision.

The resolution states a general principle. If it is the fixed determination of the majority, without an inquiry, not to grant any relief whatever, there is an end of the business. But if you agree to grant any relief, the resolution ought to be adopted. The principle is then established of indemnifying; after which you may discriminate.

The principle on which the resolution is founded is not that Government has declined to insist upon the claims of its citizens against the French; but that it has undertaken to abandon their claims, so that no citizen can now come forward with his claim either against the French Government or any citizen of France. For this is the construction of the treaty as finally ratified by the Government. It is a complete surrender and renunciation of all demands. Among the first claims of our citizens are some of private right, which, were it not for the treaty, could be recovered in the courts of France, but which the treaty bars. This constitutes a class of claims which the Government cannot refuse to indemnify. There are other descriptions of claims which might require discrimination; in some of which the degree of compensation should be varied, and others in which there should be no compensation whatever. I think, therefore, it is proper for the Government to say the business shall be attended to; at some future time an inquiry may be made into the nature of the various claims, This is all we ask.

Mr. GRISWOLD said that the gentleman from New York had misapprehended the order of proceeding in that House. He supposes the present resolution so vaguely worded as to be improper to be passed. But, if taken up, that very gentleman may offer any amendment he pleases. I do, however, apprehend that it is so worded as to bring the subject fairly before the House. It is worded even with caution. Its sole object is to bring the principle of indemnity before the House, unfettered, that its decision might not be embarrassed by any details; supposing there would be an indisposition in the House to pledge the nation to an unlimited extent, the words used are, "towards indemnifying." Gentlemen, therefore, who are disposed to do anything, can feel no objection to a resolution so qualified. Other parts of the resolution are worded with equal caution, so as to extend only to cases where losses are renounced by treaty. Are gentlemen unwilling to indemnify for such losses?

This is a principle proper for decision in Committee of the Whole. Why take it to a select committee? It involves no details; it requires the elucidation of no facts. We know the losses of our merchants, and we know the treaty has renounced them. The House is, therefore, prepared to say whether it will or will not indemnify. When the principle is decided, it may be sent to a select committee to settle the details. I hope that it will be taken up, and an early day fixed for consideration.

The gentleman says the committee are progressing. It may be so. Though I observe the gentleman from South Carolina says the committee has not yet met. How progressing? Without meeting? I do not understand this new mode, though I will not say that it is not a very correct mode. The gentleman further says the committee have not progressed because they wished to have first all the petitions before them; but the principle to be settled is as much involved in one petition as in all.

Mr. GREGG said he should not have risen but for the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, and after him those of the gentleman from Connecticut, who had stated that the committee had not met. Being a member of the committee he would inform those gentlemen that the committee had met; that they had perused a number of the papers, and had determined that it was improper to proceed until they had received documents that would show the extent of the claims.

As the business now stands, we find it referred to a select committee, instructed to examine the papers, and report their opinion thereupon. This report will form the grounds of decision for the House. Now the gentleman would wrest the business from the committee, and urge the House into a decision without any of the necessary information. The attempt was unprecedented. Mr. G. said he never knew a similar instance where the select committee had not been previously discharged.

Mr. LOWNDES rose to explain. He said that when he informed the House that the committee had never been called together, he had been induced to say so, from never having been himself notified, though a member of the committee.

Mr. BAYARD thought the motion ought to prevail for the reason assigned by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut. He has properly remarked that we are not now called on to decide the abstract question, but only to say what course of proceeding shall be pursued. The point ought now to be decided whether the business shall be sent to a select committee, or to a Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says it is altogether unprecedented to take a subject out of the hands of a select committee. But this will not be the effect of the resolution; which will only facilitate the business before the committee, and shed additional light on the path they ought to pursue. We do not wish to interfere with the operations of the committee, but to decide a question that will greatly facilitate their proceedings, and which question ought to be settled in a Committee of the Whole. It is peculiarly and strikingly proper to postpone the question of repealing the internal taxes until a decision shall have been made on these claims. Not that we are anxious to decide upon them immediately, but because we are solicitous not to prejudice all claims to indemnity by repealing the very taxes on which the indemnity must depend. Do gentlemen mean to decide at once thus precipitately against all indemnity whatever? If they are not in favor of so deciding, surely they will not be for immediately deciding on the internal taxes.

Let the gentleman from New York classify the claims as he pleases, can he tell the extent of the demands? May they not amount to five million or ten million of dollars? And if to either sum, can we with propriety dispense with the internal taxes? It appears from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that the whole of the revenue for the year 1803 and 1804 will be wanted. If, then, these claims shall be allowed, and shall produce an increase of the public debt, the fund derived from the internal revenue will be required.

It is cruel to decide at once against the claims of our merchants. If it is predetermined not to give them relief, at least allow them the consolation of a hearing. Whoever votes for now taking up the question of the repeal of the internal taxes, votes, not only against indemnifying, but also against hearing the merchants; because he votes away all means of indemnification. It is hard, peculiarly hard, that at the moment when you are about to throw the whole burdens of the Government upon the merchants, you should deny them a hearing, an impartial hearing, of their claims. Suppose there should be a combination of these men, seeing the Government act towards them with such flagrant injustice, to refuse all importations. I ask, if you do not, by such treatment, put the Government entirely into their hands?

If gentlemen will agree to postpone the question of internal taxes, we will agree to postpone this question, if they are not prepared to decide upon it. The subject of the internal taxes is the least pressing of all the subjects before the House. The bill, indeed, ought not pass until we know the appropriations that are necessary to be made for the present year. Have gentlemen shown, can they show, that with propriety these taxes can be dispensed with from any retrenchments that can be made in our expenditures? I do not know any official document on this point, except that of the Secretary of War, who, in his very correct report, says there will be a saving in his department of a little more or less than $500,000; which report I confess I do not understand. The Committee of Ways and Means say there will be a retrenchment in the War Department of a sum not exceeding $400,000; which mode of expression I do not precisely comprehend. Surely we ought to know with precision the sums that will be required for the objects of the Government before we abandon our resources.

Mr. EUSTIS thought the object of indemnity to our merchants very important both in its nature and its consequences. And, first, as to its amount, it was known to be great. The consequence of these applications will be a hearing, and procedure thereon. And the amount of the claims, as well as the nature of them, ought to have great influence on the deliberations of the House. And yet we talk of deciding the abstract question, when the very facts on which we are to decide are not before us. For it will be perceived by the public prints that the claims of the merchants of the State of Massachusetts are not yet brought forward. The necessary evidence is not before the House. I appeal to the gentlemen to know how we are to act, understandingly, if the subject be taken up now. What is the abstract question? Will gentlemen say they will pay all demands before they know anything of their nature or amount?

The gentleman from Delaware had stated fairly that this is a question whether the internal taxes shall be repealed or not. I know the internal taxes must be repealed. I consider the conversations and proceedings which have already taken place here and elsewhere as having shaken that revenue to its centre; as having placed it in such a situation as to prevent your officers from being able to collect it—its collection being peculiarly dependent upon the good faith of the community. My own opinion was, that the repeal of these taxes should have been the last act of the session; but a different aspect has been given to the subject; the people expect the taxes to be immediately taken off; and I therefore think it best to pass the bill at an early day.

The claims of our merchants are very serious, and merit great consideration. But the revenue, which gentlemen are so anxious to retain, to them will be but as the light dust in the balance. I presume that the losses of the merchants of Massachusetts alone are not less than five to ten millions of dollars. But to act understandingly upon them we must have evidence as well of their amount as their nature, both of which we at present want.

Mr. RUTLEDGE.—I am sorry the resolution of my honorable friend from Connecticut is not acceptable to the gentleman from New York. It is not the least indelicate to that committee. On the contrary, were I a member of that committee, I should feel infinitely gratified by it. I would ask solicitously, whether it were possible that Congress would agree to this principle before the details were gone into. We are now for giving that information to the committee.

The honorable gentleman says this resolution conveys no light. But I will say, that, if adopted, it will confer not only light, but comfort to our merchants. It will foster their hopes, and animate them to meet the difficulties under which they are staggering.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says there is no evidence of fact. What fact? Surely he will not say there is no evidence of the French having condemned our vessels, and of their having committed vast spoliation. If this were so, how happens it that an American embassy had demanded compensation; and that, on the ulterior negotiations of the Government, the Government had said we will abandon it, that we may release ourselves from guarantying to France her colonial possessions. Had this not been so, France might have called upon us to guaranty her West India possessions, and to supply her with men and money. From this situation we have been kept by those negotiations which terminated in an abandonment of the just claims of your merchants on the French Government or her citizens. And this constitutes your good bargains.

If these are facts, we possess sufficient evidence not only to justify, but to compel our paying the merchants, if under the influence of common honesty. The amount is perfectly immaterial. Whatever it is we must pay it. It is true that of the millions claimed, Government may not in law or equity be compelled to pay more than a small part. But if you establish the principle that there shall be an indemnity made, you enable your committee to devise the mode of collecting evidences of and settling the validity of the claims.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has observed that my honorable friend from Delaware has boldly avowed his object to be to refuse to repeal the internal taxes. We do avow it. For if we once repeal them, then we shall be told there is no money wherewith to pay these claims however just.

Before we repeal these taxes we ought clearly to understand the state of our Naval Establishment. We ought to see whether it is to be fostered or starved. I perceive that the Naval Committee call for $160,000; but where is it to come from?

But the gentleman from Massachusetts says these taxes, right or wrong, must be repealed. For, he says, the public expectation has already decided the question; and that, indeed, the public officers could not now collect them. But I hope for the honor of the Government, and of the American people, this opinion is not correct. I hope the Government has still energy enough to collect, and the people honesty enough to pay them, without resistance. In certain sections of the Union the payment has been resisted. But those who opposed were compelled to pay the tax. It is possible that in some quarters there may be further resistance. But it will be partial. The people generally will pay; and I am sorry any contrary suggestion has been made. I hope, too, the people will not be led astray either by Executive communications or conversations.

Mr. MITCHELL begged to be indulged in making a few observations on what had fallen from the gentleman from South Carolina. I do not know that these observations will satisfy his mind, but they will at least serve to justify my own character as a Representative of a portion of the Union respectable for its mercantile opulence. I believe the subject of indemnities, in the contemplation of gentlemen, has swelled much beyond its real magnitude. I believe that a large portion of losses were so covered by insurance that Government will not be obliged to pay for them. I feel as sincerely for the merchants as any gentleman; yet I do not wish to swell the subject to an improper magnitude. Suppose, as the gentlemen wish, we say we will indemnify, does that pay the claims?

Besides, it is not so evident, as some gentlemen assert, that our merchants have been deprived of valuable rights by the mode in which the French Convention has been ratified. Let gentlemen recollect the mass of depredations committed by Great Britain, and the engagements, under treaty, of the British Government to make reparation for them. Yet, notwithstanding this engagement, reparation has been to this day evaded, under the pretext that the claims under one article depend on the construction given to a preceding article. Now, suppose in the French Treaty there were the same provisions as in the British Treaty, would this have produced payment? No. The operations under the treaty might have gone on as long as under the British Treaty, with the like effect, and without any substantial provision being made. I state these circumstances barely to show that the renunciation in the French Treaty is not so grievous as some gentlemen imagine.

It is manifest that an inattention to similar claims has been considered as less a departure from right among nations than among individuals. And, judging of the future by the past, my opinion is that a retention of the article stricken out of the French Convention, would not have benefited the claims of our merchants, or afforded them any adequate eventual compensation. In France, as on the other side of the Channel, there would have been claim raised against claim, pretext against pretext, and the boards for adjusting the several claims might have been, in this case, as in the other, dissolved.

It is said by the gentleman from Delaware, that it is the object of gentleman on his side of the House to prevent a repeal of the internal taxes. Though I admire the gentleman's candor, I believe it is needful to repeal these laws. I believe, too, the people wish them repealed. But I further believe, that if future events shall show the necessity of restoring these taxes, the good sense of the people will restore them; and if the indemnities agreed to be made shall require them, I believe they will be restored. The work of examining these claims will be the work of years. What is the consequence? Will the present repeal of the internal taxes interfere with the doing substantial justice to our merchants? Suppose these taxes are removed, are not the products of the country increasing? and are not our resources increasing with our population? The truth is, whenever your Treasury wants a fresh supply of resources, the people will submit to what their Representatives desire. Are we to legislate for succeeding ages? No. We are to suffer our successors to act for themselves; and I have no doubt either of their ability or their inclination to do justice.

From a review of the whole subject, I see nothing to shake the confidence of the public, or to alarm the merchants. I conceive that the repeal of the internal taxes to-morrow would not be in the least injurious to the mercantile claims. When these, however, are brought forward on their substantial merits, I have no doubt they will be heard, and provided for.

The gentleman from South Carolina asks, if the internal taxes are repealed, from what source the $160,000 for naval purposes will be drawn? I will inform that gentleman that it will be derived from an unexhausted appropriation, and that the money is now on hand.

The gentleman has insinuated the existence of a disposition that the Navy should be crushed. I know of no such intention. I believe true policy dictates that a prudent course should be pursued by this country for the protection of commerce; and that we should take a middle course between no navy and a widely extended one.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH wished to save time, and would therefore decline entering into a discussion of the merits of the mercantile claims. He would merely observe, that a refusal to take up the subject at this time would be considered as an entire refusal to attend to it. He could not help congratulating the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EVERTS) on at last finding a reason for voting in favor of the repeal of the internal taxes. But though that reason may be satisfactory to him, I must say, it is not so to me. It is, however, to be regretted that the honorable gentleman had not sooner discovered it, as it might have influenced his vote on a former occasion.

Mr. DANA.—If I understood the honorable member from New York, he admitted the propriety of making some indemnity; and if so, I could not understand why he dwelt so elaborately upon the minutiae of detail, to show why we ought not to indemnify. Nor can I yet understand him, unless his object be to let the subject sleep, and to say that the longer it is delayed, the less the chance of reparation.

The gentleman says, property insured cannot be recovered. But is that gentleman, coming as he does from the first commercial city in the Union, yet to learn that, in the case of loss, the insurer stands precisely in the place of the insured? Is he so ignorant of this fact as not to know that the underwriter, in such circumstances, becomes entitled to the same indemnity with him who is underwritten?

With regard to the analogy attempted between the British Treaty and the French Convention, it is totally incorrect. For, in the British Treaty, we had insisted upon the claims of our merchants to reparation by Britain, or her subjects; whereas, in the French Convention, we had renounced all claim. Nor were the remarks of the honorable member more fortunate respecting the operations under the British Treaty; for he must know that our merchants have, in many cases, received compensation under it.

One concession has been made which I did not expect would be avowed so early, either by the gentleman from Massachusetts or the gentleman from New York; a concession that is founded on the principle that the House, before examining the important details which ought to regulate their decision, are so placed by the head of the Executive ministry, that certain taxes, recommended to be abrogated, must be repealed. You must repeal them. The public clamor is excited, and you must obey it. I did not suppose it would so soon have been avowed that we are under the absolute rule of Executive influence, and that, to obey it, we are compelled to perjure our understandings.

The gentleman considers himself as instructed by the will of his constituents. Forlorn, indeed, is our situation, if we are so bound down. If other gentlemen are so instructed, for myself I disclaim such degrading fetters; I disclaim the ignominious insinuation of acting either under Ministerial influence, or under popular instructions; and I can only say, I consider the confession of the honorable members from Massachusetts and New York the more precious, as coming from gentlemen so well acquainted with Ministerial mysteries.

Mr. BAYARD.—The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts has thanked me for the candor of my avowal that I am opposed to the repeal of these taxes. But I do not wish to be thanked for more than I really said. It is true, that I do not think this the proper time to repeal all of those taxes, because I do not know that Government may not want them.

Gentlemen charge us with an undue attachment to these taxes. But, why do we wish them? They bring no money to us, or to our friends. We participate not, nor expect to participate in the loaves and fishes. We expect no offices. We know that, in a few days, there may not be even a deputy postmaster on our side to share them. Why, then, can gentlemen attribute to us a wish to support taxes to feed their creatures, or to pamper their luxurious appetites? No, sir, these are not our motives. We are anxious to preserve them while they appear to us to be necessary to support the credit of the Government; because we are convinced that on it depends not only our present welfare, but that of future times. But the moment gentlemen, by fair calculation, show us that we can do without these taxes, that moment I will agree to take them off, and all others that they show to be unnecessary.

MARCH, 1802.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has broached a new species of ethics. He says, if the amount of claims shall be small, we may pay, but if large we cannot. But I will tell that gentleman I have never acknowledged such a principle of morality. I believe if the merchants have a just demand for one dollar, we must pay it; and if they have a just demand for one hundred millions, we must pay that too. Nor can I too forcibly express my astonishment at an opposite principle avowed by this House.

The gentleman says you want evidence, and therefore ought not to act. But can you examine each distinct case? If the subject goes to a select committee, and they shall be allowed years to decide, still they will have to establish some principle; for instance, that a certain description of vessels was captured unjustly by the French; that the injured merchants had a moral claim on the French Government for reparation; that the United States had bartered away their rights, and that Government, in consequence, is bound to indemnify. If the House decide that the Government is bound to relieve in one case, are they not bound to afford relief in all similar cases? Will you not, then, be obliged to make a general provision that all claims, so circumstanced, shall be allowed? Here is a great mass of claims; some made now, and some not likely to be made for years. What more, then, can you do, than decide the principle which shall be applied to them?

My opinion as to indemnity is, that whoever had a valid claim against the French Government, which the United States extinguished, has a demand against the United States, which she must satisfy. Put the case to its consequence: Will gentlemen tell me whether, according to any principle of morality, where you have taken from your citizens all chance of recovery, you are not bound to indemnify for that of which you have deprived them? Where the French Government was not bound to pay before the convention, you are not now bound to pay. So, in the case of war, you are not bound. But where the claim on the French Government was perfect, and you destroyed that claim, your obligation to pay cannot be evaded. I wish to know if the establishment of this principle requires facts?

With respect to the circumstances of particular cases, this House cannot act. On those numerous grades of credibility that will be attached to the various claims that shall be made, you cannot decide. To effect this you must establish some competent tribunal. You can establish the principle; but the details could not be settled by Congress, even if their attention were exclusively directed to that subject, in three years. Having decided the principle, it will be proper to leave the application of it to your courts of law.

Mr. BACON hoped that a great deal of time would not be spent in exploring the secret motives of individual members. He supposed they should all stand or fall on their own consciences. He hoped, therefore, they should have the question.

Mr. S. SMITH.—I am against the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut, because to act now upon it will be in direct opposition to the uniform order of the House. If our attention is thus to be withdrawn from every important object before us, I do not know how we are possibly to progress with the public business. I know of no case, where a particular subject has been referred to a select committee, and it has afterward been taken up in the House, while it remained with the committee. I should have understood the motion, if it had been to discharge the select committee, and to refer the subject to a Committee of the Whole.

As gentlemen, however, have taken so wide a range in the field of debate, I hope their course will produce a saving of time, and that we shall not have their speeches over again on repealing the internal taxes.

It is not my purpose, at this time, to enter into a discussion of the claims of our merchants, because I think this is not the proper occasion. But I will tell gentlemen, that if they were disposed to destroy those claims, they could not have pursued a plan more effectually calculated to do it. Had such been my intention, I would have offered a resolution so broad and vague as to alarm the whole community as to the amount of indemnity. I would have endeavored to throw the censure attached to their losses on the present Administration. I would have opposed their claims to the wish of the nation to repeal the internal taxes. All these steps I would have taken to frustrate any indemnity; and they are just the steps taken by gentlemen who profess so strong a regard for the merchants. Let me tell those gentlemen until they shall pursue a far different plan, we must doubt whether they are in earnest to pay the merchants for their losses.

If the public business is to be thus perpetually procrastinated, I hope the gentlemen with whom I act will be firm enough, after rejecting this motion, to pursue the other business even to a late hour.

The yeas and nays were then taken on Mr. GRISWOLD's motion, to postpone taking up the bill on internal taxes till to-morrow, in order to take up his resolution on French spoliations; and decided in the negative—yeas 33, nays 54, as follows:

INTERNAL TAXES.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for repealing the internal taxes.

Mr. DENNIS moved to strike out of the first section all the words between "spirits" and "paper." He said his object was to discriminate between the tax on stills and distilled spirits, and all the other internal taxes. He believed the collection of the tax on stills and distilled spirits more difficult and extensive than that on the other objects of internal taxation. He was far from giving into the opinion that he must keep up the same number of officers to collect a part as the whole of these taxes. He believed that all the taxes excepting those on stills and distilled spirits, may be collected without any of the officers at present employed in the collection of the internal revenue. The collection may be entirely turned over to the collectors of the customs and the deputy postmasters. In case his amendment did not prevail, Mr. D. said he did not know how he should afterward vote. The collection of the tax upon stills has been said to be productive of a system of espionage hateful to a free people. His objection did not apply to the other articles. He was of opinion that, in the collection of the duties upon stills, in order to prevent frauds upon the revenue, it was necessary to enter into regulations so complex as to render the tax very obnoxious; regulations so complicated that few are competent to the understanding of them. He believed it was this which had rendered the tax so unpopular, if it really was unpopular. On the other hand, he believed that all the other internal taxes could be collected for five per cent.

Mr. D. said he did not hesitate to say that, if it should be found that the Government were possessed of more means than were required to support public credit and defray the expenses of Government, the taxes on brown sugar, salt, coffee, molasses, &c., should be reduced; instead of taking off the taxes on pleasurable carriages, sales at auction, &c., as the former were drawn principally from the poor, while the latter were paid by the rich and luxurious. It was a fact well known that brown sugar, coffee, bohea tea, salt, and molasses, were necessities of life, and that there was scarcely a person in the community, however low his circumstances, that did not consume a portion of them.

Mr. HUGER inquired, whether the amendment could not be divided so as to take a distinct question upon each article?

The CHAIRMAN said it could.

The question was then taken on striking out refined sugar, and lost—ayes 24.

On striking out licenses to retailers, lost without a division.

On striking out sales at auction; lost—ayes 25.

On striking out pleasurable carriages; lost—ayes 22.

On striking out stamped vellum, parchment, and paper; lost—ayes 14, noes 52.

Several amendments were then made by Mr. RANDOLPH affecting the details of the bill; which were ordered to be printed, and then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 16.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, who were instructed on the 29th of January last, "to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for the payment of such loan office and final settlement certificates as may have been lost, and for the payment or renewal of which application was made prior to the twelfth day of June, 1794," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred, on the fifteenth ultimo, such parts of a petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Fairfield, in the Northwestern Territory of the United States, "as relates to the payment of interest on the principal amount of the purchase money due by the petitioners to the United States, for lands in the said Territory, until the instalments of the principal shall, respectively, become due, and to a revision and amendment of the laws of Congress respecting the purchase and title of the said lands," made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon.

Resolved, That so much of the said petition, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, as hereinbefore recited, ought not to be granted.

STATE BALANCES.

The bill for extinguishing State balances was read a third time, when Mr. DAVIS moved its postponement to the first Monday in November.

This motion was supported by Messrs. DAVIS, BACON, ELMER, and GODDARD, who declared themselves adverse to the passage of the bill; and opposed by Messrs. BAYARD, T. MORRIS, RANDOLPH, and NICHOLAS, who declared themselves in favor of the bill.

Mr. GRISWOLD delivered his sentiments against the postponement, declaring, however, his determination to vote against the passage of the bill.

INTERNAL TAXES.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for repealing the internal taxes.

The amendment offered yesterday by Mr. RANDOLPH, and other amendments offered by him, affecting the details of the bill, were agreed to without a division: when the Committee rose and reported the bill and the amendments.

The House immediately took up the report of the Committee, and agreed to all the amendments except one, with other amendments.

Several additional amendments were suggested, when Mr. DENNIS moved to recommit the bill, for amending the details, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was supported by Messrs. DENNIS, DANA, GODDARD, and BAYARD; and opposed by Messrs. RANDOLPH, SMILIE, and VARNUM.

Before the question was taken an adjournment was called for, and carried.

WEDNESDAY, March 17.

Petitions of sundry inhabitants of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, were presented to the House and read, stating their disapprobation of certain proceedings of the Legislative and Executive authorities thereof; and praying that a State Government may be established for the people of the said Territory, to be admitted into the Union upon the same terms with the original States.—Referred.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the committee appointed, on the twenty-fourth ultimo, presented a bill to alter the time of holding the district court in the district of Maine; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to empower John James Dufour, and his associates, to purchase certain lands;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. GREGG observed that the acts of Congress respecting a marine corps allowed the President to dismiss the privates, but not the officers; in consequence of which restraint, though a considerable reduction of the men had taken place, all the officers were yet retained. He thought it proper that the President should have the same power to reduce the officers as the men. He, therefore, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire, whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary in the several acts relative to the establishment of a marine corps, and in an act fixing the rank and pay of the commanding officers of the corps of marines; and that the committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GREGG further offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House such information as he may have received, relative to the copper mines on the south side of Lake Superior, in pursuance of a resolution passed the 16th day of April, 1800, authorizing the appointment of an agent for that purpose.

Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GRISWOLD observed that the general estimate of the Secretary of War, made to the Committee of Ways and Means, on the saving that would probably result from the reduced Military Establishment of the present year, which made it amount to the sum of four or five hundred thousand dollars, was to him not perfectly satisfactory. He therefore moved that the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the number of troops which were actually in the pay of the United States during the year 1801, together with the expense which has in fact arisen for the support of the Military Establishment for the same year.

Mr. RANDOLPH remarked that, as the Committee of Ways and Means required no other than the result of the saving likely to arise from the military reduction, the Secretary had given all the information asked for.

The consideration of this subject was postponed till to-morrow.

INTERNAL TAXES.

The House then took up the bill for repealing the internal taxes.

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped the motion, made yesterday, to recommit the bill, would not prevail, as he was prepared to offer immediately to the House the amendments which gentlemen required.

H. of R.

Internal Taxes.

The question on recommitment was then taken, and lost without a division.

Several amendments, relating to the details of the bill, were made.

When Mr. DENNIS renewed the motion made by him in Committee of the Whole, somewhat varied, viz: to strike out of the repealing clause all the articles of internal taxation, excepting "stills and domestic distilled spirits, and stamped vellum, parchment, and paper."

He moved that the question be taken by yeas and nays on each article distinctly.

The question was accordingly stated on striking out "refined sugars."

Mr. S. SMITH desired to be excused from voting, as he was interested in a sugar refinery.

The question was put and lost—yeas 30, nays 54, as follows.

YEAS—James A. Bayard, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, John Dennis, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, William Barry Grove, Seth Hastings, Archibald Henderson, William H. Hill, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Lowndes, Ebenezer Mattoon, Lewis R. Mr. DENNIS then moved to strike out "refined" for the purpose of inserting "brown" sugar. He said he did this the more forcibly to contrast the votes of gentlemen who were in favor of a discrimination between the necessities and luxuries of life.

Mr. CLAIBORNE desired the Speaker to read the title of the bill; which he did, as follows: "a bill for repealing the internal taxes;" when Mr. C. asked if brown sugar was within the meaning of the term "internal taxes."

Mr. DENNIS replied that it was always in order to amend the title of a bill.

The SPEAKER declared the motion out of order, as a decision had just been made against striking out the whole term "refined sugars."

Mr. RANDOLPH wished with the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. DENNIS,) a distinct question to be taken upon each of the articles of internal revenue. He believed the abolition of one constituted the most forcible reason for repealing the whole. If there were a disposition to abolish taxes on the necessities, and to retain those on the luxuries of life, let us see who are for the one, and who for the other.

Mr. DENNIS, equally with the gentleman from Virginia, was for a discrimination. In compliance with the decision of the Chair, he would withdraw his original motion, and now move to strike out "licenses to retailers," in order to insert "bohea tea."

Mr. VARNUM here asked for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER said it was indivisible.

Mr. HUGER said it had been his intention, after the motions before the House were disposed of, to have moved to insert an amendment for a reduction of the duty on salt; he inquired if he was not precluded from so doing by the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DENNIS replied that it was his purpose to move the insertion of "salt," in the room of "pleasurable carriages."

Mr. HUGER observed that the principal object of his motion would be to show that the amount of duties on salt was about equal to the whole saving of this bill.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on striking out "licenses to retailers," in order to insert "bohea tea," and lost—yeas 31, nays 57, as follows:

Mr. DENNIS next moved to strike out "sales at auction," and insert "coffee."

A division of the question was called for, which the Speaker declared not to be in order.

Mr. EUSTIS inquired whether it could be in order to insert expressions that might grossly vitiate the bill, and wrest it from its main purpose? He said this was not the place to contrast the relative merits of a tax upon sales at auction, and a duty upon coffee. He had not the least objection, at a proper season, to afford gentlemen the opportunity of contrasting the advantages attending the repeal of these taxes, and the duties on other articles.

Mr. S. SMITH appealed from the decision of the Chair, on the division of Mr. DENNIS's motion.

Mr. THOMAS MORRIS called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. S. SMITH called for the reading of the rule which declares, that "any member may call for a division of a question where the sense will admit of it."

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on concurring in the decision of the Chair, and lost—yeas 40, nays 48; and the motion was determined to be divisible.

YEAS—James A. Bayard, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, John P. Van Ness, Joseph B. Varnum, and Isaac Van Horne.

The question was then stated on striking out "sales at auction."

Mr. HUGER said he entertained doubts of the propriety of repealing the internal taxes. If those to whom has been devolved the management of our public concerns, say they can spare six hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the amount of these taxes, be it so. But if this sum can be dispensed with, he said he was anxious that at least a part of it should go to relieve those who do not pay a large share of the internal taxes from the burden of other taxes. He was solicitous, therefore, to give his vote in such a way as to exhibit to his constituents his efforts to reduce the duty upon salt and other necessities of life.

Mr. S. SMITH remarked that the gentleman from South Carolina doubted the possibility of sparing six hundred and fifty thousand dollars. If he really entertains such a doubt, it must be entirely destroyed when he learns that the duty on salt, which he wishes to take off, alone amounts to above seven hundred thousand dollars!

Mr. HUGER replied that he was not so anxious for popularity as some gentlemen. With regard to salt he only wished to reduce the duty so as to affect the revenue about two hundred and eighty thousand dollars.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on striking out "sales at auction," and lost—yeas 32, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—James A. Bayard, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. THE SPEAKER.—The question now is on the remainder of the motion to insert "coffee."

Mr. GRISWOLD observed that the gentleman from Massachusetts had supposed this was not the proper place to decide whether we will reduce the duties on imported goods. But if the word "coffee" be inserted, the effect will be that all duty upon that article will cease. Gentlemen may suppose that it is not proper to dispense with the whole duty; but if it be repealed, there will be nothing to prevent the imposition of a new duty by a new bill. Mr. G. thought the present duty too high; he thought it would be productive of smuggling, and he thought it oppressive.

Mr. S. SMITH said the present, in his opinion, was not the proper place to introduce the repeal of the duty on coffee. It will be remembered that early in the session he had brought forward a resolution, which was committed, to inquire whether any and what alterations were necessary in the laws imposing duties on imports. He then stated that he was disposed to reduce the duty on coffee, as now proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) and when that question should come in the proper place, he would be found voting with him to reduce the duty on coffee.

Mr. DENNIS said his object was not to dispense with the entire duty on bohea tea, sugar, salt, and other imported articles. But he had no other opportunity than that which he now embraced. For after it shall have been decided to abolish the whole internal taxes, gentlemen will tell us they cannot dispense with any of the duties upon imported articles. The only question at present is, whether we shall make a reduction of the duties on imported articles, or totally abolish the internal taxes.

Mr. LOWNDES said the subject was so important that he must beg the indulgence of the House while he submitted a few remarks. The motion goes to abolish the present duty on coffee, in order to lay a smaller one. A gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH,) informs us that he feels a conviction that the present duty is too high, and that it may introduce the practice of smuggling. But that gentleman must excuse my saying that his professions differ from his practice. He is now for voting away all revenue derived from the luxuries of life, from pleasurable carriages, from refined sugar, and other articles, and tells us after getting rid of these resources he will, by and by, vote for more moderate duties on imported articles. Good God! Is not this course putting it entirely out of his power to do so? The people of this country deserve some consideration. This is a new era. The people are reduced from a state of opulence to much distress by the cessation of European hostilities. The carrying trade, so lucrative to our merchants, is taken away. Labor has heretofore been high in our cities, from the activity of commerce. Now there is an alarming stagnation, and the most valuable portion of our citizens are without occupation; and yet taxes, predicated on the existence of the war, are to be continued on a peace. Gentlemen who have gotten power seem to have forgotten the people who gave it to them. By the stagnation of trade our farmers will be injured. Flour, which lately sold for thirteen dollars per barrel, now sells for six dollars. If the profits of the farmer be reduced ought not his expenses of living also to be reduced? What good can result from repealing the duties on stills, or pleasurable carriages, and on sales at auction? Is not the tax on stills a good one, and has it not been approved by experience, ever since it came into operation in the year 1790? Have any inconveniences been experienced? Have not, on the other hand, the distilleries increased to the enormous number of twenty-two thousand? Has not the revenue likewise increased? and are not these strong evidences of the propriety of the tax? Suppose it should restrain the immoderate use of spirituous liquors, is not the result beneficial to the morality of our citizens?

But the articles of tea and coffee are different in their nature—they are promotive of morality, and restrain the use of ardent spirits. The gentleman from New Jersey has informed us, that the lower class of citizens in his State do not in general consume tea and coffee. But, however it may be in New Jersey, I will inform the gentleman that in Charleston the lower class of citizens—the very carmen—do consume these articles, which, after the fatigues of the day, are their evening solace.

The gentleman from New Jersey has told us, that the people of this country have never been oppressed by taxes. I am happy to hear gentlemen on that side of the House make this confession. I believe they never have been oppressed by our predecessors. I will not say they have never felt the burden of taxation, because I believe they have felt it. But they have considered the taxes laid necessary for the security of the Government.

This tax upon coffee appears to me to be unnecessary, impolitic, and oppressive. It was laid when we were subjected to the depredations of foreign nations, and menaced with hostility; and yet it is to be continued after the occasion for which it was created has ceased. The people will feel it. They will discriminate between the tax, and the price of the commodity, and they will understand from what quarter the tax proceeds.

There is another pernicious consequence that will result from the continuance of this high duty upon coffee. It will hold out a dangerous temptation to the merchants to smuggle. Coffee and sugar are articles of great value and small bulk. The day is not distant when the circumstances of the country, the great extent of the seacoast, and our numerous ports, combined with this temptation, will introduce the pernicious practice. I hope, for these reasons, the House will agree to reduce these taxes, and hold out to the country those enjoyments which have been heretofore possessed.

Mr. ELMER said, that as to those articles which are necessities, and those which are luxuries, gentlemen will differ. He thought it, however, extraordinary that it should be insisted that bohea tea and coffee are necessities of life, and carriages luxuries. He certainly considered pleasurable carriages as of this description; yet many carriages, and more than one-half of those in use in New Jersey were of the first necessity. He would feel very happy in reducing the duty upon tea and coffee, if our circumstances shall admit it. But though they may be extensively used, it by no means follows that it is good policy to encourage the consumption of them. He believed some of our own products would form a very good substitute for coffee. With regard both to tea and coffee, he knew that so far from being necessities of life they were consumed by the citizens generally in proportion to their wealth.

Mr. E. said he had not expressed the sentiment ascribed to him by the gentleman from South Carolina. He had neither said that the people had been, or had not been oppressed by taxes. He had said that tea and coffee were not necessities of life. As well might tobacco, which was in general use, be called a necessary of life.

Mr. E. concluded by observing that he should be pleased with a diminution of the duties upon tea and coffee; but that it must be evident this was not the proper time to consider its expediency, as the bill then before the House respected exclusively the repeal of the internal taxes.

A member inquired where the word "coffee" was to be inserted.

Mr. NICHOLSON said the motion made had been to strike out the words "sales at auction," and insert "coffee." The House having determined not to strike out, there was of consequence no place wherein to insert.

Mr. GRISWOLD replied that the difficulty into which gentlemen were thrown, arose from their having reversed the decision of the Chair, but that the question on inserting "coffee" must be put.

Some additional conversation ensued, when Mr. HILL observed that he had voted against the decision of the Chair from an impression that it was wrong, but he was now satisfied it was correct; he, therefore, moved a reconsideration of the decision of the House.

Mr. DAVIS moved to adjourn.

Mr. SOUTHARD said he felt no embarrassment. In his opinion the decision not to strike out entirely superseded the motion to insert.

The question of adjournment was lost.

Mr. S. SMITH asked whether the question of reconsideration was a question of order, or whether it was one that admitted of debate?

The SPEAKER said he would consult the rule respecting questions of reconsideration.

Mr. BAYARD said, in order to allow time, he moved now to adjourn; carried—ayes 46, noes 38.

THURSDAY, March 18.

An engrossed bill to alter the time of holding the district court in the district of Maine was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the committee, to whom was referred, on the twenty-ninth of January last, the petition of Alexander Roxborough, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the sixteenth instant, a report of the Committee of Claims on the subject of Loan office and final settlement certificates.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to empower John James Dufour and his associates to purchase certain lands," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

INTERNAL TAXES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for repealing the internal taxes.

When the motion of Mr. HILL to reconsider the decision of the House of yesterday, reversing the decision of the Chair on the point of order, was put, and the yeas and nays called, on motion of Mr. STANLEY, and lost—yeas 38, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—James A. Bayard, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, John Dawson John Dennis, Ebenezer Elmer, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, William Barry Grove, Seth Hastings, William Helms, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, William H. Hill, David Holmes, Benjamin Huger, Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, John P. Van Ness, Joseph B. Varnum, and Robert Williams.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that in the repealing bill before the House, there was a deviation from the terms of the bill proposed to be repealed, in relation to the tax on carriages. In the last bill the terms were "carriages for the conveyance of persons"—in the bill before the House the expression was "pleasurable carriages." He moved therefore to strike out "pleasurable," and insert after "carriages" the words "for the conveyance of persons."

Mr. T. MORRIS called for a division of the question.

The question was then stated on striking out "pleasurable," and carried without a division.

Mr. GRISWOLD then moved to strike out "carriages."

Mr. G. said he hoped the House would agree to retain this tax, as it fell exclusively on the rich. It had been said by the gentleman from New Jersey, that it did not fall exclusively upon the rich in that State; but in all the other States it certainly did. It will be easy to collect it, without a train of supervisors and collectors. You may make it the duty of the owners of carriages to enter them with the collectors of customs, or deputy postmasters, and inflict a penalty on a default of payment. In this way the collection will not cost you more than four or five per cent.

This expense is much lower than that paid on imported articles, no part of which, in the collection, costs less than forty per cent. The importer pays five per cent. to the collector. This he charges upon the retailer. He also charges his profit upon the duties, as well as the first cost and expenses of importation; the retailer again charges his thirty-three or forty per cent.; and all these accumulated charges are paid by the consumer. If this be the case is it not best, if there be any reduction in our taxes, is it not demonstrable that we ought to repeal those which operate exclusively on the poor, and whose collection costs at least forty per cent., rather than those which are derived from the rich, and whose collection does not cost more than five per cent?

Mr. BACON observed, that he thought the argument of the honorable gentleman from Connecticut not altogether correct. That, in his opinion, this particular species of tax, in New England, fell heavier, he believed two-fold heavier at least, on the clergy, in proportion to their wealth, than on any other description of men in the community; that the clergy in general, particularly in Massachusetts and Connecticut, were by no means opulent; that, as it was necessary for the accommodation of their families, they generally kept a horse and chaise; that the clergy were greatly revered in New England, and that so tender were the State laws in Massachusetts and Connecticut, that they were never permitted to affect the property of that venerable body of men by way of taxation; that it appeared rather extraordinary that the honorable gentleman from Connecticut should be so desirous, by a law of the United States, to subject our clergy to a tax so unequal in its operation, and which bore so hard upon them in particular, compared with the rest of the community.

H. OF R.

Internal Taxes.

MARCH, 1802.

Mr. SOUTHARD.—Under the existing law, which this motion proposes to continue so far as it respects the tax on carriages, in order to collect this tax it will be necessary to retain about four hundred and fifty officers, to pay whom the whole proceeds of the carriage tax will be inadequate. I believe the people have no idea of paying a direct tax to support officers for collecting a carriage tax. The gentleman says we may authorize the collectors or deputy postmasters to collect it. What! Shall the citizen be obliged to go fifty or a hundred miles to pay the tax? It will be a heavy tax indeed, if, in addition to it, the citizen is burdened with the expenses of a long journey. A large class of the carriages taxed are of small value. In the State of New Jersey five hundred and forty two are of this description, which are principally market-wagons, and not designed for pleasurable purposes—one hundred and fifteen are of another description, called windsor chairs, and are generally owned by people that are very poor. Add on these to the two dollars tax, the expense of going a great distance to make payment, and the fine for neglecting to do it, and you will perceive the extent of the burden.

This tax is also unequal in its operation on the States.—$5,252, are paid by New Jersey; $7,325, by Pennsylvania, and $7,807, by New York. Thus it appears that the State of New Jersey pays almost as much as these large and wealthy States, and that the sums paid hold no proportion to the population of the States. The same inequality will be found in other States.

Since gentlemen have taken the poor under their protection, I hope they will treat them with especial care; and that from regard to them they will leave this tax to the States, who instead of oppressing their poor with a poll and house tax, may avail themselves of this source of revenue. If collected by the States, the collection will be liberated from a heavy expense, as it is well known that the expense of collecting taxes in the States is very small compared with that of the Union.

Mr. HUGER.—Gentlemen may well be in favor of taking off this tax, who know that after it is taken off, we are to bear the burden of the day. The gentleman from New Jersey says carriages are necessities of life in his State. This puts me in mind of the boy who pelted stones at the frog, and who, when called upon to say why he did so cruel a thing, said it is a very pleasant thing to me. No doubt it is a very pleasant thing to the gentleman from New Jersey to get rid of this tax. But it is impossible to imagine a tax more easy of collection or less oppressive.

Contrast the operation of the internal and external duties upon the different States. Of the impost, Virginia pays about eight hundred thousand dollars, while South Carolina, a comparatively small State, pays about eight hundred and four thousand dollars, which is four thousand dollars more than the great State of Virginia. Of the internal duties, Virginia pays one hundred and thirty-four thousand dollars, while South Carolina pays only twenty-three thousand dollars; and if these taxes are repealed, South Carolina is to console herself for being released from the payment of twenty-three thousand dollars, while Virginia is released from the payment of one hundred and thirty-four thousand dollars.

The observation of the gentleman from Massachusetts, respecting the clergy, is extremely curious. I hope I respect the clergy as much as that gentleman, or any member on the floor. However the clergy may be treated in Massachusetts, in South Carolina we support and pay them well, and we treat them as citizens. The very argument of the gentleman, that in his State they are exempt from all State taxes, is an argument for taxing them by the United States.

The arguments of gentlemen are very strange. They say the repeal of these taxes has been talked of all over the continent, and because talked of, and expected, they must be repealed. What does this mean other than this? If you elect me, I will get rid of these taxes; and gentlemen now gravely get up, and assign this as a reason for their votes.

The next argument is not less curious. We are told that though a particular branch of the internal duties does not fall heavily, yet that if one be repealed, we must repeal the whole, from the expense of collection. But if one of these taxes be wrong, why not repeal it, and let the others stand? I say with the gentleman from Virginia, that if we cannot collect the tax on whiskey without a system of espionage odious to a free people, I have no objection to doing it away.

When, too, we call upon gentlemen for particular information to enable us to determine the comparative merits of internal and external taxes, we are answered by the exhibition of a profound and philosophic style of silence. I conceive that when the time comes for a repeal of certain taxes, we ought to have statements in black and white; we ought to have chapter and verse; and I have always thought it best ever to show our ways before we do away our means.

Though I shall vote against giving up the carriage tax, and other branches of the internal revenue, yet if these amendments do not succeed, I shall, notwithstanding, vote for the bill. For though I have strong doubts that the United States cannot do without these taxes, I am one of the minority; I stand not on the vantage ground. Having therefore strove ineffectually to relieve my constituents from the burden that is likely to be thrown upon them, I will vote for the bill, though I think gentlemen ought not to have attempted this thing till the last moment of the session, until the savings which are talked of had clearly been exhibited.

MARCH, 1802.

Internal Taxes.

H. OF R.

Have these savings appeared? No! According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury not a cent can be spared. The Secretary of the Navy stated that his Department required more than a million; and yet in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means this sum is pared down, and two hundred thousand dollars taken from it, without assigning any reason for the reduction. It is a fact, then, that these taxes are to be demolished, and the funds of the Navy and Treasury Departments to be cut down. When then, the resources are not over the demands for the year, and gentlemen are inflexibly bent on this act, I must say that it is my opinion it is predicated on popularity. I do not say the present Administration are for destroying public credit, the army, and navy. I hope in God it is not so. But gentlemen will recollect that they have been charged with these designs. I will ask if it would not be more prudent first to make savings, and at the next session, if admissible, to take off these taxes? But gentlemen are scarcely six months in the Government, when they pursue measures, not to pay the public debt, but to destroy the means of paying it. I speak the more boldly on this point, as I have no interest in the funds, and am a mere planter.

The expense of collecting these taxes, is insisted on. But it has been shown that many, if not all the present offices may be done away, and the expense reduced to a level with the expense of collecting the imposts; and thus every reason for the repeal is done away. Do gentlemen, casting their eyes over the world, see the defenceless state of our trade? Do they see a large army in St. Domingo? Do they regard the report that we are about to change our neighbors, and have a great nation along side of us? Do they not perceive that the peace in Europe is barely an armed neutrality? And yet do they imagine the golden age has come; and that this is the moment to alter our wary plan, to reduce our resources, and to leave everything at sixes and sevens?

I have heard no complaint of any of these taxes, except those on stills. Let then the last be repealed or modified, and retain the rest. They yield about two hundred and forty thousand dollars. Retain these, and take off the eight cents upon salt, which produce two hundred and fourteen thousand dollars; leaving twenty-six thousand dollars for the collection. I will ask if the great bulk of the people will not be benefited by this change?

Had not things taken their present course, I should not have called upon the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) to support me in my present proposition. But I recollect that at the time when the present duty on salt was laid, that gentlemen inveighed so eloquently against the measure, that he almost persuaded me to vote against it. Why then this change? Do not the people feel it as heavily now as they did then?

The present state of trade ought to influence our decision on this subject. Our merchants are in a serious situation. I know, as a planter, that my produce stands unsold, even at reduced prices, owing to the embarrassments of our merchants. The want of circulating coin will prevent the merchants from importing, and us from buying goods. It is possible that our commerce may not, but it is probable that it will decline. It ought to be recollected, that for some years past we have enjoyed the advantages of neutrality amidst belligerent nations. Hence our tonnage had greatly increased. It must now decline, and I cannot conceive that our external duties will be commensurate to the demands of the Government for the next year. You will observe that the Secretary of the Treasury calculates for a number of years; whereas the Committee of Ways and Means calculate only for this year. Though, therefore, there may be resource enough for the present year, there will be a defalcation the next year, from the increasing instalments of foreign debt.

I have made these remarks, because I think they clearly apply to the proposition before us; and because I think gentlemen should show us clearly and unequivocally that this measure is proper, before we are called upon to support it. I make this opposition, not because I have any objection to cutting down the expenses of the Government. I have no interest against their retrenchment. I have never received, or expect to receive anything from the Government.

I have also made these objections to account to my constituents for my voting against these articles distinctly, in order to effect a diminution of external duties, and relieve others from the unequal burden imposed upon them. But still, as I before observed, if these motions are all rejected, I shall finally vote for the passage of the bill.

Mr. VARNUM—It has been stated that the tax on carriages falls altogether on the opulent part of the community. But, as this observation applies to the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, the statement is not founded in fact. In that State there are four thousand, two hundred and sixty-one chaises and other two wheel carriages, on which are paid annually more than $12,000 tax. The whole tax on carriages of all kinds in that State, is $14,096. The chaises and other two wheel carriages in that State, are by no means exclusively owned by the opulent; yet that description of carriages pays the principal part of the tax. There are, in that State, nearly six hundred clergymen, the principal part of whom are owners of chaises; and such are their avocations that they cannot conveniently dispense with the use of them. But this class of citizens, although very justly held in high estimation, are very far from being in affluent circumstances; many other persons who are owners of that description of carriages, have been in the habit of attending public worship at least once a week, since they have been on the stage of action; which, from their local situation, and the infirmities of age, it would be extremely difficult for them to continue to do, if they should be deprived of that mode of conveyance; many of this description of citizens are also far from being in affluent circumstances. It is a fact, that the tax is a very unequal one, as it relates to the value of the property on which it is laid, and a burdensome one to many who pay it, especially to the clergy and the description last mentioned.

But, sir, there is another reason which operates in my mind against the motion, viz: the extreme inequality of the carriage tax as it applies to the individual States. The whole tax amounts to $77,871. Massachusetts pays $14,096 of that sum, whereas she ought to pay but $10,284, according to the Constitutional mode of apportioning direct taxes; that State therefore, is compelled, by this mode of taxation, to pay at least one quarter-part more than her just proportion. Is that the case with the State of Connecticut, or South Carolina? No sir, Connecticut pays considerably less than her proportion when compared with all the States; and not two-thirds of her proportion when compared with Massachusetts. She pays $4,564, and her proportion compared with Massachusetts would be $7,048. South Carolina pays $4,329; her proportion with Massachusetts would be $6,041. If it is extremely difficult for gentlemen on this floor, as well as elsewhere; to divest themselves of self, and the pecuniary interests of their constituents, will not this view of the subject, in some measure, account for the pertinacity of the gentleman last up from Connecticut, and the last gentleman up from South Carolina, on the question before you? But if these gentlemen are for continuing the tax on carriages, because it operates favorably to their constituents, it is to be hoped that the candor of the gentlemen will permit the members from Massachusetts to vote in favor of the repeal of a tax so apparently unequal and unjust as it relates to that State. There is as great a disparity in the proportion of this tax paid by Massachusetts, when compared with Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, and Tennessee, as when compared with the other States which I have mentioned; but much to the honor of the gentlemen from those States, they are willing to repeal the tax, and equalize the public burden.

Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to make one remark, relative to the repeal of the internal taxes contemplated by the bill under consideration. In the first place, it is an obvious fact, that they operate extremely unequal among the several States. Massachusetts alone has stood chargeable with nearly one-fifth part of them when taken all together, from their first introduction up to this time. It will not, therefore, be thought improper in the members from that State, to solicit the repeal of so unequal, and so unjust a burden. But, sir, the high and satisfactory motive for a repeal, is derived from a firm belief that they are no longer necessary. The retrenchments of the present session will be paramount to their product, and the remaining revenue will be amply sufficient to secure the public credit, and meet the exigencies of Government. It is therefore to be hoped, that the motion for striking out carriages will be rejected, and that the bill will be passed.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—I shall give a different reason from any yet assigned, for voting against the motion to strike out carriages. Sensible of the fatigue of the House, I shall be as brief as possible in the expression of my sentiments, as well from a respect to their feelings, as from a regard to my own.

My reason for repealing this tax, is not because I think there ought not to be a carriage tax; nor because I do not consider that description of tax as fair and proper; but because I view it as a part of a system of taxation which is unequal and oppressive.

I am glad to hear that the importer receives double the sum collected. I will not deny, though I might, this extraordinary statement. I will only make one use of it, in which I am fairly warranted; and that is, that this imposition, which we have been so often told is paid by the merchants, and falls with such peculiar weight upon them, so far from being a tax levied on them, and so far from oppressing them, is, indeed, collected by them, advanced by them, but for which they receive an ample return from the labor of the community. As, therefore, we are told that the merchants do not receive less than a hundred per cent. on all sums advanced in anticipation of the revenue, it is to be hoped that we shall hear no more clamor about taxing one class of citizens to the exclusion of all the rest. The fact is, that the external duties are not an exclusive tax on that class of citizens; for there is no class, but that of the great mass of the people, that can afford to pay the enormous sums levied on imposts.

We are told the additional imposts upon salt, coffee, brown sugar, &c., were predicated upon war measures. The answer is, let us retain these taxes to pay war loans, for which the war men of this country have made no provision.

If this tax on carriages be taken off, I have no idea that carriages will remain entirely exempt from taxation. The States will tax them, which, at present, they are, in many cases, unable to do, without rendering the tax a prohibition of the use of the article taxed.

A gentleman has told the House, on a former occasion, what is the interest of himself and his friends on the subject of taxation. He said, we have no interest to insist on the continuance of taxes, and asked, are we to be reimbursed what we pay? Are we not, on the contrary, to be ejected from all participation in the loaves and fishes? If gentlemen have no interest in these taxes, why persist in their system? I will answer for the gentlemen, what interest they have to continue the system, such as it was when they went out of power. A system of patronage has, with them, been a favorite measure; and they have the same interest to continue this part, as the other parts of their system; because, if that party, as it is termed, should again come into power, as soon as an occasion offers, the same system will be brought again into operation.

Internal Taxes.

H. OF R.

We are told that the external taxes fall exclusively upon the consuming States. I am glad to hear it. It follows, then, that the manufacturing States pay the least portion of them. All know, it requires no superior intelligence to comprehend it, that every dollar laid on foreign productions operates as a tax on the consumer, and as a bounty upon our own productions. It must, then, be acknowledged that there is but little difference between the standing of the Southern and the other States. And when it is said that they pay a lesser proportion of the internal duties than the other parts of the Union, I ask if that is not proper; inasmuch as they pay more than their proportion of the external duties?

When this Government was first thought of, what was the contemplation of the nation as to taxes? Was it not conceived that Congress would be confined to an ad valorem duty upon imported articles? Instead of that, the Government was vested with ample powers. In addition to the exclusive power over duties on imports, the whole field of excise, direct taxation, &c., was opened to them. But was it not understood that these latter sources were only to be used on extraordinary emergencies?

I will ask, if the cultivators of tobacco, cotton, and other valuable productions, do not consume imported articles in a greater proportion, than is consumed in States without staples. You then tax those who are not only able, but willing to pay. And let me say, there is no species of taxation so oppressive, whatever its amount, as that which compels the individual taxed to retrench his personal freedom, that calls upon him to pay a specific sum, and compels him to pay, no matter what his ability is. Thus, the contribution of the consumer of imported articles depends upon his ability and disposition to pay, and if he pays more than his proportion, he can censure no one but himself. Observe the difference between the situation of this man, who pays his tax voluntarily, and that of him who is called upon to pay for his still, or for a stamped instrument of paper, predicated on an existing debt, but from which not a farthing may accrue to either party.

Besides, there is one great distinction between the effects of reducing the external taxes, and abolishing the internal revenues. If you reduce the duties on salt, tea, sugar, &c., you do not abolish a single office. But, by taking off the internal duties, you abolish a host of offices. Look, too, at the facility with which the duties on imposts are collected. Eleven millions are collected in fifty-four towns, by a few collectors, surveyors, and naval officers. Compare, with this view, the large number of officers required to collect the small sum derived from the internal revenues; and yet, the tax upon imposts is unequal, because Virginia only imports six millions, while South Carolina imports fourteen millions. I had not supposed that a gentleman whom I have known from infancy, and for whom I have invariably entertained the greatest respect, would, knowingly, have attempted to mislead the House. No doubt, the gentleman thought his statement correct. But I will ask, what respect ought to be paid to the facts of a gentleman, or to arguments deduced from those facts, who makes the total amount of imports and exports introduced into, or taken out of the respective States, the same with the amount of articles consumed or raised in those States? Do we not know, for instance, that Charleston is the great market, not only for South Carolina, but also for other adjoining States; that it is the importing and exporting town of an extensive district of the Union; and is not the case precisely the same in other parts of the Union? I am the more authorized to make this appeal, from the gentleman having told us that our tonnage is about to be reduced; that our merchants are about selling their vessels to foreigners; and that, therefore, we are about to lose a valuable branch of our revenue. But let us attend to the relative amount of domestic tonnage and foreign tonnage. Let us recollect, too, that our own tonnage is precisely in the inverse ratio of our revenue; and that, in proportion as we have substituted American in the room of European shipping, has our revenue derived from tonnage diminished.

The gentleman says, he wishes to retain these taxes, because the Western States pay so small a proportion of the duties on imported articles. But the fact is, that the States of Kentucky and Tennessee pay their full proportion. It is true that they do not themselves import, but they consume goods imported into Charleston, Norfolk, Baltimore, &c., which goods find their way to those States.

The gentleman condemns me for not now voting for a repeal of the tax on salt, inasmuch as on a former occasion I was strenuous against the imposition of it. But I will ask that gentleman whether, when I was so strenuous against the imposition of that tax, either he or his friends offered to commute the whole internal taxes for it? I am ready whenever circumstances shall admit, to diminish that duty, but not with the views of gentlemen, who are not so much in favor of reducing the public burdens, as for throwing an odium upon other measures equally necessary, and for casting a shade of unpopularity upon this act. Why do I say so? Because, when power was in their hands, they were not for reducing them an iota. On the contrary, their system was to get all they could, and keep all they got. They would not commute even the Sedition law for any duty or tax. As it had been well said by a gentleman from Kentucky, now power has parted from gentlemen, they are willing to reduce the taxes, to take them entirely out of our hands, and instead of letting us apply them, they say let us do it, and let us use your power to do that which is disagreeable to us, in the way that is most agreeable to you. This, and nothing more nor less, is the amount of the remarks of gentlemen.

After having experienced the benefits of the system of these gentlemen, we are now told they have made a great discovery in the mode of reducing the public expenses. Pity it was not made while those gentlemen were in power. So long as they enjoyed the power, the idea of reducing the public burdens never entered into their minds; at any rate we heard nothing of it if it did. But so soon as the nation had dismissed them from power, so soon as any disposition to that effect became inefficient, we hear the gentlemen loudly contending for a reduction.

H. OF R.

Internal Taxes.

MARCH, 1802.

When gentlemen say they are not anxious for extending a system of Executive patronage, we are willing to give them credit for what they say. But let us see what credit we are entitled to when we say the same thing. We show, on this occasion, as I trust we shall on all occasions, that we do not take up their principles with their power; that, on the contrary, we advance the same principles now, when in possession of power, that we did, when we had scarcely any prospect of getting into power.

Of all the articles of internal revenue, if any were retained, no doubt that upon stamps should be retained, as it is at once the most productive, and the least expensive in collection; and yet, what do gentlemen propose? To retain the tax upon carriages, that only yields the inconsiderable sum of eighty thousand dollars, and give up that on stamps, which produces two hundred and forty thousand dollars. Why? because the latter falls on the merchants; and yet gentlemen say, in the same breath, the external duties fall on the consumer, and not on the merchant.

For my part, I am not to be deterred by any attempt to render this measure unpopular, from pursuing steadily that system which is congenial to the spirit of the Constitution, viz: to throw back the internal taxes into the hands of the States, only to be used by this Government on a national emergency. When this Government was established, we were informed that these taxes were never to be laid but on such emergency. Yet the Government had not been in operation more than two years, when they were seized, to rear that system of patronage, which, from the commencement of the Government, has been so favorite a measure. It is not my purpose here to trace that system of patronage through its various modifications, which has been more happily done by my colleague on a late occasion. But it is my object to restore the Constitution to its healthful state, by doing away these taxes; of which should we retain a part, however small, we might, on a mere change of men, see it soon ramified to the greatest extent.

Gentlemen tell us no saving has been shown to be made; but I think it has been clearly shown, that a saving has already been made more than commensurate to the whole amount of these internal taxes. In addition to this sum, is the difference between the amount received and that which is payable, which is more than one hundred thousand dollars, for which the Committee of Ways and Means have made no allowance. The fact will show the disposition of the committee, not to insist upon items of small amount, though in the aggregate those items amount to nearly two hundred thousand dollars, which is one-fifth of the whole sum of these taxes.

We are told this act is unwise, as the state of things abroad is perilous, and that we ought not to part with the sum of $650,000, because the revenue from imports may fail. Do gentlemen mean to say that, in such event, we can rely on the sum of $650,000, for a defalcation in a revenue of eleven millions? If this argument means anything, it would dictate the organization of the system of internal taxation commensurate to the meeting of any defalcation that may accrue. Let us give them all they want. That defalcation may be thirty, fifty, or one hundred per cent.; and it follows that we ought to raise from these taxes five or ten millions of dollars. It is from the fact that this source is unequal to the supply of any great defalcation, that we are for giving it up.

I am sensible of having detained the Committee longer than I myself had intended, or they may have wished; but, from the situation in which I was placed as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I felt it my duty to trouble them even at this late hour. Before, however, I sit down, I must say that the committee have shown that a saving at least equal to, and probably a much greater sum than the amount of the internal revenues will be made. Estimating the contemplated reductions at the lowest rate, there will be saved in the appropriations for the army $400,000; for the navy $200,000—these will cover the internal taxes. The committee have said nothing about the abolition of the Mint, which will save $30,000; or of the Judiciary; nor have they brought into view the large amount of custom-house bonds not yet collected.

But we are told that this repeal is to take place at the expense of the navy, and that the navy is an institution to which the people are attached. The people certainly have a right to decide, whether they will vest large sums in the building of seventy-fours, or small sums, that they may pay their debts.

The estimates on which the gentleman from South Carolina relies, are not estimates made by the Secretary of the Navy for the present year, but for the last year, and the gentleman will find that the expenses of the present year, supposing that we keep up the squadron in the Mediterranean, will amount to a sum less, by $500,000, than the expenses of the last year. Is the gentleman prepared to show the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury to be incorrect? Is he prepared to say, that we cannot keep up the amount for what he estimates it at? We have heretofore heard much of confidence in Executive officers. I am not one of those who are for bestowing confidence, where it is not merited; but I have no hesitation to say, I will, until gentlemen show strong reasons for the contrary, give confidence to officers, whose character and whose offices depend on the fairness of their statements.

Mr. HUGER explained.—He said, he had not stated that South Carolina consumed the whole

MARCH, 1802.

Internal Taxes.

H. OF R.

that she imported; he knew the contrary. But he contended that South Carolina, and other States on the seaboard, paid a larger share of the duties on imported articles than the interior parts of the Union. Neither did he say, that the reduction in our tonnage would have any very great effect. He was aware of the difference between foreign and domestic tonnage. Yet, certainly, if the effect of a peace was the losing a large portion of our carrying trade, the amount of tonnage must sink.

[A motion was made to adjourn, and lost.]

Mr. GRISWOLD.—The question is, whether we shall strike out carriages. On this limited motion, I did not expect to have heard gentlemen go into a full examination of the merits of the whole internal revenue. Having, however, indulged themselves in the inquiry, it seems necessary to follow them, even though my remarks should fail in their application to the carriage tax. It is not true, as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) that the clergy of New England are paupers; they are not paupers.

Mr. BACON said, he had stated no such thing.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—They are not paupers, sir. They are able and willing to pay, with cheerfulness, their portion of the public burdens. It is not true that Connecticut does not pay her proportion of the carriage tax. The document shows that she does pay her proportion of it, though that proportion is not so high as that paid by Massachusetts. Gentlemen have made it needful to state the situation of the clergy of New England, in order to remove the imputation against that order of men, and to state the proportion of the tax paid by us to prove that we are not particularly interested in the continuance of this tax.

We wish to retain it, because we deem it necessary, because we deem it a reasonable tax; and because it is one that is less expensive in collection than other taxes.

We are persuaded that, if gentlemen will examine the documents on the table, they will find that though vast credit is due to the last Administration for the skill manifested by them in the establishment of the revenue; yet they will see that there is no certainty of its amount for the eight coming years being so productive as they seem to suppose. If they refer to the document, they will find that for the three successive years of 1790, 1791, and 1792, the average product of imports, calculated on the present rate of duties, was $6,153,000; they will also find that, for the six succeeding years, the average product was $8,350,000. Now, I think it is not safe to estimate the receipts for the eight coming years higher than those of these six years. It is to be observed, that these six years included a period of war, which extended the value of our exports, rendered the consumer better able to pay, from the high price received for the productions of his labor; and increased the consumption of luxuries more than in time of peace. It will also be evident that a variety of items which have gone to make up the aggregate of the revenue, will, in time of peace, fail. There are $86,000 estimated on drawbacks, which arose from duties paid on imported articles, afterwards exported from the United States, and which will cease the moment the carrying trade ceases. Will any gentlemen say, that in time of peace we shall continue to import articles for the consumption of Europe, the Spanish colonies, &c. This item, from its nature, is calculated to cease at the end of the war. It must cease.

Some duties must be reduced. Of wines, the average product of the duties for the years 1790, 1791, and 1792, was $317,000; for the six succeeding years, it was $714,000. Do gentlemen think this amount will be kept up? During war, your citizens are able to purchase. In peace the ability must decline.

The duty on sugar, in three years, has risen from $560,000 to $902,000. The duty on coffee has risen almost in the same proportion; and if it is not reduced, you will lose by its being smuggled; the temptation will be too strong to be resisted.

You cannot, therefore, calculate upon more than the average of the above six years. Indeed, you cannot with safety calculate so high. The Secretary of the Treasury has grounded his calculations on the idea that the consumption of foreign articles will increase with our population. But I totally disagree with him. I will ask whether you will consume more than you can pay for? I will ask how you will be enabled to pay for more now, in a time of peace, than you were enabled to pay for formerly? Are the European markets, or those of the West Indies increased? If not, it will follow that the consumers of your produce are not increased, though your productions are increased. And this state of things, instead of increasing the consumption of foreign goods, will only tend to increase your manufactures.

Other circumstances, too, have arisen, that have enabled us for some years past to pay for more goods than we can expect to be able to pay for hereafter; viz: the funding the national debt, and the selling a large amount of stock abroad. I hope we shall have no more national debts to fund.

If it is not safe to rely upon a higher amount of duties than the average receipts of the last six years, then you cannot rely upon a higher annual receipt, for duties on foreign articles, than $8,350,000. But suppose you derive $8,500,000 from this source. In addition to this fund, the Secretary of the Treasury calculates upon receiving annually $400,000 for the sale of lands. I am inclined to believe the amount will not be so large; but set it down at that. The postage of letters will yield $50,000, and the dividends upon bank stock $71,000. And here you have the whole amount of your revenue, with the exception of a trifling sum for patents, fines, &c. The whole in the aggregate amounts to $9,071,000.

I will now inquire into the expenses for the eight coming years. According to the Secretary of the Treasury, we are to pay $7,300,000 on account of the debt. But I will not take his calculation. I will state it at $7,000,000, which we must pay; the civil list $780,000—it will be understood that this is only what is absolutely necessary; the foreign intercourse, &c., estimated at $200,000; the Military Establishment $1,420,000, as estimated at the opening of Congress, and which is the estimate of the ensuing, and not of the past year, as stated by the honorable member from Virginia.

H. OF R.

Internal Taxes.

MARCH, 1802.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he did not state it to be the old estimate, but an estimate formed on the old basis.

Mr. GRISWOLD—I took it so. It is not safe to put the expenses of the Military Establishment, for the eight coming years, lower than this estimate. Gentlemen ought to consider the situation in which we are placed. They ought to consider our neighbors on the frontier, and those who are likely to be our neighbors. They ought to consider the accidents to which all nations are exposed. They ought to consider the necessity of sending a strong garrison to the posts on the Mississippi; and when they consider all the circumstances, they will agree with me, that it is not safe to trust the defence of the country to arrangements that will involve a smaller expense.

At the beginning of the session, the expense of the navy was estimated at $1,100,000 dollars; we since find it reduced to $900,000. On this estimate I have two remarks to make. I ask whether gentlemen are content to take this estimate for the eight coming years. How is it to be made out? By striking off $150,000 appropriated to progressing in the building of the seventy-fours, and $50,000 for making navy yards. What is meant by this? May not gentlemen as well lay down the navy at once? You have not at present a single dock where a large vessel can be commodiously repaired; and to make such a dock will cost at least $50,000. It is easy to make this reduction on paper; but we may as well burn our ships of war, or give them as a present to our sister republic. I trust, however, the country is prepared to give up the protection of commerce; and if not prepared, we must devote annually $1,100,000; which indeed, is short of what will be required.

Taking the old estimates, which are the only correct ones, Government must expend annually $10,500,000. But make a reduction for the Military and Naval Establishments of $500,000, which the necessary measures of the Government will not warrant—and the annual expenditure will be $10,000,000; compare with this, your revenue, which only amounts to $9,071,000.

And in this estimate, I have made no allowance for that infinite variety of contingent events that under every Government are constantly arising. I ask, then, if it is safe, or proper, to give up the carriage tax, and all the other internal taxes, when they will probably be wanted for the expenses of the Government?

I am perfectly aware that our finances are in such a state, owing to the great skill with which they were managed under the old Administration, that we have now three millions of surplus revenue in our Treasury; and that gentlemen, by applying this sum to the wants of the two or three coming years, may meet the expenses of the Government, and perhaps go on till another Presidential election. But I trust we shall not act upon this narrow system. I trust we shall not look forward only to another Presidential election. But that taking into our view the eight ensuing years, at the expiration of which time, in consequence of the reduction of the debt which will then have been accomplished, a large sum can be dispensed with, we will wait till that period arrives, before we dispense with these branches of revenue, or any other.

Believing it unsafe to abandon any of these taxes, I shall vote against repealing all of them. I have, of consequence, no idea of giving up the tax either upon stamps or stills. I believe all to be necessary; as necessary for the support of public credit, as for the honor and safety of the nation.

We have no pecuniary interest in retaining these taxes. We share not the loaves and fishes; but we are deeply interested in the support of public credit, in the safety and honor of the nation; and let money go where it may, I will always vote for money enough to support public credit, and to maintain the honor and safety of the nation.

I believe that, in this project, more is intended than is expressed. I know, whenever a deficiency shall occur, where it will fall. I know that it will fall on our Naval Establishment. Look back to the sentiments and conduct of those who once held seats on this floor, and who now hold high offices under the Executive, and show me when they voted a cent for a Navy. Did they not invariably say, let commerce take care of itself? Yes, I have heard these declarations, and they account for these measures to starve the Navy. It is, therefore, I feel alarmed, knowing full well where the deficiency is to fall.

But it is said, the collection of the internal taxes is attended with great expense, and, therefore, they ought to be given up; that they increase Executive patronage, and, therefore ought to be surrendered. I deny that their collection costs more than that of duties on imports. It is stated by the Treasury officers, that the expense on imports is only five per centum. But how often have you been told that your merchants are only your collectors. Gentlemen have never heard me say that all the duties fall on the merchant. I know the contrary; and I know that, to protect the fair trader from injury, all you have to do is to make them so high as to produce smuggling, or so prompt in their payment as to prevent the merchant from collecting them from the consumer before he pays them into your Treasury. But the merchant sells to the retailer, whom he charges twenty or twenty-five per cent. on the duties paid by him. Before the articles sold get into the hands of the retailer, they come charged with an advance of twenty-five per cent. The retailer sells to the consumer with his thirty-three per cent. added. I did not say they stood charged with one hundred per cent., but with forty per cent. at least. All those who make these charges are collectors; so that the fact is, that instead of costing five per cent., as asserted, they cost to the man who pays the tax—the consumer—more than forty per cent.

Internal Taxes.

H. OF R.

Let us in this view of comparative expense, turn to the other branch of the subject :

1. As to carriages.

The Secretary of the Treasury informed us, at the beginning of the session, that the internal revenues, taken together, cost in collection nineteen per cent. Now that officer acknowledges that they do not cost more than fifteen per cent. When an officer states one thing to day, and another thing to-morrow, I submit whether it is not better to make our own calculations. It is easy to prove that, in Massachusetts, the collection of the internal taxes does not exceed eight per cent., and it may be made equally low elsewhere. Therefore you may reduce this sum within ten per cent. Indeed, if you carry these taxes as far as you ought to do, to meet and equalize the duties on imported goods, you may bring the collection down to five per cent. Carry the duty on distilled spirits as high as on imported spirits, and my life for it, the expense will not be greater.

But, from another view, it will appear that the expense paid by the consumers of the objects of internal revenue, is not so high as on imported articles. For instance, distilled spirits are either retailed by the distiller, or sold directly to the retailers, and the distiller charges ordinarily no advance upon the tax, but gets his profit by being paid for the labor of distillation; this makes a difference of twenty per cent. In other articles, in licenses to retailers, there are no additional charges, no twenty per cent. Sales at auction are in the same situation; with respect to carriages, there is a still greater difference. The consumer pays nothing but the tax, without paying any commission or profit. Stamps are precisely so situated in most parts of the country.

The calculation, therefore, is fallacious, that makes the expense of collecting the internal revenue greater than that on imported articles; as, with regard to the latter, the consumer, in paying your duties, not only pays the collection, but also pays the merchant and retailer. So that these internal taxes are collected with the least expense of any. For what matters it to the consumer, whether he pays twenty per cent. to the merchant, or to the retailer, or to your officer? He actually pays it in either case.

Now, this being clear, and also that the taxes may be so modified as to be collected still lower, particularly that on carriages, (which may be collected by the deputy postmaster, who may receive the tax of persons living at a distance through the mail,) I ask, why give up the internal taxes in preference to those on imported articles? The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) tells us that the system of internal taxes is repugnant to the theory of a free government; that it requires a host of officers to collect them. But what is the danger from this source? Is it not well known that the tax gatherer is always odious, and that instead of having influence to subvert the Government, he ceases, as soon as he becomes an officer, to have that influence he would otherwise have possessed? The officers, too, are very few—only one supervisor and a few collectors in each State. The gentleman must think very contemptuously of the people, to suppose that they can be corrupted by a few officers, with inconsiderable salaries. For these reasons, I consider the objection an argument against everything; as applicable to the Army, the Navy, and every other important object that can be named. It is an objection which may do to talk about, but which has no solidity in it.

I have only one further observation to make; and that is, that if we can part with any taxes, though my opinion is, that if we sincerely mean to support the credit of the Government we cannot part with any, but if we can, we ought to give up the tax on some imported articles. Coffee is taxed five cents a pound; the present price, including the impost, is not more than twenty cents; the duty is more than fifty per cent. on the cost abroad. This enormous duty is a great temptation to smuggling. It can be easily done. Let gentlemen look to the seacoast. The temptation to gain fifty per cent. is immense; and I am apprehensive the practice may be gone into, unless you lessen the inducement; and in that event your revenue is gone; for the payment of it depends upon the honor of your merchants. Such is your seacoast, that the vigilance of a thousand officers could not resist the practice, if the disposition were not wanting. If this duty on coffee shall produce smuggling in the merchant who imports it, his neighbor, who imports sugar, will say, my neighbor is growing rich by this practice; I have the same right with him; and the practice will catch like wild-fire. We ought, therefore, to put these excessive duties down.

Besides, as to sugar, that, in my opinion, is a necessary of life. The duty is fifty per cent. on its first cost. It must, therefore, be oppressive; and if we can dispense with any of the impositions, it ought to be with those which fall upon the necessaries of life, which are consumed by the poor.

For these reasons I am for retaining the carriage tax, for retaining all the internal taxes, and for modifying and improving them. I believe that in this way the expense of the collection may be greatly lessened, and such a modification of the taxes take place as shall produce an equal pressure of the public burdens upon the whole community.

Mr. BACON said he should reply to the honorable gentleman from Connecticut only by declaring in so many words, that his (Mr. G's.) answer to his (Mr. B's) observations, was predicated solely on his own assertion, as a fact, and on the repetition of the same assertion, of what was totally void of truth; and that, for a reason sufficiently obvious, he had refused to give him an opportunity, in its proper place, to correct the error.

An adjournment was moved, and lost.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on striking out carriages, and lost—yeas 25, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John

Davenport, John Dennis, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, William Barry Grove, Seth Hastings, Archibald Henderson, William H. Hill, Ebenezer Mattoon, Thomas Morris, Thomas Plater, Nathan Read, John C. Smith, John Smith, of Virginia, John Stanley, John Stratton, Samuel Tenney, David Thomas, Thomas Tillinghast, John P. Van Ness, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, and Peleg Wadsworth.

NATS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, Phaniel Bishop, Richard Brent, Robert Brown, William Butler, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Richard Cutts, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, William Dickson, Lucas Elmen-dorf, Ebenezer Elmer, William Eustis, John Fowler, Edwin Gray, Andrew Gregg, John A. Hanna, Daniel Heister, Joseph Heister, William Helms, James Holland, David Holmes, George Jackson, Michael Leib, John Milledge, Samuel L. Mitchell, Thomas Moore, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, jr., Joseph H. Nicholson, John Randolph, jr., John Smilie, John Smith, of New York, Samuel Smith, Henry Southard, Richard Stanford, Joseph Stanton, jr., John Stewart, Philip R. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Joseph B. Varnum, and Robert Williams.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to insert in the room of "pleasurable carriages"—"carriages for the conveyance of persons," the terms of the law contemplated to be repealed. Carried without a division.

Mr. DENNIS moved to strike out "refined," for the purpose of inserting "brown" sugar.

He said it had been his purpose substantially to offer this amendment before. He had frequently made the attempt, but had as frequently been foreclosed by the embarrassing motions of his opponents, and their rules respecting order.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he believed there were no internal duties imposed on brown sugar. Such an amendment will make the bill perfect nonsense.

Mr. DANA suggested to the gentleman from Maryland a modification of his motion, so as to introduce the words, "imported brown sugar" between "carriages" and "stamped vellum," in the sixth line.

Mr. S. SMITH wished to know whether it was consistent with the order of the House, or with the decency which one gentleman owes to another, to ascribe to those who had thought it their duty to make certain motions, motives and intentions different from those they had avowed? He said he was unwilling to enter into altercation with his colleague, or with anybody; but if gentlemen do not restrain themselves in their reflections on us, they will compel us to be as indelicate as themselves, and this House will be converted into a bear-garden.

Mr. SMILIE said, he had not the least disposition to prevent any motion being made that was designed to make an impression upon the public mind. But he was certain he did not transgress decency in saying that he had never seen such conduct displayed in a deliberative assembly—so many questions introduced to embarrass and distract the House. Gentlemen, however, calculated wrongly respecting the public mind. If he believed the observations of gentlemen, he should despair of the Republic. He entertained, however, little fear. If gentlemen sincerely believe our measures subversive of the public happiness, he did not blame them for their conduct. It is their duty to act as they do. But he could not forbear one remark: Who laid these taxes? As to the salt tax, gentlemen took pains to convince us that it will not be improper to reduce this tax. Mr. S. said he was no friend to the tax on salt; but as it did not form a part of the branch of internal revenues, he thought it improper in this place to take any notice of it. There was no district in the United States more affected by the tax on salt, or less by that on carriages, than the district he represented. But the people in that district consider the tax upon carriages as a part of a pernicious system, and will cheerfully bear all the present duties upon imported articles, that this odious system may be abolished, and they will feel that in doing what we have done, we have done all we could do.

Mr. DENNIS.—I may perhaps have expressed my impressions of the motives of my colleague too strongly. I did however think that I had been treated injuriously, and that I had been deprived of the right to make a motion which I thought I possessed.

With respect to the popularity alleged to be intended to be derived from these little motions, I am ready to acknowledge my object is to gain popularity; but it is that kind of popularity that arises from measures calculated to benefit the nation. With this object in view, I believe the internal taxes ought to be retained, and the duties on imports diminished.

But while gentlemen are charging us with aiming at popularity, are they indifferent to it themselves? Has not this report of the Committee of Ways and Means been three months in the making, and when made is it not blazoned in a certain print in a type three times as large as any other of our proceedings are printed in? I do not know why there is this distinction in the type, unless the object of gentlemen be popularity.

Mr. NICHOLSON asked if it were in order, or whether a member had any right to talk about the conduct of a particular printer.

Mr. DENNIS observed, that he would make no addition to his preceding remarks, as he had just finished when his colleague interrupted him.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he did not think his colleague correct in the information he had given the House. He did not himself recollect that he had avowed his intention to renew this motion. Nor did he know that it was his duty to omit doing what he thought right, though it might interfere with his colleague's popularity. He may distinctly take up each of these points; but Mr. S. said he had never seen this mode pursued of jumbling things together. As to the popularity which the gentleman courts, he would inform him that he had voted for the duty on salt, on sugar, and almost all the other dutied articles, and yet he had never lost popularity. He had always thought the best way to get popularity was to act right.

Mr. JACKSON wished, in order to save time, gentlemen would agree to take a question upon all the articles at once.

Mr. T. MORRIS said, in that case he should call for a division.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved the previous question. He said that whenever he perceived a question brought forward to vex, to retard, and embarrass the transaction of business, he should deem it proper to require the previous question. Gentlemen may persist in calling the yeas and nays; but, on as many such questions as they choose to move, he said he would call for the previous question.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the previous question, viz. shall the main question, to insert, after "stamped vellum, parchment and paper," the words "the duties on imported brown sugar" be now put? and lost—yeas 25, nays 51, as follows:

Mr. T. MORRIS moved to insert the words "duties on imported coffee;" which motion the Speaker declared out of order.

A call was then made, for the question to engross the bill, in order to its being read a third time: On which call,

Mr. SPEAKER declared that, in his opinion, it was not in order to engross the bill, until the main question on the motion on which the previous question had been called for and taken, should be put and decided by the House; and that it was farther the opinion of the Chair, it was not in order to call for, or put the main question on any motion the same day on which the previous question on such motion was called for, and decided in the negative, by the House.

Whereupon, an appeal was demanded from the decision of the Chair; when, an adjournment was called for, and carried.

FRIDAY, March 19.

A memorial of the Washington Building Company was presented to the House and read, praying that an act of Congress may pass to incorporate the said company, to encourage and promote the erecting, building, finishing, and purchasing dwelling-houses, and other buildings, in the city of Washington.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the committee appointed on the eighth of December last, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the twenty-seventh of January last and the seventeenth instant, the memorials of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, and of sundry inhabitants of the town of Newcastle and its vicinity, and of other citizens of the State of Delaware, and to whom was also referred, on the eleventh instant, a motion "for the appropriation of — dollars, for the erection and repair of piers in the river Delaware," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Mr. S., from the same committee, presented a bill relative to public piers in the river Delaware; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House last appointed.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee appointed on the tenth of December last, presented a bill further to alter and establish certain post roads; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Mr. DAVENPORT, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred, to examine and report such laws of the United States as have expired, or are now expiring, made a further report, in part; which was read and considered: whereupon,

Resolved, That the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business be instructed to report a bill fixing the compensation of the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives.

INTERNAL TAXES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to repeal the internal revenues. Whereupon, the appeal from the decision of the Chair, demanded yesterday, and suspended by the adjournment of the House, was renewed.

Mr. L. R. MORRIS called for the yeas and nays. A division of the question on the said appeal, was called for by Mr. BAYARD.

And on the question, "is the first part of the decision of the Chair in order, to wit: 'That in the opinion of the Speaker, it was not in order to engross the bill, until the main question on the motion on which the previous question had been called for and taken, should be put and decided by the House?'"

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 48, nays 29, as follows.

NAYS—John Bacon, William Butler, John Dawson, and George Jackson.

Mr. DENNIS moved to insert after "paper," in the sixth line, "duties on imported brown sugar."

Mr. DANA said it was not his object at this time to enter into a comparative view of the internal and external duties, but to state, that if it was the sense of the House that the duties on imported articles should be reduced, the regular mode was first to abolish, and then reduce them. This is the regular mode, because by pursuing it, one law will contain the whole rate of duties. This mode had been pursued in revenue acts heretofore passed. [He here quoted the provisions of several acts, which he stated to be to this effect.] He knew the title of the present bill was to repeal the internal taxes; but the title being the last part of the bill agreed to, may be easily altered and accommodated to its contents. This course, Mr. DANA thought the most consistent, as this may be the only revenue bill brought before the House during the session, and may present the only opportunity of contrasting the external and internal duties.

Mr. HOLLAND.—I am opposed to the proposition made by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, as I conceive it incompatible with the principles of the bill; were this a bill to regulate duties on foreign imposts, a proposition to insert or strike out brown sugar might be proper, as it would also be proper to insert or strike out salt, coffee, &c., as has been so often attempted, with a view, as I suppose, to obstruct or embarrass the passage of it.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House have been told by the patronizers of this bill, that it is a bill to repeal the internal taxes. This being the sole object of the bill, gentlemen cannot suppose that the advocates of it would suffer anything to be attached to it, that would have a tendency to protract or prevent its passage. As I view the proposition to insert imported brown sugar, as having no relation to the repealing the whole system of internal tax-laws, and as I consider the proposition calculated to defeat the passage of the bill, I am opposed to it. I am the more decidedly opposed to it, because the gentleman on the other side of the House have uniformly declared their opposition to the repeal of the internal tax-laws, and have at all times attempted to procrastinate the passage of this bill; this proposition being one other evidence of their intentions, excites me the more strongly to oppose it.

Mr. Speaker, I have long wished to see the time that Government would have it in its power to dispense with these taxes, particularly with excises and stamp duties, because I think them hostile to the genius of our Government. I know that Government has a Constitutional right to impose these taxes. But let it be remembered, that at the time the Constitution was formed and adopted, both by the Federal and State Conventions, it was then understood, that this power was only to be exercised in cases of the greatest necessity.

It was then said by those who advocated this power to be given to the General Government, that nothing but extreme necessity would ever influence the General Government to lay excise, or levy stamp duties; and that the necessity would not probably ever exist. Calculations were then made, and confidently asserted, that three and a half or four millions of dollars of an annual revenue would be quite sufficient to discharge our national obligations, and answer all the demands of the Federal Government; and that a duty on imports of five per cent. would afford this revenue. Under these impressions the Constitution was adopted; and I yet believe, had the Government observed a proper and sound economy, in her first advances, that there would not have been a necessity to have resorted to those taxes. But, contrary to the opinions entertained when the Constitution was formed, and without any occurrence that rendered it necessary, soon, very soon, indeed, Government proceeded to lay internal taxes; and, without any regard to the prepossessions or prejudices of the great bulk of her citizens, she resorted to the most odious of all taxes—excise and stamps—the names alone carrying an odium that cannot be wiped off during the existence of the present generation. Our fathers from Europe, perhaps from the abuse in the collection of those kinds of taxes, or from whatever other cause, held those taxes as obnoxious, and will continue to consider them as odious, in whatever mode you place them. The odium extends into the domestic retirement of the husbandman, and it is in vain that gentlemen say that the citizens are contented with those taxes: let an inquiry be made of the honest laboring husbandman throughout this extended country. Let gentlemen travel and make the inquiry, and it will be found that nothing short of a love of their country, and a desire of peace, have caused the people to be passive under their operation, and they look forward with anxious hope for the time that they are to be relieved from them. The time, I hope, is now come, that their expectations are to be realized.

MARCH, 1802.

No part of the country consumes a greater quantity of salt, in proportion to their other consumption of foreign articles, than that part of the country which I have the honor to represent. It is a necessary of life; all descriptions of people must have it. Notwithstanding, if the Government must have the money drawn from them by excise and stamps, and had they their choice, they hold those taxes in such abhorrence that they would tell you to lay the excess upon salt, or upon any other necessary of life, and put down those obnoxious taxes. Such is the disposition of the human heart that you had better take one hundred cents from them in the way they approve than to take a single cent from them contrary to their approbation. These are my impressions of the opinion of my constituents, and notwithstanding the declaration of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HUGER,) respecting the opinions of his constituents, I think them the same with those of mine. I live near South Carolina, and know their localities, prepossessions, and habits, and do not hesitate in saying that the great mass of the people of that State would prefer a discontinuance of those taxes to any partial reduction of the duties on salt, brown sugar, or coffee.

The gentleman has informed us that his constituents consume a vast quantity of imports, and that the high duties bear hard upon them. I have no doubt but that the citizens on the seacoast, and in the gentleman's immediate district, live fast. Some of them have the character of living fast, and they are able to indulge themselves in luxuries. But the major part of the citizens of that State live in much the same manner as the citizens of North Carolina, or as those of other States; and

I am confident would be highly gratified by a total abolition of the internal taxes.

The same gentleman has supposed that members on this side of the House, to procure their elections, have committed themselves to their constituents for the repeal of those taxes. I know not by what means that gentleman has procured his seat. It may be by his promising to his constituents to have the duties on salt, sugar, and coffee, taken off, and from this circumstance may arise his suspicion of us, and his great anxiety to comply with his promise.

But I will candidly say, so far as comes within my knowledge, no idea existed that Government could do without those taxes. The citizens expected some more favorable modification, so as to enable small distilleries (that at present are entirely cut up) to go on—distilleries that were carried on not from the profit arising from the liquor, but for the benefit of live stock, that, to the great injury of the country at large, cannot work under the present law, which is a much greater number than those that do work—for those that do distil are persons of large capital; persons of small capital not being able to comply with the requisitions of the law. Arrangements of this kind were expected; but the people at large, as well as myself, thought that it would take some time, spent in economy, after such a scene of extravagance, before the taxes could be dispensed with. I had no conception that so great saving could be made by lopping off officers. I had no knowledge of their enormous number; and I am now happy to find that greater retrenchments than were expected can be made, and am highly pleased that Government can go on without those taxes. They have been odious to the people, partial in their operation, and unproductive in the result; and if you charge to their account the evils they have produced, they have brought little money into your Treasury: they are odious and impolitic, for they hold out a premium for perjury. They operate on the moral part of your citizens, by reason of false returns made by those that are regardless of their oaths. They are unproductive, from the expense of collection, the host of officers that must be engaged in the collection, and from the evils they will for ever produce. Evils of this kind are not casually attached to other kinds of taxation; duties on salt, sugar, and coffee may be oppressive, but they are not odious, and they are productive, few persons being engaged in collection.

But it is said by a gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) that we cannot do without the revenue arising from internal taxes, and that the people are in the habit of paying them, and that it would be dangerous to discharge them from what they have been accustomed to. It is true that the citizens have been in the harness, and drove on until they have no idea of resistance. But I wish to see the harness thrown off them. I wish to see them restored to that state of freedom that was contemplated at the time of our entrance into the Federal Government; and that they should not be fettered with taxes, that were only intended as the last resort; that were only intended in cases of the first necessity; and whatever may be the consequence of this emancipation, if it throws us in the back-ground, I shall be contented under a belief that it will not be in the power of any succeeding Administration to resort to excises for twenty years to come, unless there is the most urgent necessity. That they will not dare to do it upon imaginary or pretended necessity. The necessity must exist, and not till then I wish to see those taxes resorted to. The honorable gentleman tells us that he has no reliance on the heads of departments, and that more money will be necessary than is required by them.

I believe that it is the first time that the heads of departments in any Government have been suspected of not asking money enough for the administration of Government. It is the first time that the Administration of the American Government has been liable to this charge; and had the former Administration continued, they most assuredly would not have been chargeable with this offence. And permit me to say, that a much larger sum would have been necessary. But the Administration has changed, and with it a change of measures; the enormous sums of thirteen or fourteen millions of dollars per annum are no longer consumed. But does the gentleman suppose that his opinion should be substituted for the calculations made by our heads of departments: that the Legislature ought to adopt his suggestions in lieu of official documents? This, to be sure, would be treating that gentleman with a high degree of complaisance and respect. The honorable gentleman has also informed us that owing to the great industry of the late Administration there are two or three millions of dollars in the Treasury, and by this means Government may go on a year or two. I am willing to admit that the late Administration has been exceedingly industrious in drawing money from the people, and that their invention and industry have extended in every direction and to every object, and that nothing from which money could be drawn was left untried or untouched. But I think in these respects they have drove on too fast, and drawn from the people as much money in six years as ought to have been taken in twelve years. Indeed I believe that by the time the direct tax is paid, that Government will have received all the money that is in circulation. Some time will be necessary to enable the people to obtain a fresh supply.

I also think it bad policy in Government to wrest from the people all their circulating cash. I think it better for the Government that the Treasury should be poor and the people rich, than that the Treasury should be rich and the people poor. If the people are left with money in their hands, it adds to the means of their wealth, and when the necessity of Government calls for aid, that will be given by her virtuous citizens; but it is otherwise if the Treasury is rich and the people poor. I therefore wish to see a rich and independent people, and a poor Treasury, in preference to an indigent people and a rich Treasury.

Much has been said respecting an expression that dropt from a gentleman from Massachusetts, who I trust is a friend to this bill; the expression was, that the taxes were already half repealed; this has been tortured to mean that the friends of this bill are under Executive influence, and because of an indication in his Message in favor of the repeal the report is an Executive measure. Sir, not only the Executive, but the corresponding good sense of the most enlightened citizens of this country, has already more than half repealed those taxes, and had the sound understanding of the people been consulted, those taxes would not have been laid; and, as we now know from the best authority that Government can go on without them, we should be unmindful of our duty and of the voice of the nation were we not to repeal them.

An honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. DENNIS,) who is the author of the proposition to insert imported brown sugar, announced to the House that his object in this and in all the propositions that he has made on this occasion, is popularity. This being his object he is entitled to all the benefits that he can derive from them. I know not that gentleman's constituents, but it appears to me that they will understand the history of his measures, and if they do, I shall not envy him all the popularity that he shall take by his measures. His constituents will discover, that if any species of internal taxes is retained, that the system is preserved; and would they, for a reduction of the duties on salt, sugar, and coffee, agree to keep up four hundred and sixty lazy drones, that must have a salary equal to the amount of their collection? I think their constituents would think it more advisable to discontinue the system of internal taxes, and thereby compel those idlers to labor for their support, as it is not to be presumed that they are persons of opulence. The benefit the community would draw from their honest labor would be more than the amount of their collections; for I take it that Government is benefited in proportion to the increased productions arising from the labor of her citizens. It is therefore impolitic and odious to increase or continue useless officers. I therefore consider this amendment, with all the others proposed by the gentlemen on the other side of the House, as calculated to obstruct or prevent the passage of the bill, and as I am fully impressed with a belief that the bill ought to pass, I shall vote against the proposition to insert imported brown sugar.

Mr. DENNIS said he only wished a fair decision on his motion, and had intended to leave it to its fate, without a single comment.

His proposition had, however, been from time to time suspended; sometimes by the previous question, sometimes by being divided, and by appeals from the Chair. He wished not to produce delay, but he should continue to persevere in the right to have the question fairly stated to the public, until that object be attained. After the delay arising from appeals from the Chair, and divisions of motions, &c., and the long speech of the gentleman yesterday, he hoped the majority would no longer complain of procrastination. He did not mean to reply to the whole of the observations of the gentleman last up, for they were generally out of order, and much more applicable to the whole bill on its final passage, than to the motion before the House.

That gentleman, said Mr. D., has told us that the object of this bill is to repeal the internal taxes. This, I suppose, we should have discovered without the aid of the gentleman's sagacity. On the contrary, it is my object to retain the tax on carriages, on refined sugar, on retailers, and on sales at auction, because they are applicable to luxuries used by the rich; and to reduce the tax on brown sugar, on coffee, bohea tea and salt, or on some of them, because they may be considered as necessities of life. We are told this is not the proper place to make the comparison, and the gentleman (Mr. HOLLAND) tells us, after this bill is passed, he will co-operate with us in reducing the tax on brown sugar. That gentleman, sir, must know that we cannot dispense with these taxes, and those on sugar and coffee likewise; and that when this bill shall have passed, it will be too late to attempt the reduction he speaks of. This is then the only time and place, when and where we can take the comparison, and make our election, whether we will repeal the tax on carriages, on retailers, on sales at auction, and loaf sugar, or reduce them on brown sugar, tea, and other articles beforementioned.

But the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HOLLAND) says the very name of excise is odious to a free people, and that it has been found so in practice. When he proceeds to prove his assertion, he appeals solely to the tax on stills. Without inquiring into the truth of the assertion as applicable to stills, Mr. D. said he would remind him the first motion he made on this subject was, to distinguish between the tax on stills and other internal revenues. Mr. D. said he was willing now to repeal the tax on stills; and if they would confine themselves to that tax, he would co-operate in the measure. He conceived the tax on stills as standing on different ground from the tax on carriages, retailers, and sales at auction, and on refined sugar, precisely because it was very troublesome in its collection, and requires a great many officers to collect it. This gentleman and his coadjutors are very anxious to repeal these taxes, they tell us, because they wish to get clear of a host of officers. They cannot surely expect this to delude the public.

Take off the tax on stills, and they may discharge all these officers, and still collect the tax on the residue of these duties at a lower rate than we collect the impost. They may devolve on the deputy postmasters in some cases, and on the collectors of the customs in others, the collection of these taxes; and thus, sir, all this noise about a host of officers is hushed into silence.

A gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SOUTHARD) supposes if we devolve the collection of the tax on carriages on the deputy postmasters, it will become burdensome to make the entries—and asks, with a great deal of emphasis, What! will you compel your citizens to travel forty or fifty miles to enter a carriage? Now let us see how far these assertions are supported by the fact. I know of no county, where there is, at present, more than one collector of this tax; but I know it is common to find three or four, and sometimes half a dozen deputy postmasters in a county; so that the distance to be travelled, to make these entries, would be diminished rather than augmented; and yet, sir, this is the kind of reasoning by which we are to be persuaded it is best to release carriages, and continue the taxes on the necessities of life.

But, says the gentleman from North Carolina, the people wish to be released from taxes; ask them if they do not. I have no doubt it is at all times pleasing to be released from taxes. But the question is not, in the abstract, whether they wish to be relieved from taxes; nor is this the fair way of stating the question. No, sir, ask the American people these questions; whether if we cannot repeal both the internal revenues, and reduce the internal duties, they would prefer to continue the tax on carriages, in order that they may reduce the tax on salt; whether they had rather take off the tax on loaf, or reduce it on brown sugar; whether they will continue to tax retailers of spirituous liquors, in order that they may reduce the tax on coffee; whether they would continue to tax sales at auction, to release the duty on bohea tea: and I will vouch for them they will answer, continue the duties on carriages, on loaf sugar, sales at auction, and retailers, (for these relate to mere luxuries,) and take off the taxes on the other articles, which are necessities of life.

On yesterday it was intimated I was seeking after popularity, and that this was the object of my motion. This sentiment has been reiterated by the gentleman from North Carolina. Without inquiring what is the object of that gentleman and the patrons of this bill, I will candidly confess I do expect popularity from this measure. Popularity, however, is but a secondary consideration, and as such I shall always be happy to enjoy it. My duty I conceive is, whenever a question presents itself, first to consider what system of conduct will be most conducive to the public interest, and secondly, what will best comport with the public will; and if my views of public interest correspond with the national voice, I shall always be happy in the approbation of my fellow citizens. I believe this to be case in the present instance, and therefore I expect to derive popularity from these measures. But at the same time, I will tell that gentleman, that the popularity I aim at is popularity for that political party with which I am associated, and on the prevalence of whose principles rests, in my opinion, the prosperity of this country, and not my own personal popularity. Permit me to tell that gentleman, too, that a seat on this floor is not of so much importance to me as he may imagine, and perhaps not of so much consequence as he may deem it to himself; and that it is at least questionable whether I shall again solicit the representative character. I did not intend, as I before intimated, to pursue that gentleman through his desultory harangue, for the reasons before assigned, and will barely repeat that I will agree to repeal the tax on stills, but that I think, if any revenue can be spared, it is much better that we continue to collect the duties on carriages, refined sugar, and other luxuries, than to continue the present high duties on coffee, bohea tea, salt, and brown sugar.

Mr. HUGER.—I merely rise to answer the observations of the gentleman from North Carolina respecting the remarks I have made on this subject. I had observed that if the object of gentlemen was not merely to acquire popularity, wisdom would have first dictated the making savings, and then the doing away unnecessary taxes. I also stated, that if we could spare $650,000, it was proper for us to take a general view of the community, and mitigate those burdens which were the most oppressive. I also stated that I was in favor of doing away the tax upon stills and stamps, and for retaining the other sources of internal revenue. With respect to popularity, I will say, that when I first entered into public life, it was at the fag-end of an Administration; and that it has been my misfortune to vote on all occasions for giving to Government the money wanted for the good of the country, and to vote against paying tribute to a foreign nation. I have never told my constituents not to pay their taxes; I have written no pamphlets against the Navy; I have never voted for paying tribute to our enemies, or for refusing to defend my country.

I know that, in the upper part of South Carolina, the tax on stills is heavy. I am, therefore, for modifying it. But I will ask whether in that district of country the taxes on carriages, refined sugar, &c., fall heavily? I said that no State in the Union, in proportion to its numbers, consumed more imported goods than South Carolina; and, therefore, concluded that the taxes on imports should not be continued longer than necessary. With respect to popularity, I have no objection to it; but if ever I obtain it, I hope it will be that which flows from good conduct, and not from my voting this way to-day and that way to-morrow.

Mr. BACON said he did not rise to give information to the House. He believed every gentleman had digested the subject before him, and had formed his opinion upon it; and that nothing more was now necessary than to express that opinion by a formal vote. He believed the only effect of prolonging the debate would be to waste time and incur expense. He conceived that, with regard to all the particular articles in contemplation to be inserted in the bill, they might be introduced with greater propriety into the bill on post roads than into the present bill. Both these bills related to revenue. The post office bill had the superior advantage of being a permanent law, while the object of the present bill is to do away a law, an entire system, odious and expensive; expensive because it requires a vast number of officers to execute it; and odious, because it increased a patronage hostile to a free Government.

The yeas and nays were then called on Mr. DENNIS's motion, to insert after "paper," the words, "duties on imported brown sugar;" which was lost—yeas 31, nays 53, as follows:

An amendment was then made, on the motion of Mr. BAYARD, authorizing the return of money received by Government for the purchase of stamps remaining in the hands of the purchaser.

The question was then put on engrossing the bill.

Mr. BAYARD moved the postponement of the question till Monday.

The question was taken on Mr. BAYARD's motion and lost.

When, Monday was fixed for the third reading, and the bill, with the amendments, ordered to be printed in the mean time.

MONDAY, March 22.

A petition of sundry merchants of the town of Natchez, in the Mississippi Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying such a revision and amendment of the laws of revenue as will relieve them from the payment of double duties on merchandise shipped from the ports of the United States to any port in the said Territory.

Memorials of sundry merchants of the town of Boston, and its vicinity, in the State of Massachusetts, and of sundry inhabitants of the towns of Norwich and New Haven, in the State of Connecticut, were presented to the House and read, respectively praying relief in the case of deprecations committed on the vessels and cargoes of the memorialists, while in pursuit of their lawful commerce, during the late European war, by the ships and cruisers of the French Republic.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

INTERNAL TAXES.

The bill for the repeal of the internal taxes was read the third time.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH the blank in the first section was filled with the 30th day of June next, which fixes the period of repeal of the internal taxes; and the blank in the second section was filled with the 30th of April, which is the day from which the office of superintendent of stamps is to be discontinued.

7th CON.—34

The question was then put on the passage of the bill, when Mr. S. SMITH spoke in favor of its passage.

Mr. S. SMITH.—Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who, at the meeting of Congress, did believe that it would be prudent to repeal the stamp tax only at the present session, and to permit the other internal taxes to remain until the next session of Congress. The repeal of the whole of those taxes, being proposed, it became my duty to examine the subject fully; this I have done, and the result has been favorable to the repeal. I shall ask leave to make a few observations on the bill now on its passage.

It does not appear that any gentleman desires to prevent the repeal of the tax on domestic distilled spirits, for no member has moved to strike it out of the bill. I take it for granted, therefore, that its repeal is desired by all. Nor do I believe that the repeal of the stamp act is seriously objected to. I shall, in consequence, confine my observations principally to those duties, the repeal of which has been opposed. Three of those I voted for retaining in the bill, that is, for the repeal, to wit: licenses for retailers of liquors, sales at auction, and carriages for the conveyance of persons. My reasons I will now submit to the House. The laws laying those duties passed in 1794 for two years, were afterwards continued until August, 1801, and on the 23d of February of that year, were made perpetual. I have never yet heard any good reason assigned why a retailer of liquors should be compelled to pay for permission to pursue his business more than a wholesale dealer in liquors, a retailer of dry goods, a wholesale merchant, a lawyer, a doctor, or any other profession by which man obtains an honest livelihood. The exigency of the times induced the laying of that tax; but it was then said, that it was only for a short time, and would be repealed whenever it could be spared; it can now be spared, and ought to be repealed, for it is unjust. This tax ought to be repealed for another reason; its inequality as it relates to the States, and particularly as it relates to Maryland, the State I have the honor to represent. I have examined the documents from the Treasury, and find that Maryland paid for licenses in 1800, four thousand three hundred and ninety dollars, having nine members (under the new census,) Virginia having twenty-two, paid only five thousand six hundred and eighty dollars, and North Carolina, having twelve members, paid but two thousand five hundred and fifty-five dollars. Nay, Mr. Speaker, Maryland paid more than was paid by all the five States of Rhode Island, Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, and South Carolina, the whole of those States paid only four thousand five hundred and fifty-five dollars for retailers' licences. Can this be just? Can it be right? Ought a member from Maryland to continue a tax so unequal on his fellow-citizens?

Sales at auction.—This tax falls on those who, from necessity, or from a desire to raise money to meet particular objects, send their goods for public sale; or, it is paid by persons about to remove from one part of the country to another, and sell their little all to enable them to remove with their families. I have never yet heard any reason of force to show why a man who sells his goods at public sale should pay a duty on sales not paid by those who sell at private sale. This tax is still more unequal in its operation than that on licenses. Maryland paid, in 1800, for the tax on auctions, six thousand seven hundred and thirty-four dollars; Virginia, four thousand seven hundred and thirty-one dollars, and Connecticut only one hundred and forty-two dollars. Can it be just, that Connecticut, having nearly as many inhabitants, shall pay but one hundred dollars of a tax, where Maryland contributes to the same six thousand seven hundred and thirty-four dollars? It may operate with gentlemen from that State as a good reason for retaining the tax, but certainly ought to have had a contrary effect on my colleague, (Mr. DENNIS.) The great inequality of the tax on auctions will appear more striking when gentlemen turn to the document, and see that Maryland actually paid more than eleven States, to wit: New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, New Jersey, Delaware, Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, Georgia, and South Carolina; those States will have fifty-eight members on this floor, and paid, in 1800, but five thousand six hundred and twenty-six dollars on the tax on sales at auctions, when Maryland paid six thousand seven hundred and thirty-four dollars.

Carriages for conveyance of persons.—This tax has been considered by many as a direct tax under the Constitution. I did not think so on its passage, and voted for it, but now I cannot but have doubts on the subject, when I recollect the operation of the late direct tax, and the inequality of the carriage tax, as it respects the States. Wagons, on similar principles, might be taxed, and if they were, the New England States would pay no part of the tax. Would this be just? Maryland paid, of the duty on carriages, eight thousand six hundred and eighty-three dollars; Connecticut only four thousand five hundred and sixty-four dollars, being little more than one-half thereof, and the seven States of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, South Carolina, and Georgia, pay together only three hundred and one dollars more than Maryland. The tax on carriages falls particularly hard on the district I represent. In the city of Baltimore more than one hundred carriages for hire parade the streets, besides a large number employed from that city on the roads. The owners earn an honest livelihood thereby; a tax on their carriages for conveyance of persons appears to me as unjust as a tax would be on carriages for conveyance of goods. Sir, this tax does not fall, in my district, on the luxurious alone. I am inclined to believe that more than two-thirds of the tax is paid by citizens keeping carriages for hire, nearly the whole of the other third by our citizens for their convenience. I am persuaded that my district alone paid more, in 1800, to the carriage tax than was paid by Vermont, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and perhaps Georgia together. Can I (knowing this circumstance) ever give my consent to continue a tax every way so unequal?

I will be told, that, taking the whole four objects proposed to be struck out together, to wit: licenses, auctions, carriages, and refined sugar, that the result would be more equal. Sir, I have examined that subject also, and have found the result nearly similar. The gross amount collected on those four objects is two hundred and fifty-nine thousand eight hundred and ninety dollars; of this sum Maryland paid thirty thousand and sixty dollars, one eighth of the whole, and nearly double the fair proportion of that State. Connecticut paid but ten thousand five hundred and twenty-one dollars, being little more than one-third of that paid by Maryland. I will not say that this was good cause for gentlemen from that State to vote for the continuance of those taxes, but I will say, that it would be a bad reason for my colleague (Mr. DENNIS) to offer for moving to strike them out of the repealing law. But, sir, the inequality, and, of course, injustice, will be more clearly shown, when it is known that Maryland paid nearly two thousand dollars more of those four taxes than were paid by the seven important States of New Hampshire, Vermont, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Those seven States will have, after the next election, in this House, forty-two members, and have paid only twenty-three thousand three hundred and four dollars, when Maryland paid thirty thousand and sixty dollars, and will have nine Representatives. This must be unjust; the repeal ought to be made, or on some future occasion those States may think it convenient to increase those taxes of which they pay so very little.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have been told that taking the whole objects of internal taxation into one view, they will be found nearly equal as respects the States. I have also examined that subject, and have found the inequality as it respects the State I have the honor to represent, continued. Maryland paid, in 1800, of the amount actually received into the Treasury, charges and drawbacks deducted for that year, seventy-two thousand seven hundred and thirty-five dollars. Connecticut paid only twenty-two thousand six hundred and ninety-three dollars, not one-third of the payment made by Maryland. North Carolina paid forty-six thousand four hundred and seventy-nine dollars, and the whole seven following States only fifty-nine thousand and ninety-three dollars, to wit: New Hampshire, three thousand one hundred and forty-nine dollars; Vermont, one thousand three hundred and ninety-seven dollars; New Jersey, sixteen thousand one hundred and nine dollars; Delaware, seven thousand eight hundred and thirty-six dollars; Georgia, three thousand dollars; Tennessee, four thousand nine hundred and nine dollars; and Connecticut, twenty-two thousand six hundred and ninety-three dollars:

MARCH, 1802.

Internal Taxes.

H. OF R.

Add to those the amount paid by the wealthy and important State of South Carolina, and it will be found that one-half the States of the Union paid less than ten thousand dollars beyond the single State of Maryland of the whole internal taxes for the year 1800. Thus you see that New Hampshire, having more than half the inhabitants of Maryland, and Vermont having nearly half her numbers, pay scarcely any part of the internal taxes. Are we, then, to be surprised if those States which scarcely pay anything—or if Connecticut, which pays so small a part of the internal taxes—should be found voting against the repeal? Yes, sir, we ought to be surprised; the injustice is so glaring, that the members must, in honor, vote for the repeal of taxes to which their citizens contribute so little; justice demands it of them, and they will obey her voice.

The very great inequality of each of those taxes—of the four conjointly, or of the whole of the internal duties taken together—will plead my apology with such of my colleagues as may have conceived that those taxes ought not to be repealed. Indeed, sir, I cannot but believe that had the subject presented itself to the mind of my colleague (Mr. DENNIS) as it has to mine, he would not have given the opposition he has to the repeal. I must believe that he will not now vote for the continuance of taxes which fall so unequally on his State as those do. We have been told that the subject ought to be considered in a national point of view, and that those duties are objects of luxury. To the first, I do not subscribe. I have always supposed that my duty was to prevent an inequality of taxes being imposed on the State I was elected to represent, and carefully to attend to the interest of my constituents. I have yet to learn what luxury there is in drinking whiskey; nor have I been informed that retailers of liquors find much luxury in paying for their licenses. Does the seller at auction find it luxurious to pay a duty on the amount of his goods sold? The owner of an elegant carriage may feel the luxury of riding in it; but I doubt whether the man who keeps carriages for hire, or the people who keep chairs to carry their families to church, find much luxury in paying the tax. My colleague (Mr. DENNIS) will tell us what is the luxury arising out of the stamp act. It is true that four hundred officers will be dismissed by the repeal; but however I may regret the injury some of my acquaintances may suffer, yet I do not believe that their loss of office will greatly disturb the tranquillity of the people; and permit me here to remark, that had the taxes on the licenses, auctions, refined sugar, and carriages, been continued, it would have required a great proportion of those four hundred officers to collect them; the cost of which would have been too great for their amount to bear. May not the desire of keeping their friends in pay, be a strong inducement with gentlemen to retain the taxes? To create offices has been the favorite system with some gentlemen; the system of the Republicans is to lessen their numbers, and dismiss all that are useless.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the revenue will not be sufficient (without the aid of the internal duties) to meet the exigencies of our Government; and yet we have seen those very gentlemen who make use of that argument, voting to repeal (in addition to the internal taxes) the whole duty on bohea tea, sugar, coffee, and salt, making together an amount of more than two millions of dollars. Had they succeeded, the Government must have stopped; it could not have met its engagements. But did they intend to succeed? No, sir, if they could have tacked those items to the bill, they would then have voted, I have no doubt, against the whole bill, and thus attained their sole object, to wit: to prevent the repeal of any of the internal taxes, or any reduction of the duty on salt, sugar, &c. Can we, sir, spare these taxes, and meet the wants of Government? I think we can. The Secretary of the Treasury reports, and it is conceded by all, that the revenues were fully equal to the expenditures under the existing laws, at the commencement of the present session; that having been the case, if the present Congress have already made savings by a reduction of the army, and a dismissal of useless officers to the amount of the internal taxes, then certainly the Government will be fully competent to meet every demand. Have we done this? I think we have, to wit:

On the Army Establishment, the difference of expenditure between that repealed and the law just passed, is, agreeably to the report of the Secretary of War	-	-	$500,000
On the Naval Establishment (between the sum estimated on the meeting of Congress and that now required) a saving will be in consequence of a fall of wages and provisions of	-	-	200,000
On the Judiciary (the law repealed)	-	-	31,500
On the forts (less than the estimate)	-	-	70,000
Making together	-	-	801,500

The average annual receipts arising from the permanent internal taxes, has been declared by the Committee of Ways and Means (and their report has been admitted to be correct) to amount only to $600,000; the highest calculation has been $650,000. This being the fact, we can safely spare taxes to that amount, having already retrenched our expenses above $800,000. We shall make yet other savings, so as to make the whole, as I expect, amount nearly to one million of dollars. To save from public expense will be more pleasing to the people than to raise a similar sum from them by taxes.

It may be thought by gentlemen who have not particularly attended to the subject, that we shall be unprepared to meet the demand against the United States lately arranged under the British Treaty. I do not know the precise amount of the claim stipulated to be paid, but I do know the sum limited by the late Administration, beyond which our Minister could not go, and I have not a doubt of our being prepared to pay that amount. Gentlemen will turn to page eleven of the Secretary's report, and they will be satisfied. The Secretary says, after stating a number of items of receipts. "Those several items (exclusively of several balances due by individuals, a part of which will eventually be received into the Treasury) constitute a sum exceeding three million of dollars, and may for the present be considered as resources sufficient to meet the demands against the United States, which may be eventually payable on account of the sixth article of the treaty with Great Britain, and of the — article of the convention with France."

Mr. Speaker, it cannot fail to give pleasure to our constituents, when they know that we have met the payment of the interest on the deferred debt; that we have as much money in the Treasury as was left there by the late Administration; that we have discharged, in the course of the year 1801, of the principal of the public debt, two million two hundred and twenty-nine thousand dollars; that we have a fund amounting to three million of dollars ready to meet the demand under the British and French Treaties, or to meet any unforeseen deficiencies of revenue, that we can, with perfect safety (as it relates to our revenue) repeal the internal taxes; and can, notwithstanding appropriate a sum toward the discharge of the public debt, such as will, in eight years, pay thirty-two million of dollars, and in fifteen, completely discharge the whole debt. My colleague (Mr. DENNIS) boasted that in nine years, four million of the debt had been paid, the same sum will, in future, be paid off annually, and that without laying any new tax; on the contrary, I am of opinion, that we may soon lessen the duties on some of those articles that gentlemen wished to clog this bill with.

Mr. Speaker, during the recess of Congress, the President by reducing the marine corps from twelve to four hundred men; by an excellent arrangement, as related to our debt to Algiers, by the recalling of unnecessary Ministers at foreign Courts; by the dismissal of useless officers, by an economical arrangement of the Quartermaster's department of the Army, and by other judicious measures, did save to the United States an annual expenditure of nearly four hundred thousand dollars. The President has recommended the lessening other expenses, and Congress have adopted, and will adopt, such as will, I expect, amount to one million of dollars. Let us therefore give his honest endeavors to save the public money, and to relieve the burdens of the people, our warm support and assistance.

Mr. Speaker, seeing that the internal taxes taken collectively, or each tax taken separately, are unequal in their operations as it relates to Maryland, and particularly so as it relates to my district—seeing that their collection requires four hundred officers, and that the pay of those officers consumes a large proportion of the money collected from the people—seeing by the saving made from our usual annual expenditure that we can safely spare the amount of those taxes; and believing that the people will the more readily submit to pay taxes that are necessary when they know that they will be relieved therefrom whenever the exigency shall cease to exist; I shall conclude by expressing a wish, that the bill to repeal the internal taxes may pass.

Mr. DANA said he could have wished, before the observations of the gentleman from Maryland, to have submitted a few remarks on the defects of the bill. [He here specified some amendments, which, in his opinion, the bill required.]

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole House for amendment, and stated wherein he conceived it to require amendment.

MESSRS. RANDOLPH, JONES, JOHNSON, and GRISWOLD, vindicated the correctness of the provisions of the bill; when the motion to recommit was taken, and lost—yeas 26.

Mr. DENNIS.—Having been up frequently and involuntarily on this bill, it is with reluctance that I rise again. I have to regret my absence at the time my colleague animadverted upon the remarks which had previously been made by me, or on the proceedings in the progression of the bill in which I took a part.

Mr. S. SMITH said he had made no remarks respecting his colleague in his absence.

Mr. DENNIS.—I beg pardon for the mistake. My colleague, however, seems to have discovered a new argument, not derived from the general principles of the bill, but from local considerations. He conceives that Maryland pays infinitely more than her proportion of these taxes, and that it is therefore his duty to vote against their continuance. But I have frequently observed that the only way to inquire into this subject is to compare our internal and external revenue. Had my colleague attended to this circumstance he would have spared his remarks.

We have not documents whereon to ground a general view of the subject. But in the last year it appears there were collected of the internal taxes $72,735 in Maryland, and in the whole United States $919,719. I will remark, that if Maryland pays more than her proportion of the internal revenue, she pays infinitely more of the external duties. Of these last, Maryland pays more than a million, while the whole amount is only ten millions; that is, she pays one-eighth part of the whole external revenue, which is greater than the proportion of seventy-two thousand to eight hundred and nine thousand dollars, the sum calculated upon by the gentleman from Maryland.

I do not conceive that any accurate estimate of the sum actually paid by each State can be derived from the documents before us. I know that though a million of external duties is paid in Baltimore, yet that the whole of that sum is not paid even by the whole State of Maryland. The same is the case with the internal duties—for instance, that on stamps is first paid by the merchants, who do not ultimately pay it, but throw it on the consumer. The same is the effect of the duties on refined sugar and on sales at auction. For no duty is derived from sales at auction under an order of court. The sales, on which duties are paid, are chiefly derived from large commercial towns, and they are not paid exclusively there, but by the great body of citizens of the United States, who consume the articles sold.

In Virginia, there is paid on stamps $17,000; in Maryland, $23,000. Thus it appears that in Maryland, which is so much smaller than Virginia, there is paid in the first instance a greater proportion of the duties on stamps; yet I cannot suppose there is a greater proportion of this tax actually paid in Maryland than in Virginia, as I know that Virginia consumes more. The document, therefore, throws no light upon the subject; the whole statements of my colleague are fallacious. The internal taxes, too, are chiefly imposed upon luxuries, the consumption of which bears no proportion to population. They are taxes operating upon a particular description of citizens; in general upon the wealthy; of course, where there are most wealthy citizens, the greater portion of these taxes is paid. This is particularly the case with the carriage tax.

I have before expressed my disposition to repeal the tax upon stills, not for the reason assigned by my colleague, because Maryland pays more than her legitimate proportion of this tax. I know that those who distil the most consume the least of imported spirits. Now the tax upon domestic spirits is infinitely less than that on imported spirits. The first pays — cents, and the last 40 cents. The necessary consequence, then, of substituting domestic in the room of foreign spirits is, that we are liberated in that proportion from the duty on the latter. I am, therefore, for abandoning this tax, not because I think Maryland pays more than her proportion of it, but because it is inconvenient in the collection, and requires a great number of officers to collect it.

The real question is, whether the tax on internal articles is greater than that upon imported articles? No doubt the honorable gentleman (Mr. SMITH) pays a greater tax upon internal than upon imported articles. But let the question be put to the mechanics of the country, and they will answer, retain the taxes upon all the internal articles except stills, and reduce the duties on those imported articles which are necessities of life. Though a few wealthy individuals may pay large sums to the internal revenue, yet it will be found that nineteen-twentieths of the citizens of Maryland pay the most on imported articles.

This comparative view, in my opinion, is the only accurate one which can be taken. I am, therefore, still under the impression that if we can dispense with part of our burdens, it is better to retain part of the internal taxes, all excepting that on stills, and make a diminution in the duties on imported articles of the first necessity.

Mr. T. MORRIS.—We are called upon to destroy at one blow all our sources of internal revenue, and to rely for the protection of the Government exclusively on the external taxes. I am, for two reasons, against this step. In the first place, I am not convinced that we can do without this revenue. It may be deemed rash in me, after the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) has declared that he has inquired into the expenditure and the savings, and is satisfied of the extent of the last, to say that I am not convinced that we can dispense with these taxes. If I had not doubted before, his style of reasoning would not have convinced me. We do not know what sum we may be obliged to pay to Great Britain under our treaty with her, nor do we know the extent of our obligation, which a large portion of our citizens think well founded, to indemnify for French spoiliations. Is it then proper to diminish our revenue before we have inquired into these circumstances?

But, in the second place, however well convinced I might be that we could spare these taxes, I would vote against the repeal of the taxes upon pleasurable carriages, sales at auction, refined sugar, and licenses to retailers, because they are for the most part paid by the wealthy and luxurious.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) objects to the tax upon carriages, because it falls heavily upon the State; he says, in Baltimore there are a great number of hacks, which are not owned by the rich. But I will ask the gentleman who pays the hack hire, the poor or the rich? Do the poor of Baltimore ride about in hacks? The very circumstance of the existence of so great a number of hacks proves the carriage tax not to be oppressive.

The aggregate of the taxes upon carriages, brown sugar, licenses, sales at auction, and stamps, is $481,000. Make a deduction of $24,000 for the expenses of collection, which I am persuaded will be quite sufficient, and there remains a balance of $457,000.

If the state of the finances admitted this reduction, I would prefer lessening the burden on the other articles, which chiefly falls on the yeomanry of the country; on bohea tea, for instance, which pays twelve cents, and on brown sugar, which pays five cents per pound.

What are the objections made by gentlemen to our plan? They say they are for repealing the internal taxes in preference to all others, because they require a host of officers, and because they increase Executive patronage, which is odious to the American people, and hostile to the genius of a free Government. But I take this to be fallacious. For I cannot conceive that those who object to Executive patronage are seriously adverse to it. We are to judge, not from their professions, but actions; and when we see men of merit over the whole Union deprived of their offices—

Mr. NICHOLSON called to order.

Mr. MORRIS.—If the objection derived from the alleged expense of collection be solid, it may easily be removed by turning over the collection to the deputy postmaster, who will consider five per cent. as a sufficient premium. Whence, then, the necessity of destroying a whole system because a part of it is defective? If the number of officers or the expense be too great, lessen them, but do not on that account destroy the system altogether.

Much has been said respecting the duty upon stamps. I will acknowledge that, when it was first laid, it was odious, because it was not then understood. I believe, however, that it is now a popular tax in a great part of the Union; and if the House had permitted a document for which I moved, to have been produced, it would have appeared to be a tax chiefly paid by the opulent part of the community. I believe that in my part of the country it is as popular a tax as any paid.

Gentlemen say the people are averse to these internal taxes, and in the same breath they inform us that if they are laid aside by this Government they will be resumed in the several States. I do know that in some of the States they are so little odious that there is a double tax, one laid by the State and the other by the United States. This of itself is sufficient to prove that the disposition of the country is not against them.

Had gentlemen convinced me that we could dispense with the tax on stills, I would have agreed to abandon it. But they have not convinced me, and I am not, therefore, in favor of abandoning it. But if they are willing to double the tax on the other five sources of internal revenue, I will join them in taking off the duty on stills.

A strange charge is brought by gentlemen. They accuse us with courting popularity. But how long is it since, in the estimation of gentlemen, it has been a crime to appeal to the sentiments of their constituents? What! if it is deemed by a part of the House that a tax should be taken off of some articles, though the majority are for taking it off of others, are we to be called base courtiers of popularity, when we address our remarks, not only to the sober sense of the House, but also to that of the people? If the charge of courting popularity apply anywhere, it is to the President. Was it proper in him to designate any particular tax as a fit one to be removed? I must say that this was going beyond his duty. For, as all revenue systems must originate in this House, it rested with us exclusively to originate as well as decide whatever relates to revenue.

I have another objection to the repeal. Should war, or any other untoward event occur, I ask, what resource is there left to which we can resort? If such untoward events should occur, we cannot resort to our taxes on articles of luxury, for the means of indulgence will be gone. We must resort to excises. It is owing to the flourishing situation of the country that we are now enabled to tax luxuries. But when they cease to be consumed, we must resort to objects of prime necessity. I ask, then, if the situation of the country is such as to warrant this abandonment of all our internal resources? Do we not know that a formidable foreign Power is to settle on our frontier? Do we not know that a nation, not the most tranquil, is to take possession of Louisiana and Florida? Are we, then, in such critical circumstances, to squander away our revenues?

Mr. Lowndes.—I did intend to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH,) but I have been anticipated by the gentlemen who have preceded me. I will therefore confine my remarks to points not animadverted upon by those gentlemen.

The gentleman observed that these taxes, if hereafter required, may be restored, and he added the people of this country are not like the people of other countries. This I do not believe. I believe they are like other people. I will not be their flatterer. I believe that they, like other people, when a new tax is laid, will be against it. I should not have troubled the House on this subject, had not the Committee of Ways and Means remarked, that however favorable they might be in the abstract to a repeal of these taxes, they would not have recommended a repeal, if they believed that it would interfere with a punctual compliance with our engagements. If this was their opinion, it was incumbent upon them to show us that the repeal would not interfere with a punctual compliance with our engagements, which they have not done.

I have voted for striking out all the articles moved, not that I am against retaining the tax on stills. On the contrary, I believe it the best tax, because it is paid by those who pay no other tax, and because taxes should be equally distributed throughout the community. Besides, the duty on distilled spirits is but thirteen cents, while that on imported spirits is twenty-eight cents. Surely, then, those who consume the former have no reason to complain. The difference of duty is a bounty on the consumers of distilled spirits; and is there any reason why the consumer of home made spirits should be more exempt from taxation than the consumer of foreign spirits?

Another objection to this tax is urged. It is said, that it creates an Executive patronage hostile to the genius of a free people; and that it is oppressive in the collection. But in what is it oppressive? Have we received a single petition against it? Nor can I conceive how it is odious to the genius of a free people. I know that formerly in other countries excises were odious. Collectors possessed summary jurisdiction, and the trial by jury was taken away. But do those regulations exist with us? I have read some petitions that were formerly presented on this subject; wherein the petitioners complain that they were obliged to write in large letters, "Stills," on their houses. But, if there existed no stronger ground of complaint, this is a proof that the tax was neither inconvenient nor oppressive.

We are told the collection requires a great number of officers, and that it extends the patronage of the President. There are about four hundred officers, scarcely twenty to a State; and yet gentlemen are alarmed at the danger of this patronage to the liberties of the people. Some of these officers receive only thirty-two dollars a year, and these are the hosts that are to destroy the liberties of the country. I think differently of Executive patronage. It may extend so far as to excite the hopes of expectants, but not to gratify them. Every appointment that makes one friend, creates twelve enemies. The Executive will derive no security to his power from this patronage. He can only excite expectation. As a proof of this, we see, from the papers, that, instead of filling up vacancies in a Constitutional manner, the people are called together to designate the officer, and what was intended to be committed to the discretion of a constituted agent, is exercised by a junto.

The tax on stills has existed since the year 1790. Of late we have heard no complaints, we have seen no petitions; and I think it can impose no hardship on the community, because I see the revenue steadily increasing. But suppose there are hardships, is there no medium between the entire continuance and abolition of it? Gentlemen have long enough exercised their talents for destruction; let them now use them for beneficial purposes.

We have heard much about retrenchments; but the retrenchments yet made, consist altogether in sound. It is said the Judiciary is abolished. I am sorry for it. But I have seen a letter from a gentleman on the other side of the House, which says, the salaries of the judges are not touched. There is, therefore, on this head, no retrenchment; and if it is the intention of gentlemen to appoint other judges, the expense will be increased.

The Secretary of War has told us laconically that in his department there will be a saving of four or five hundred thousand dollars. But are we to be guided by expressions so vague? How is this saving to result? What difference is there between the present and the old establishment? As to men there is no real reduction, as the old establishment was not full. On the other hand, there will be an increased expense, from the dismissed officers receiving one month's pay for every year they have been in the service.

It is also said there is to be a reduction of $200,000 in the Navy Department. But one report of the Secretary says there is to be no reduction, and another that there is to be a reduction of $200,000. Which is to be credited?

But are there no new expenses? Have gentlemen forgotten that we have passed a law for an increased representation, which will add forty-three members to the present number, at an expense of about $1,000 a year. I say that this new expense amounts to more than all their boasted savings. If, however, they really wish a saving of the public money, why not reduce our own compensation to two dollars a day? This would have two good effects. It would lessen our per diem allowance, and shorten our sessions.

I have another reason against the repeal of these taxes. I am informed that the President has received official information that Louisiana and Florida are ceded to France. We know there is a dispute respecting the boundaries of these provinces. Is it then wise, at this critical period, to dispense with your internal resources? In case of a war, your revenue derived from imposts would be suspended. If these internal taxes are retained, in such an event they might be improved and enlarged.

I have another strong argument against the repeal. I allude to the claims of our merchants, whose justice cannot be resisted. I believe this country has acquired a fortunate release from its obligation to guaranty the possessions of France in the West Indies. Had we been called on during the war in Europe to take efficient measures to guaranty these possessions, a refusal would have been a cause of war. I think, therefore, we have purchased the exemption cheap. But on every principle of justice or honor we are bound to make good the claims of our merchants on the French Government, which we have thereby extinguished.

We have heard from gentlemen much about their intention to reduce the national debt, and I believe the Committee of Ways and Means have reported an appropriation of seven million three hundred thousand dollars for that object. I would be glad to know where this sum is to come from? If gentlemen are sincere in their desire to pay off the debt as speedily as possible, they should have postponed, at least for one year, the repeal of these taxes. They should have recollected, that they are as yet inexperienced and untried in the administration of the Government.

Mr. LOWNDES concluded by observing, that in his opinion, the patronage of the Executive in appointment to office, was not to be dreaded; but that if ever the time should come, which, he hoped to God, never would, when members of this House should be so obsequious to the will of the President, as to vote for a bill at his nod, such patronage would be dangerous indeed.

A motion was made to adjourn, which was lost.

Mr. DANA.—It is not my purpose to detain the Committee long; but as the subject is important, it cannot be improper to offer some observations upon it. It may seem strange that any person should be induced to oppose an abolition of taxes. The affairs, however, of Government, the honor and public faith of the nation, cannot be always supported without some pecuniary burdens, and when these require the imposition, taxes should be levied, however unpopular the act. We were told, at the opening of the session, that strong and efficient measures would be taken for the speedy discharge of the public debt. This is the first revenue bill introduced into the House. Is it an evidence of such disposition? I know no proper way of extinguishing the public debt, except by paying it honestly. I do not know how gentlemen mean to extinguish it; but I am sure they cannot rightfully extinguish it by destroying the means of payment. If they wish rightfully to free the country from it, instead of continuing the taxes, they ought to devote themselves to its extinction. The Navy six per cent. may be redeemed at pleasure. Other stock, too, is comparatively low in the market, much lower than it may be in a few years. This, therefore, is an eligible season for the advantageous purchase of it with the proceeds of the taxes.

I have a further argument to oppose to the abolition of these taxes. They are pledged explicitly to the payment of the public debt. [Mr. D. quoted the law to that effect.] These sources of revenue are the more important to the public creditors, as they may be compared, in point of security, to a mortgage of real estate, not subject to the casualties of war or other misfortunes.

What will be the effect of the proposed repeal? Your public debt is to be paid. You abolish an annual revenue of several hundred thousand dollars. Compute the time during which you will be discharging the debt, and you will see that the abandonment of these taxes will be equal to an abandonment of six or seven millions. To this amount you throw additional burdens upon commerce, and to a proportionate extent of time, you postpone the ultimate payment of the debt.

What proof is there that this debt will be speedily extinguished by payment? Is it intended that the Navy shall pay it? The Secretary of that department strikes out $200,000 from his former estimate; but is it not known, that the plan of naval supplies must be in part, if not wholly abandoned under this last estimate?

The report from the War Department is of a still more singular kind. The Secretary says, the difference between the expense of the present and the last establishment, will be little more or less than five hundred thousand dollars. The Committee of Ways and Means say there will be a saving of a sum exceeding $400,000. Thus we see there is a difference between the two statements of about $100,000. Is this information sufficiently correct to rely upon?

But is there really such a saving? The only evidence we have on which we can depend must be derived from the experience we have had. A difference between the military expenses of the last and the present year may arise from the reduction of price as to provisions, clothing, and transportation. But this reduction has been estimated at no more than $200,000 for both the Army and Navy. The estimate of the Secretary of War for posts and garrisons, evidently is predicated upon the principle of having the full number he has stated, of effective men. What then is the real military reduction? As to the former establishment, it is well known that it never was full. According to the return laid before the House, there were in the service 4,051 men including the officers. According to the Peace Establishment, lately adopted, there will be 3,040 men, besides officers, making together about 3,270. The difference between the two is 780. What would be the cost of these 780 men? In ordinary service, the average of $200 a year has been computed as sufficient for officers and men. Suppose the service on the frontier to be more expensive, and make an allowance of $300 for each military individual—then the whole cost will amount to between $200,000 and $240,000. If you allow $400 for a year, which is double the ordinary average, the amount will be about $300,000. During the Indian war, when the prices were enormous, the average expense for each military person did not, I believe, exceed $400. It cannot now, therefore, be so high—and it follows that the actual saving cannot be so great as that estimated by the Minister at War, by one or two hundred thousand dollars.

Much has been said respecting the carriage tax. It is said that in New Jersey there are a great number of carriages owned by persons in moderate circumstances, which pay a duty of two dollars. If the tax operates oppressively, modify it. The whole number of carriages, which I suppose are referred to, is but about eight hundred for the United States. All that is derived from that species of tax does but little exceed the sum of $1,600. Strike it out then, if improper—it amounts to nothing in this question. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) affects particular solicitude for clerical men. I am not disposed to question the sincerity of his regard for them, but the argument proceeds on a supposition which is fallacious. Undoubtedly it would be improper to select that description of citizens, or those in the habit of attending public worship, as peculiar objects of taxation. If this were the principle of the duty on pleasure carriages, it might justly be censured. But when such citizens are able to keep their carriages, and exhibit the ordinary evidences of prosperity, they, like other persons in similar circumstances, may be taxed by the Government; and I hope gentlemen do not mean to evince their ideas of those who are religious by considering them as doomed to perpetual poverty.

Some of the reasons of the Committee of Ways and Means merit attention. They say that excises are hostile to the genius of a free people. But were the members of the General Convention of that opinion when they agreed to a Constitution which conferred on the General Government the power of laying them? Or did the people believe them to be hostile to their liberties when they ratified that Constitution? At the time of that ratification were the people free, or were they slaves? The truth is, the Constitution has explicitly given authority to lay excises, and the principle is settled.

It is said that the collection of these taxes requires a great host of officers. I am not disposed at this time to discuss the question of Executive patronage. I shall dismiss it with saying the officers are public agents, not those of the President. The doctrine that they are the agents of the Executive Magistrate, and not of the public, is a new one. I am not disposed to admire a principle that makes all the public agents the obsequious instruments of an individual in power.

The Committee say that these taxes lead to a system of espionage. It is to be hoped that the terrors of Gallic phraseology will not awe gentlemen into a surrender of their intellectual faculties. Is this anything more than a mere imagination, or fanciful nullity? Are those who make and vend whiskey examined with the same jealous care as the merchants? The master of an American merchant vessel, importing goods from a foreign port, must have on board a manifest of the cargo. When arrived within four leagues of the coast, he may be met and boarded by one of your revenue cutters. A manifest must be exhibited, and a copy of it delivered to the officer of customs on board the cutter, who is to forward it to a custom-house. When arrived within the limits of the custom-house district, the vessel may be again boarded by an officer of the customs, when a manifest must be again exhibited and another copy must be delivered. The master must afterward make his report and entry, and exhibit a manifest at the custom-house. A distinct entry is also required in various instances, to be made by the merchant. The entries must be verified on oath. In addition to all these precautions, an inspector is put on board the vessel, to watch the landing of every article. Nothing is allowed to be delivered out unless in open day, except by special license. And the inspector may secure the hatches for the night, by locks and other fastenings, as he shall judge necessary.

Compare this system of regulations with that for collecting the internal duties. In point of strictness, is the last equal to the former? Will it be said that those who make and deal in whiskey are more worthy of respect and confidence than the American merchants and commanders of merchant vessels?

If your jealous regulations are odious in their application to the internal revenue, are they not ten-fold more odious in their application to the external?

There is another principle advanced by the committee that is deserving of attention. It is that the United States should derive their revenue from the duties of the customs, and leave to the particular States their revenue to be derived from internal taxes. Has it not been assured as a principle, that taxation and representation should be reciprocal?

The Constitution has provided, that representatives and direct taxes should be apportioned among the respective States according to the number of free inhabitants, and three-fifths of the black population. Why was the allowance made for these three-fifths? Was it not on the principle of making the representation conformable to internal taxation? If gentlemen considered it as the true policy of the United States to continue in peace with all the world, and if there are to be no internal taxes except in time of war, why should fourteen or fifteen representatives be ultimately allowed to certain States on account of the blacks whom they hold as property? As they extend through the interior of the country, and may assist the Government in equalizing the public burdens, and the various parts of the community, internal duties are so far analogous to direct taxes. Yet some gentlemen appear to refuse to the Government of the United States the exercise of internal taxation altogether, and yet would assure to particular States that extraordinary number of representatives which they are allowed for the number of their slaves. Gentlemen should be cautious, and not press their advantage too far. The benefits which the Constitution has given them, with respect to persons holden in servitude, may be very agreeable to them, but abuses of the power thus put into their hands may render certain provisions of the Constitution peculiarly odious to other parts of the Union.

Mr. DANA was followed by Messrs. HUGER, HASTINGS, and GRISWOLD, who made a few remarks against the passage of the bill, and by Mr. VARNUM in favor of it.

TUESDAY, March 23.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," was read twice and committed to the committee to whom were referred, on the seventh and twenty-seventh of January last, the memorial of Evan Thomas, and others, and a Message from the President of the United States on the subject of Indian affairs.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary in the several acts relative to the establishment of a marine corps, and in an act fixing the rank and pay of the commanding officer of the corps of marines, and that the committee be authorized to report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That the consideration of the said motion be postponed until Thursday next.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House such information as he may have received, relative to the copper mines on the south side of Lake Superior, in pursuance of a resolution passed the sixteenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred, authorizing the appointment of an agent for that purpose.

Ordered, That Mr. GREGG and Mr. STRATTON be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making an appropriation for defraying the expenses which may arise from carrying into effect the Convention made between the United States and the French Republic; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto.

The House then proceeded to consider the said amendments at the Clerk's table. Whereupon, the first amendment reported from the Committee of the whole House, to fill up the blank in the bill with the words "three hundred and eighteen thousand dollars," being twice read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The second amendment, reported from the Committee of the whole House to the said bill, being twice read, as follows: Strike out the words "first, out of the proceeds of any French prizes which have or may come into the Treasury of the United States, and which have not yet been otherwise applied; and secondly:"

The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the said amendment, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 52, nays 26, as follows:

The other amendment, reported from the Committee of the whole House, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 24.

A new member, to wit: WALTER BOWIE, from the State of Maryland, returned to serve in this House as a member for the said State, in the room of Richard Sprigg, who has resigned his seat, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

An engrossed bill making an appropriation for defraying the expenses which may arise from carrying into effect the Convention made between the United States and the French Republic was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a letter to him from the Comptroller of the Treasury, and sundry statements, marked A, B, C, D, and E, prepared in pursuance of an act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States;" which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DENNIS, from the committee appointed on the ninth and seventeenth ultimo, presented a bill for opening a canal to communicate from the Potomac river to the Eastern branch thereof, through the City of Washington, which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the first instant, the memorial of Stephen Sayre, made a report; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the memorialist have leave to withdraw his said memorial.

Mr. STANLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the nineteenth of January last, a petition of Memucan Hunt and others, addressed to the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina; and to whom were also referred sundry resolutions of the said Assembly, respecting a claim of the petitioners for the value of certain lands in the State of Tennessee, held under grants from the State of North Carolina, prior to the cession of the said lands to the United States, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House proceeded to the consideration of a motion, made the tenth instant, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on the second Monday in April next.

And, the question being taken that the House do agree to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to convey certain parcels of land therein mentioned;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

The said bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee to whom was yesterday committed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," reported the same to the House, without amendment: Whereupon,

Ordered That the said bill be read the third time to-morrow.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to continue in force an act to augment the salaries of certain officers therein named.

The Committee rose and reported the bill with an amendment, that the law should continue two years instead of three.

Ordered to lie on the table.

THURSDAY, March 25.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. MILLEDGE, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Walter Bowie, returned to serve in this House as a member for the State of Maryland, in the room of Richard Sprigg, who has resigned his seat, made a report thereon; which was read, as follows:

"That it appears, from a certificate signed by the Governor of the State of Maryland, in Council, and under the seal of the said State, that Walter Bowie was duly elected to serve as a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, in the place of Richard Sprigg, who had resigned his seat.

"That the resignation of Richard Sprigg satisfactorily appears from his letter of the tenth of February last, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of the committee, Walter Bowie is entitled to take a seat in the House, as one of the Representatives for the State of Maryland, in the room of Richard Sprigg."

Ordered, That the said report do lie on the table.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the rebuilding the light-house on Gurnet Point, at the entrance of Plymouth harbor; for rebuilding the light-house at the eastern end of Newcastle Island; for erecting a light-house on Lynde's Point, and for other purposes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

On motion, it was.

Resolved, That the Secretaries of the Departments of State, Treasury, War, and Navy, respectively, be, and they are hereby, directed to lay before this House, a statement of the application of the appropriations made by Congress for clerk-hire in their respective Departments, specifying the persons, and the salaries allowed to each, for the last three years.

PAY OF MEMBERS.

Mr. BACON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to consider whether any, and, if any, what, reduction ought to be made from the pay of the Senators and Representatives in Congress, as now established by law, and that the said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. BACON said he had always thought that, in a Government like ours, compensations to public agents ought not to be high; that in such Governments, public offices, if lucrative, will become objects of envy, and, from being objects of envy, will become objects of hatred, until, finally, the Government itself will become an object of hatred. He had reason to believe that the salaries and compensations, heretofore allowed by the United States, had not been duly apportioned among the officers; and he considered this as applicable to the members of the Legislature. He therefore moved, in substance, that a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, reduction is necessary to be made in the compensation of the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, as fixed by law.

Mr. DAVIS wished, if the gentleman intended to act upon a general principle, that he would extend his motion to the Clerk of the House.

The question was put upon taking up Mr. BACON's motion, and carried—yeas 49.

Mr. DAVIS moved to add to Mr. BACON's motion "and officers of the House."

Mr. ALSTON considered this amendment unnecessary, as the object was now before a committee who had maturely considered it, and were ready to report.

Amendment lost—yeas 22.

Mr. ELMENDORF entertained no doubt, when he considered the quarter from which the motion came, of its having been maturely digested. He hoped, in order that the House might learn what deduction could be made, that it would be unanimously committed.

Mr. DANA hoped the yeas and nays would be taken, that it might be seen whether the House were unanimous.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said that, as he should probably vote against the resolution, he would assign the reasons that governed him. In 1793 or 1794 he said he had offered a similar resolution. At that time he was not acquainted with the necessary expenses attending a seat in this House, being a new member. Besides, he was persuaded that the unavoidable effect of reducing the compensation so low that men of moderate property could not hold seats, would be that Congress would be filled with nabobs.

Mr. BAYARD said, he presumed the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLAIBORNE) would scarcely accuse his friend from Massachusetts with a disposition to introduce nabobs into this House, or to exclude good democrats. Nor is this our object. But we do conceive that, when gentlemen are for tearing down every old establishment, in order to prove their patriotism, they ought to bring home to themselves the effect of these operations. Mr. B. said he did not, however, like the shape of the present motion. He believed that it was meant to import something not likely to be seen by the House. The sending that to a committee, which every member must understand, appeared to him a work of supererogation. What can that committee do? Simply collate the allowance with the expense of living. This every member can do as well for himself. The report, therefore, can furnish no new information. In order to test the sincerity of gentlemen on this subject, he would make a direct motion. Not that he thought six dollars a day too much on the old system. But the present compensation ought to be accommodated to the new plan. He therefore moved that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to reduce the compensation of members from six to four dollars a day.

Mr. DAVIS moved to strike out four, and insert two dollars a day.

Mr. DANA inquired, whether it was in order to divide the question?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. DAWSON moved the postponement of the question until the last Monday in November. He stated that, in making this motion, his only wish was to prevent a waste of the public time, and not from an unwillingness to meet the question; and he took occasion to declare, that he should vote against every proposition which went to change the present pay, which he considered as not more than adequate, and to which all liberal and reasonable men would assent.

Mr. NICHOLSON hoped the postponement would not take place. He had no hesitation to say that he found six dollars not more than sufficient. But if gentlemen were ready to make sacrifices he would be as ready as any of them. He hoped, therefore, the question would be immediately taken, and that it would be seen how far gentlemen were for making sacrifices.

Mr. HUGER hoped the motion would not prevail. He had no hesitation in saying he was against all reduction. He knew that it was a popular thing to reduce salaries, and that those who make such motions may get credit abroad. Without ostentation, he might say the compensation was no object to him. If there were no compensation, he would still return to his seat, if he offered and should be elected.

He conceived the reduction in every way improper. Every gentleman must know the inconvenience of leaving home, and of neglecting a farm or a profession. Gentlemen do not consider the sacrifice that is made. A gentleman is brought here in the honorable character of a Representative of the people. He would ask, if he was not obliged to live in decent style? He believed that many able and respectable men could not afford to attend without a compensation. As far as his information extended, he believed that, in his State, many men whose talents would confer honor on their country, were prevented from coming here from the smallness of the compensation. He believed it was a great object to have fit men in office, and this end could not be attained without the allowance of decent emolument. It is a dreadful thing that you are to carry a man from his family and friends, and then grudge him the small pittance of six dollars a day. The natural effect of reducing the compensation so low, is to throw the best men out of office. Perhaps no class of citizens is more fitted for public stations than that description of citizens who can just live at home, without having anything over to spare. Can such a man come here, return home, and find himself in as good a situation as when he left it? Can it be the wish of the American people to reduce men, who serve them, to this situation? Mr. H. said, it was not his wish to see the Government managed exclusively by the rich, or by those who had no stake in the country. The effect of this resolution will be not to put better men in office, but to abridge the field of choice. We have heard no complaints from the people respecting the present compensations. No gentleman will say this is a cheap place. Expenses here are greater than in Philadelphia. Here you are obliged to incur a considerable expense, or you must live miserably.

As to other contemplated diminutions, he was against them as well as this; he would rather disband the whole army than reduce the compensation paid to members. If reduced, what shall we gain? a mere bagatelle! As had been observed by the gentleman from Virginia, the Civil List did not constitute the great expense of the Government. Economy is a good thing, but let us be moderate and wise in our application of it. Mr. H. concluded by observing, that he should not have made so strong an opposition to the motion, if the present compensation were any object to him.

Mr. SMILIE said, he had often seen this game played in Legislative bodies; but he did not recollect that he had ever before seen it played in Congress. He had not so contracted an idea, of the American people as to believe this mode of obtaining popularity would succeed. The only way, in his opinion, to obtain popularity, was to do what was right. This had been his course; he had hitherto stood tolerably well with his constituents; and so long as he continued to pursue the same course, he had no doubt his constituents would continue to approve his general conduct.

As to any reduction whatever in the compensation of members, he would not say that it was improper, but he would say that the proposed reduction was too great. The general plan of reduction, to which gentlemen had alluded, was a different one from the present. The former was to dispense with all establishments that were useless. So far, he concurred in the plan, and deemed it correct. Whether it would be expedient to reduce the salaries of some officers, he was not prepared to say, though he was inclined to think there were some officers, among whom were some of the collectors of ports, who appeared to receive too much.

If one event take place; if we reduce the salaries of officers generally, then we ought to reduce our own. He concurred with the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HUGER) in the opinion that it was not proper to reduce the compensations so far, as to deprive the intermediate classes of our citizens of the power of serving their country. This was not intended by the Constitution, which even in the qualifications of a President required the possession of no property. It was, therefore, clearly intended that the people should enjoy the right of calling all classes of citizens into the public service. Suppose we were to declare, by law, that no man that was possessed of property to the amount of ten thousand dollars should be elected to a particular office, would not this be unconstitutional? Yet, may we not accomplish the same end in a different way?

Mr. S. supposed this motion was to be considered as an electioneering business. As to himself, personally considered, it was a matter of indifference to him, whether he was here or at home. He had never considered a seat in this House as a matter of emolument; and he believed every member viewed the compensation in the same light. He would, therefore, vote both against the postponement and against the resolution.

Mr. DAWSON withdrew his motion of postponement. He had made it to save time, but as it appeared to have an opposite effect, he declined persisting in it.

Mr. BAYARD said he agreed to vary his motion so as to insert two dollars instead of four dollars.

Mr. GILES observed, that he only wished to remind gentlemen that they had yesterday passed a resolution for adjourning on the second Tuesday of April. He believed there never was a subject before Congress that required less reasoning; and if gentlemen will spare remarks not calculated to promote the dignity of the Government, they will confer a favor on the House. He was himself perfectly persuaded that the compensation of six dollars was not too high. In entertaining this opinion he was quite disinterested, as it was his purpose to be a constituent instead of a Representative, though he possibly might continue to serve in the latter character during the next Congress.

Mr. BACON said, he did not rise to enter into the debate. He rose to make himself understood. When he acted, he must act for himself, and pursue his own judgment, though he stood alone. The resolution was predicated upon plain Democratic principles; and he hoped never to be engaged in any cause that would constrain him to descend to the grovelling act of inquiring into the secret motives of men.

He had long been of opinion that, in general, the compensations have been too high in a Government like ours. He might be mistaken, but such was his opinion. If the motion he submitted was predicated upon true principles, he expected it would be popular. He was sorry the resolution had taken up five minutes' attention. But the observations made by other gentlemen had induced him to reply. He said that he acted in concert with men with whom he generally agreed, but upon the merits of a specific question, he must judge for himself. He concluded by moving the insertion of five dollars a day.

Mr. GODDARD had no doubt but that the degree of confidence the gentleman reposes in gentlemen will be reciprocated; but he could not refrain from reading a resolution passed on the fourteenth of January last.

[Here Mr. G. read an extract from the Journal, containing a resolution appointing a committee, on which Mr. BACON was named, to inquire into the expediency of making reductions in the Civil List.]

Mr. T. MORRIS said his object was to insert four dollars for each member, and six dollars for the Speaker.

Mr. ELMER felt very little anxiety respecting the fate of the motion; nor did he know that the compensation did not stand at a just rate. But he hoped gentlemen would be actuated by the public good, and not carried away by party motives. He would rather that the compensation should be reduced to five dollars. It was certain that gentlemen in lucrative professions made great sacrifices. But it did not comport with the genius of the Government, or the habits of the people to make compensations, for public service, that were lucrative. Five dollars might answer, but two dollars were certainly inadequate.

Mr. MILLEDGE said it was clearly his opinion, that six dollars were little enough. But if gentlemen are making sacrifices, he was ready to go as far as they pleased. If they are for reducing, let them do it handsomely, and show the extent of their patriotism.

Mr. D. HEISTER moved to add, "during the present session of Congress."

Mr. S. SMITH said, he had always thought six dollars a proper allowance. But if a majority of the House should be willing to make sacrifices, he would not differ with them; he had never considered the pay as an object. He had been some time in public service, and never saved anything from his pay; he had generally found his expenses exceed his allowance. But if a majority were of opinion that one dollar was sufficient, he was willing; if for nothing, he had no objection as to himself.

Mr. BAYARD hoped it would be remembered, that the proposition to reduce the compensation to two dollars a day was not his. It was not his object to turn the business into ridicule; or with the gentleman from Maryland, to vote for two dollars, or one dollar, or no dollar, as that gentleman said he had been in the habit of serving his country. He had wished to see the compensation fixed at a moderate and reasonable sum. This had comported with his serious views. But as gentlemen were disposed to make a flagrant display of their patriotism, he was willing to go with them, and to sacrifice with them, because he thought that, while we are sacrificing others, we ought to make some sacrifices ourselves.

Mr. HOLLAND was opposed to the resolution, and to every amendment which had been offered. He believed six dollars, at the commencement of the Government, was sufficient, and much more ample than at present. The Legislature had seen fit to continue that compensation to the present day, and he believed the expenses of living were not now reduced. There was, therefore, in his mind no necessity for inquiry. He had another reason for being against the motion; and that was his wish, that our successors may be as well accommodated as we are.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he had intended to make some explanation on the misrepresentations of the gentleman from Delaware. But, on reflection, he was convinced that the House was so well able to understand the manner in which that gentleman acts, that they will be able, on this occasion, to judge, without any explanation from him.

Mr. J. C. SMITH said it must be evident to the House, that the resolution of the fourth of January, involved the object of the present motion. To the committee then appointed, it was certainly most correct to refer this motion, though he did not know why that committee had not yet reported. He therefore moved the reference of the motion to that committee.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he had contemplated, at a future stage of the business, the instructing that committee to make this inquiry. It certainly was the correct course to refer the motion to that committee, which was under the superintendence of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON.) As that committee had slept from the fourth of January, and as their nap had been a very long one, it might be time to awaken them.

Mr. BACON observed that, as he was called on as chairman of the committee alluded to, to render an account, he would state that the committee had met early and repeatedly; that they had thought it expedient to refer to the heads of departments for information. They were informed that there would be a document, in a short time, presented, that would afford them better information than any which could then be furnished. They would, notwithstanding, have progressed, but for a change in the committee; one gentleman had quitted his seat in the House, and another (the Chairman) had obtained leave of absence.

Mr. J. C. SMITH said that the mode pointed out by his colleague was the most correct. But his object, in the motion he had offered, was to preclude this useless and unpleasant discussion.

Mr. ELMENDORF thought the reference perfectly useless. As a member of that committee, he had expressed his opposition to the proposed reduction.

Mr. NICHOLSON did not know a stronger reason for that reference.

Mr. DANA declared himself in favor of a reduction. He had no hesitation to say that the compensation of six dollars was not too much. But under present circumstances, gentlemen might expect him to go full length, that they may themselves feel the force of their own acts. He was, therefore, for the reference, and to that particular committee.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. J. C. SMITH to refer Mr. BACON's motion to the committee appointed on the fourth of January, and carried.

SALARIES OF OFFICERS.

The bill reported from the Committee of the Whole, to continue in force an act, entitled "An act to augment the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," was taken up.

The amendment agreed to in the Committee to limit the duration of the law to two years instead of three, was agreed to.

Mr. J. C. SMITH said that, as he was fully impressed with the propriety of the motion which he had made in Committee, he could not, notwithstanding its fate, agree to abandon it. He believed it most fair that the compensations allowed to officers should appear on the face of the bill, instead of referring to an old law. He therefore moved to strike out the words "said act be revived," &c., and that the following words should be introduced, "the following salaries shall be allowed to the Secretary of State," &c.

This motion was supported by Messrs. J. C. SMITH, DANA, GRISWOLD, ELMER, HUGER, MORRIS, GODDARD, and BACON; and opposed by Messrs. GREGG, S. SMITH, NICHOLSON, VARNUM, and GILES.

Those who supported the motion contended that no analogous instance to the present bill could be found; that there was no instance in which a law had actually expired being revived, and taking effect from the period of expiration; that the law intended to be restored, had expired on the 31st of December last; and that the present law was, in fact, a new proposition, to augment the salaries of several of the heads of departments, from $3,500 to $5,000, &c.; that though they had no objection to continue most of the salaries at their augmented amount, there might be some of the compensations that did not bear a proper proportion to the rest; that this was actually the case with respect to the Secretary of the Navy and of War, and the Attorney General; the two former of which were not sufficiently high, and the latter, which appeared to be the most useless of all the offices, from the officer absenting himself so frequently from the seat of Government, was too high; that it would be invidious to be constrained, from the manner in which the bill was drawn, to move a distinct proviso in the case of a particular officer thus circumstanced; that many of the present members of the House were not in the Legislature when these compensations were fixed; and that they ought to have an opportunity of comparing them with each other; that though the present Secretary of the Treasury had himself voted against the increase of salary, that could be no inducement with them to vote against it; that, if it were meant, by gentlemen who brought in the bill, to conceal from the people that these salaries were augmented by the present Legislature, they would be deceived; that they would, on the other hand, gain credit by an open avowal of the fact; if this was not done; it would be said, here are gentlemen who have been declaiming against high salaries until they obtain the offices of the Government, and then they allow those high salaries, and attempt to conceal the allowance; that the late salaries, being predicated upon a state of war, might, perhaps, be too high for permanent salaries; and if so, required reduction; that, in order to determine the point, each salary should appear on the face of the bill; and this would be in conformity to the universal practice of the House, which, in all cases where a law was revived which involved a principle implicating details, had revived the law, not generally, but specifically, as to those details, thereby giving an opportunity to the members of the House to modify or vary those details.

Those who opposed the motion denied the accuracy of the precedents alluded to by the gentlemen on the other side; and contended that all similar acts to the present had been revived in a similar style; that this had been invariably and frequently the case; they professed themselves astonished at hearing it said that the present course pursued was unfair; if unfair, gentlemen had themselves set the example; an example set in every deliberative body in the world, practised in the British Parliament, and, it was believed, in every body where the parliamentary mode of transacting business was adopted; nor was it believed that it precluded any proposition of amendment: as to salaries, it was deemed correct to continue them, without alteration, as they had for several years stood, and as they had been fixed by the gentlemen who now opposed the bill. If there was any disposition to vary them, the objections of gentlemen might apply. With respect to the compensation allowed to the Attorney General, it was the same with that which had been permanently fixed; an additional compensation had been allowed him for prosecuting claims under the British Treaty, but that sum was not included in the salary allowed in the bill; that, as to the imputation attempted to be fixed, of a disposition to conceal from the people the effects of this bill, it was absurd, as the people were well acquainted with the details of the law to which this bill referred, and no misapprehension could take place, except from intentional deception.

The amendment of Mr. SMITH was lost—yeas 37, nays 46, as follows:

FRIDAY, March 26.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, who were instructed, on the fifteenth instant, "to inquire whether any further compensation than is already provided by law, ought to be made to the Commissioners of the Direct Tax or any of them," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act for the rebuilding the light-house on Gunnet Point, at the entrance of Plymouth harbor; for rebuilding the light-house at the eastern end of Newcastle Island; for erecting a light-house on Lynde's Point, and for other purposes: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said amendments, together with the bill, be committed to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, it was Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency or in expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duties, in all cases, which have accrued, or may accrue, on spirits distilled, and on stills, within the United States, upon satisfactory proof being made to the said Secretary, that such stills, or distilling materials, have been accidentally destroyed by fire, rendered useless by an inundation of water, or other unavoidable casualty; and that the said committee have leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to retain a further sum on drawbacks for the expenses incident to the allowance and payment thereof, and in lieu of stamp duties on debentures;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill with an amendment which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriation for defraying the expense of a negotiation with the British Government to ascertain the boundary line between the United States and Upper Canada;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the report of a select committee for admitting the Northwestern Territory as a State into the Union.

Without proceeding to the discussion of the report, the Committee, rose in consequence of an intimation made by Mr. HASTINGS, that Mr. FEARING, the Delegate of the Northwestern Territory, was absent from indisposition, and that it was his wish to be present when the report was discussed.

Upon motion of Mr. DAVIS, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill respecting the location of military land warrants.

Mr. DAVIS moved an amendment restricting the right of location to original holders of warrants; lost without a division.

Several amendments were made, affecting the details of the bill; when the Committee rose, and some of the amendments were agreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. S. SMITH presented a petition from the citizens of Washington, praying that such a system of internal government, or police, may be adopted, as Congress shall see fit.—Referred to the Territorial Committee.

SALARIES OF OFFICERS.

An engrossed bill to continue in force an act, entitled "An act to augment the salaries of certain officers therein mentioned," passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, was read the third time.

Mr. DAWSON.—I voted against the law of 1799, which increased the salaries of certain officers of our Government, and I propose now to vote for that bill which continues the augmentation. I will state to this House the reasons for these my votes, in a concise manner; for, sir, on this and on all occasions, I shall avoid going into arguments which do not bear on the question, and the only effect of which is a waste of our time and of the public money. I will not inquire what is the state in which a gentleman ought to live, and what are the expenses attendant thereon; I will not inquire whether all or any of our officers do live in that state. These, sir, are questions which we are not in duty bound to examine.

The duties of our public officers, and a proper compensation for services, are the only questions which it belongs to us to examine.

Sir, it must be remembered by you, and by every gentleman of this House, and especially by those who were members in 1799, what was our situation at that time; we were constantly told that we were threatened with a foreign war, and were called on to make exertions to meet the danger. Every means in our power were resorted to: armies were raised, and fleets set on float; taxes of various kinds were imposed to meet these expenses, and individuals were invited to make sacrifices; loans at eight per cent. were negotiated, and voluntary contributions were solicited. At a time like that, and under such circumstances, I did think it unjust, I did think it impolitic, to raise the salaries of any set of men; and it was for this reason, and for this chiefly, that I voted against the augmentation; for, permit me here to observe, that while I am an advocate for putting down all useless and expensive offices, my decided opinion ever has been, that we should pay well those we do retain. This, in my judgment, is right; it is just; I believe it to be politic, and I am sure it is sound republicanism.

Our situation is different now from what it was in 1799; none of the causes which I have mentioned do now exist, and it is for that reason, in part, that I shall vote now differently from what I did at that time.

There are other reasons, sir, in forming an opinion on the question now before us—the knowledge of facts which every gentleman must possess, and his own experience thereon must furnish the best data, and assist his judgment more than any observations which can be made on this floor. Every gentleman must know what are the official duties of our public officers, and every gentleman must feel what are the expenses of living at this place, and from thence what is a proper compensation.

I believe, sir, that most gentlemen will unite with me in saying, that those who inform us that the expenses of living are less than they were in 1799; that they are less in Washington than they were in Philadelphia, are woefully mistaken; experience has taught to me the contrary, and if it has not to other gentlemen, I congratulate them thereon.

Sir, there is one consideration which has not been mentioned, which, although not conclusive, I own has some weight with me. When these gentlemen, some of them at least, came into office, these were the salaries then established; they had reason to conclude they would be continued, except there was good reasons to the contrary. None, sir, do exist; and while no attempt is made to raise salaries, according to the constant practice heretofore, while the expenses are at least equal to what they ever were, and the inconveniences of living greater, I do think it would be unjust now to diminish them.

For these reasons, I shall vote for leaving the salaries as they now are, although I voted against the increase in 1799, under the then situation of the country.

Mr. GODDARD.—I did not think of rising to-day, nor should I now rise but for the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia. I have no necessity for making an apology to the House for any apparent inconsistency of vote on this occasion, as I have never before voted on the subject, not having had, when the bill alluded to passed, the honor of a seat on this floor. To me, however, the reasons of the honorable gentleman appear very inconclusive. He says that, in 1799, such was the situation of the country, that every citizen was called upon to make a sacrifice of his personal interests. But if the situation of the country was at that period such as called for sacrifices, was it not also such as required the incurring additional expenses and new debts; and is not our present situation such as requires a payment of the debts then contracted?

The gentleman has also observed, that those in office accepted their places under an expectation that the old salaries would be continued. Strange! Did they not know that the law fixing those salaries was limited in its duration? They cannot, therefore, with any appearance of justice, say that the good faith of the Government is pledged to continue those salaries. I apprehend, on the contrary, they had good reason to expect they would be discontinued, because these very gentlemen had declared to the nation that the expenses of the Government had been profuse; that the salaries of public officers had been too high, and they ought to have calculated that the system of economy they are for applying to others would also be extended to them.

The other reason assigned by the gentleman—the present increased expense of living—is not correct. Whatever the present expenses may be, it is not probable that the expenses for the ensuing two or three years will be so great as those which succeeded the passage of the law proposed to be re-enacted. The greatest part of the European world was then at war—now there is peace; and it may rationally be expected that there will be a gradual appreciation of money, and that the price of articles of consumption and rents will fall. I do not believe that all the salaries are too high; but I do believe that some are, and that the proportion between them is not correct. For these reasons I am compelled to vote against the whole bill.

Mr. SMILIE.—The yeas and nays are called for by gentlemen, and I am glad of it. I have no diffidence to record my opinion. I am happy that, in my vote on this occasion, I shall not be obliged to depart from the principle on which I have always acted, viz: that it is beneficial to the community that the officers of Government should be supported in a reputable manner. I never deviated from this principle, either in the Legislature of Pennsylvania, or in Congress, excepting in one instance, for which I can easily account. Nor have I ever varied my vote in consequence of any particular person being in office; for I have always considered the emoluments allowed as attached to the office and not to the officer. The case to which I allude is the compensation given to the judges last year. I voted for a smaller one than that which obtained. But as I was adverse to the establishment, and thought it would soon be set aside, I do not think the vote given on that occasion a deviation from the principle.

I believe it is good policy, in a republican government, so to support your public officers, as to command the first talents in the country. Many of the officers, whose salaries are fixed in the bill, are of this character, and on whose talents depend, in a great degree, the honor of the Government. I believe salaries ought to be neither so high as to make the fortune of the officer, or so low as to disable an individual from living comfortably. This is the golden mean.

I am not a little surprised, Mr. Speaker, to see how the sentiments of gentlemen vary with circumstances. We had some time since before us a bill for reducing the compensations of certain collectors of ports. I know that, on that occasion, many members were in favor of reducing some of the compensations; but I do not recollect that any member was for reducing the compensation of those collectors who received within $5,000. And yet now we find gentlemen opposing the same allowance to these high and respectable officers.

I believe this measure will prove perfectly agreeable to the people, and that it will be approved by their good sense. Much has been said about the expenses of living, and some gentlemen have said those expenses have not increased. But I have only to appeal to themselves to know whether the expenses of living here are not greater than in Philadelphia. For my part I have experienced a considerable increase, and I have no reason to infer that other gentlemen have not felt the same increase.

Mr. T. MORRIS.—I shall vote against the bill, not because I object to the greater part of the salaries, but because it is so drawn as not to enable us to discriminate respecting the several salaries, being obliged to vote in lump for or against the whole of it. It is not material to me whether the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Dawson) has acted consistently or not. Be that as it may, I must act from my own conviction. I am desirous of making a necessary and proper provision for our public officers. I would not even deny to the present Secretary of the Treasury the additional allowance of this bill, because, when on this floor, he denied it to his predecessor. To the salary of the Secretary of the Navy I would be glad to make an addition, because I believe that his duties are as laborious as those of the other Secretaries. As to the expense of living, I do not believe it is comparatively so great to the officers provided for in this bill as to us, as they make arrangements for the whole year.

Mr. ALSTON.—The very reason which will induce the gentleman last up, from New York, (Mr. T. MORRIS,) to give his vote against the passage of the bill upon the table, is the reason which induces me to give it my support and assent. For if the salary of any one of the officers which that bill contemplates the continuing in force, was to be changed or lessened, I would most assuredly vote against the whole bill. I have heard no objection, specifically made, to any one of the salaries, except that of the Attorney General, and if even an alteration had been made in his salary from what had been heretofore established by law, I should give my negative to the bill.

The uniform practice of reviving and continuing old laws in force for a longer time, ever since the establishment of the present Government, has been the very course now pursued by the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, who reported this bill.

I can see no reason why the present officers of Government should not receive the same compensation that had heretofore been allowed to others. I really believe that if gentlemen were to go into an investigation of the salary of every officer which it was proposed to continue in force, that they would be satisfied that a saving could not be made worth the detail of a bill, and that if the alteration which gentlemen contended for, had been made in the form of the bill, and the smallest alteration had been made in the salary of any one of the officers from that from which they had heretofore been accustomed to receive, it would have been, in my opinion, a sufficient cause to justify a rejection of the bill. I, therefore, hope the bill may be permitted to pass in its present form.

Mr. TALLMADGE.—I am against the passage of the bill, because I think the form of it improper, and because I do not believe that the reasons now exist which formerly induced the Legislature to pass the law now proposed to be revived. My first objection arises from the rejection of every amendment that has been offered. Had the amendments prevailed, I should have voted for the great outlines of the bill. I am a friend to liberal salaries; but inasmuch as we are prevented from apportioning the salaries, I am against the whole bill.

H. OF R.

Salaries of Officers.

MARCH, 1802.

With respect to my second objection, I must remark that the old salaries were fixed on war prices; and this was the reason why the Legislature limited the duration of the old law to three years, expecting that, by the removal of the seat of Government, and the termination of the war, a reduction in the expenses of living would take place. I cannot agree that the expenses here are greater than in Philadelphia. But, provisions and labor are certainly lower here than there, and the effects of peace will make them still lower. I will not say that I shall be influenced to vote against the bill because one of the officers voted against the augmentation. Such prejudices shall have no influence with me. I have made these remarks because I am unwilling that my vote should go abroad without my reasons against the bill. If gentlemen had given us an opportunity to vary the compensation, I will not say that I would not have finally assented to the bill; and if the bill had been detailed, and a majority of the House had agreed to all its parts as it now stands, I might even then have assented to it. But under existing circumstances I cannot.

Mr. BACON.—Having, heretofore, expressed my own sentiments on the subject of salaries and compensations for public services in general, in a Government like ours, I should not have attempted to say anything further on the question had it not been from a consideration of the manner in which the resolution has been treated, which I had the honor yesterday to lay before the House. Although that resolution has been committed to a special committee, yet, from the manner in which it has been treated by gentlemen on both sides, and in all parts of the House, it seems to be apparent that there exists almost a unanimous determination not to make any reduction from our own pay.

I conceive it to be highly important, not only that legislative bodies should act, but that they should appear to act with uniformity. And in nothing is this uniformity of conduct more important than in the apportionment of compensations for services among the various descriptions of men who perform them. The appearance of partiality in the Legislature, especially in their own favor, is peculiarly odious; and in proportion as it is odious, it is hurtful to the Government.

No evidence has yet been adduced to show that the present apportionment of salaries and compensations is not equal and just. If it is not, who but former majorities were responsible for any inequalities that may exist? The present apportionment is the result of actual experiment, which is said to be the best evidence with respect to propriety of conduct in the management of human affairs.

At the commencement of the Government, the pay of the members of Congress was set the same as it now stands. The salaries of those civil officers which are named in the present bill, were then set considerably lower than what they now are. The establishment of salaries and compensations which was first made, neither was, nor could be, any other than an establishment of experiment. It was found by experience, after several years practice, that the apportionment was unequal; that the payment of the Senators and Representatives was out of proportion to that of the officers named in the bill. Our predecessors, therefore, who were then in the majority, increased the salaries of the latter, while they permitted their own pay to remain as it was first established. This, it must be presumed, was found to be in fact the case, unless we conclude that the Congress at that time established a system of favoritism, the most distant idea of which may not be indulged.

It has been, and still is, a prevailing opinion with me, that in a Government like ours, the salaries and compensations established by law are generally too high, and I sincerely wish that they might be uniformly reduced. At the same time, I cannot feel myself justified in giving my vote to reduce the compensation of others, while there appears to be no disposition to lower our own. This, in my opinion, would indicate an undue regard to our own private interest, and give occasion to our adversaries to speak reproachfully of us.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—I will state but a single fact. I have heard only one salary objected to by gentlemen as too high, viz: that of the Attorney General. They have informed the House that the annual allowance of six hundred dollars has been made that officer in consideration of services rendered under the British Treaty. It is true that sum was allowed in 1797. At that time the salary was $2,000. In 1799, when the law, now proposed to be revived, was passed, the salary was fixed at $3,000. The then Attorney General, and the present Attorney General, both drew from that time $3,600. But the operations under the sixth article of the British Treaty must now cease, and of course the additional six hundred dollars must also cease; the salary will hereafter stand as fixed by the act of 1799, and there can exist no reason, in consequence of a diminution of services arising from the termination of the operations of the sixth article of the treaty, for a diminution of the fixed salary.

Mr. ELMER said, he had thought the amendment offered proper, but as it had not been carried, he would pursue a different line of conduct from that pursued by the gentleman from Connecticut. Though he might not be of opinion that there was an exact proportion preserved in the compensations made to the several officers, yet as he was satisfied with the general provisions of the bill, he would vote for it.

Mr. CLAIBORNE declared himself in favor, and Mr. HASTINGS against the passage of the bill; when the question was taken by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 50, nays 22, as follows:

Resolved, That the title be, "An act to revive and continue in force, an act, entitled 'An act to augment the salaries of the officers therein mentioned,'" passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine.

The said bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table; and, together with the amendments agreed to, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

SATURDAY, March 27.

An engrossed bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen," was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to retain a further sum on drawbacks for the expenses incident to the allowance and payment thereof, and in lieu of stamp duties on debentures," was read the third time: Whereupon, Ordered, That the farther consideration of the said bill be postponed until Monday next.

A memorial of sundry merchants of the town of Portsmouth, and its vicinity, in the State of New Hampshire, was presented to the House and read, praying relief in the case of depredations committed on vessels and cargoes of the memorialists, while in pursuit of their lawful commerce, by the privateers of the French Republic, during the late European war.—Referred.

A petition of the Mayor, Recorder, Aldermen, and Common Council, of the Corporation of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will empower the said Corporation to lay a tax on landed property within the said town, and its additions, for corporate purposes.—Referred.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making a partial appropriation for the support of Government during the year one thousand eight hundred and two; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House, accordingly, went into the said committee; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported the bill without amendment, and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the amendatory bill for the relief of Isaac Zane; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported the bill without amendment, and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill further to alter and establish certain post roads; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were read.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be recommitted to Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. ARCHER, Mr. NEW, Mr. BOUDE, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. WALKER, and Mr. LEMUEL WILLIAMS.

MONDAY, March 29.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Isaac Zane was read the third time and passed.

Mr. DAVENPORT, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, presented a bill to regulate and fix the compensations of the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a statement by the Marshal of Columbia, of the condition, unavoidably distressing, of the persons committed to his custody on civil or criminal process, and the urgency for some legislative provisions for their relief. The Message and the papers accompanying the same were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed on the eighth of December last, "to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia."

The House proceeded to consider, at the Clerk's table, the report of the committee of the fourteenth of December last, on the petition of James M'Cashen and others, referred on the eighth of the same month: Whereupon,

Resolved, That those persons who purchased lands of John Cleves Symmes, prior to the first of January, one thousand eight hundred, ought to have further time allowed them to pay the money, than is allowed by the act of Congress, of the third of March, one thousand eight hundred and one.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. DAVIS, Mr. HOGG, and Mr. FEARING, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the better security of public money and property in the hands of public officers and agents;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

An engrossed bill, making a partial appropriation for the support of Government, during the year 1802, was read the third time and passed.

Previous to its passage, conversation took place respecting an alleged looseness of appropriation. This objection was made by Mr. GRISWOLD, and supported by Mr. DANA, who were of opinion that the sum in the bill should be more specifically appropriated.

The objection was repelled by Messrs. MILLEDGE, GILES, ELMENDORF, RANDOLPH, and ALSTON, who contended that the objection did not apply, and that no inconvenience could arise from a partial appropriation made in the bill and contemplated for a definitive object.

A motion made to recommit the bill was lost; when the bill passed—years 45.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The order of the day was called for on the bill respecting the government for the District of Columbia.

Mr. T. MORRIS moved to postpone the consideration of the bill till the 4th Monday of November next.

Mr. MORRIS made this motion from a conviction that the provisions of the bill were disagreeable to a great majority of the inhabitants. From this circumstance it had been his opinion that the bill would have been suffered to sleep.

Mr. NICHOLSON seconded the motion.

Mr. BACON asked gentlemen to assign some specific reasons for the motion.

Mr. NICHOLSON said his specific reason for a postponement was his dislike to the system laid down in the bill. He believed that system, if established, would prove very oppressive, from the great expense attending it. Another reason with him was that the inhabitants of the District are very generally averse to it. Should the House go into a Committee, he had no doubt, but that after consuming days, the bill would be finally rejected. The question of postponement would determine the sense of the House respecting a Territorial Legislature.

Mr. DENNIS said he had early taken up the opinion, that it would be as well for the interest of the United States as for that of the District, to establish a system of local authority. But as no person could be more opposed to the provisions of the bill than he was, and finding almost the whole of the inhabitants against it, he should vote for the postponement; though the principle which the House was in favor of adopting might perhaps be best settled by a motion to strike out the first section of the bill. Should the House take up the bill, he was prepared to move a number of amendments, one of which would be for incorporating a Senatorial branch. Believing that the present bill would be rejected, and that it was necessary for Congress immediately to do something in relation to the affairs of the territory, he would vote in favor of the motion.

The question of postponement was put and carried—years 42.

When on motion of Mr. DENNIS, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the several subjects connected with the Territory, and reference made thereof to a select committee.

DRAWBACKS.

The House proceeded to the further consideration of an engrossed bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to retain a further sum on drawbacks for the expenses incident to the allowance and payment thereof, and in lieu of stamp duties on debentures;" which was read the third time on Saturday last: Whereupon, a motion was made, and the question being put, that the said bill be recommitted to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, it passed in the negative.

And then the main question being taken, that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative, yeas 38, nays 32, as follows:

TUESDAY, March 30.

A petition of sundry members of the Roman Catholic Church, residing in the city of Washington, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will grant them the privilege of raising by the means of one or more lotteries, a sufficient sum of money to build and endow a church in the said city, for the accommodation and benefit of the petitioners, and of the religious society to which they are attached.—Referred.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred, on the twenty-sixth instant, the bill, entitled "An act for the rebuilding the light house on Gurnet Point, at the entrance of Plymouth harbor: for rebuilding the light-house at the eastern end of New Castle Island; for erecting a light house on Lynde's Point, and for other purposes," and the amendments proposed by the Senate thereto, made a report there on; which was read, and together with the said amendments of the Senate, ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting an estimate of expenditures for the Army of the United States, during the year one thousand eight hundred and two. The Message and papers transmitted therewith were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the better security of public money and property in the hands of public officers and agents," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution :

Resolved, That, in case of the death of a member of the House of Representatives at the seat of Government, while Congress is in session, the expenses accruing, in conformity to an order of the House, made to testify their respect for the deceased member, shall be paid out of the contingent funds of the House, and not out of his wages for travelling home, as is now allowed by law :

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to Mr. DAVIS, Mr. LEWIS R. MORRIS, and Mr. NICHOLSON, to consider and report thereon to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing a statement of the application of the appropriations made by Congress for clerk hire in his Department, specifying the names of the persons, and the salaries allowed to each, for the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, one thousand eight hundred, and one thousand eight hundred and one, in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the twenty-fifth instant; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolutions of a select committee, respecting the admission of the Northwestern Territory, as a State, into the Union.

[As the report of the select committee is necessary to elucidate the several points raised in the discussion, it is presented entire, as follows :

That it appears to your committee, that the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, between the original States and the people and States within the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, contains the following stipulation, that : "Whenever any of the said States shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted by its Delegates into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: Provided the constitution and government, so to be formed, shall be Republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the Confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period, and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in any State than sixty thousand." It also appears from the census of the inhabitants within the Eastern division of the said Territory, taken more than twelve months since, in virtue of a law of the United States for that purpose, that there were then in the said Eastern division, 45,365 inhabitants, from which are to be deducted 3,400 inhabitants living north and west of the line proposed for the boundary of the said Eastern division.

It appears that, since the time of taking the census, the United States have sold 553,995 acres of land within the Eastern division of the Territory, amounting in value to $1,147,585. It also appears from the best information to be procured, that, in the year 1794, the number of inhabitants within the present Northern division of the Territory, did not exceed six thousand. From the progressive increase of population since that period, and the sale of lands recently made by the United States, it is probable that, before all the measures necessary for the formation of a constitution, putting into operation a State government, and its admission into the Union, can be effectuated, the number of inhabitants will amount to sixty thousand, the number requisite, according to the terms of the ordinance, for giving them an absolute right of forming a constitution and State government for themselves, as well as the absolute right of admission into the Union, upon the same footing with the original States in all respects whatever.

It also appears to your committee, that great and increasing disquietudes exist among the inhabitants within the Territory from various occasions, and particularly in consequence of the act lately passed for altering the boundary lines of the States in the Territory, as established by the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787.

Your committee, from a due consideration of all the foregoing circumstances, are of opinion that it is at this time expedient to make provision for enabling the people within the Eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, to form for themselves a constitution and State government, to be admitted into the Union upon the same footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and that such admission, at this time, is consistent with the general interests of the Confederacy, according to the said ordinance, although the number of inhabitants may not amount to sixty thousand. The committee, therefore, recommend the following resolutions :

1st. Resolved, That provision ought, at this time, to be made by law, for enabling the inhabitants of the Eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form for themselves a constitution and State government, provided the same be republican, and not repugnant to the ordinance for the government of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, of the 13th of July, 1787, nor repugnant to the Constitution of the United States; and also for the admission of such State, when the government thereof shall be formed, into the Union, upon the same footing with the original States in all respects whatever, by the name of the State of —.

2d. Resolved, That the said State of —, ought to consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: Bounded on the east by the Pennsylvania line, running from the territorial line in Lake Erie to the Ohio; on the south by the Ohio to the mouth of the Great Miami; on the west by a line drawn due north from the mouth of the Great Miami aforesaid; and on the north by an east and west line, drawn through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, running east, after intersecting the due north line aforesaid from the mouth of the Great Miami, until it shall intersect Lake Erie or the territorial line, and thence with the same through lake Erie to the Pennsylvania line aforesaid, or place of beginning; provided that Congress shall, at any time hereafter, be at liberty either to attach all the territory lying east of the line, to be drawn due north from the mouth of the Miami aforesaid, to the territorial line, and north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, running east as aforesaid to Lake Erie to the aforesaid State, or dispose of it otherwise, in conformity to the fifth article of the compact between the original States, and the people and States to be formed in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio.

3d. Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for calling a Convention within the Eastern division of the Territory, to be composed of members to be apportioned among the several counties therein, in a ratio of one Representative for every — inhabitants of the said counties, according to the last enumeration of inhabitants thereof; also, for fixing the time, place, and mode of making elections of members to compose such Convention, and the time and place for the meeting of the same; which Convention, when met, shall first determine by a majority of the members present, provided the number present shall be a majority of the whole number chosen, whether it be or be not expedient at that time, to form a constitution and State government for the people within the said Territory, and if it be determined to be expedient, then, in the next place, the Convention shall be authorized to form a constitution and State government, provided the same shall be Republican, and not repugnant to the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, between the original States and the people and States of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, nor repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

4th. Resolved, That, until the next general census shall be taken, the State of — shall be entitled to — Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States.

The committee observe, in the ordinance for ascertaining the mode of disposing of lands in the Western Territory of the 20th of May, 1785, the following section, which, so far as respects the subject of schools, remains unaltered :

"There shall be reserved for the United States; out of every township, the four lots, being numbered 6, 11, 26, 29; and out of every fractional part of a township, so many lots of the same numbers as shall be found thereon, for future sale. There shall be reserved lot No. 16, of every township, for the maintenance of public schools within the said township; also, one-third part of all gold, silver, lead, and copper mines, to be sold, or otherwise disposed as Congress shall hereafter direct."

The committee also observe, in the third and fourth articles of the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, the following stipulations, to wit :

"Art. 3d. Religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools, and the means of education shall forever be encouraged," &c.

"Art. 4th. The Legislatures of those districts, or new States, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers. No tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

The committee, taking into consideration these stipulations, viewing the lands of the United States within the said Territory as an important source of revenue; deeming it also of the highest importance to the stability and permanence of the union of the eastern and western parts of the United States, that the intercourse should, as far as possible, be facilitated; and their interests be liberally and mutually consulted and promoted; are of opinion, that the provisions of the aforesaid articles may be varied for the reciprocal advantage of the United States, and the State of — when formed, and the people thereof; they have, therefore, deemed it proper, in lieu of the said provisions, to offer the following propositions to the Convention of the Eastern State of the said Territory, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection, without any condition or restraint whatever; which, if accepted by the Convention, shall be obligatory upon the United States :

1st. That the section No. 16, in every township sold, or directed to be sold by the United States, shall be granted to the inhabitants of such townships, for the use of schools.

2d. That the six-miles reservation, including the salt springs, commonly called Scioto salt springs, shall be granted to the State of — when formed, for the use of the people thereof; the same to be used under such terms, conditions, and regulations, as the Legislature of the said State shall direct, provided the said Legislature shall never sell, nor lease the same for a longer term than — years.

3d. That one-tenth part of the net proceeds of the lands lying in the said State, hereafter sold by Congress, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making turnpike or other roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, and continued afterwards through the State of —, such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass, provided that the Convention of the State of — shall, on its part, assent, that every and each tract of land sold by Congress, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of ten years, from and after the completion of the payment of the purchase money on such tract, to the United States.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, Feb. 13, 1802.

SIR: I have examined, in consequence of our conversation, the articles of compact which make part of the Territorial ordinance. The more I have reflected on the subject, the more fervently have I been impressed with the importance of making some effectual provisions which may secure to the United States the proceeds of the sales of the Western lands, so far at least as the same may be necessary to discharge the public debt, for which they are solemnly pledged.

That part of the system of taxation, adopted in the Northwestern Territory, which relates to non-resident owners, undoubtedly affects the value of the public lands, and will eventually diminish the amount of sales. Yet, upon due consideration, there is but one provision, which, in my opinion, would be inconsistent with the rights of the United States, as secured by the articles of compact. An attempt, on the part of the Legislature of the Territory or new State, to render lands, sold under the laws of Congress, but for which no patent has yet issued, liable to be sold for non-payment of taxes, would interfere with the regulations adopted by Congress for the "primary disposal of the soil," since, by these, the lands remain mortgaged to the United States, until after complete payment of the purchase money, and, in case of failure thereof, are directed to be sold.

But it does not appear to me that the United States have a right to annex new conditions, not implied in the articles of compact, limiting the Legislative right of taxation of the Territory or new State. The limitations, which they may rightfully impose, are designated by the articles themselves, and these being unalterable unless by common consent, all Legislative powers, which of right pertain to an independent State, must be exercised at the discretion of the Legislature of the new State, unless limited either by the articles or by the Constitution of the United States or of the State. Indeed the United States have no greater right to annex new limitations than the individual State may have to infringe those of the original compact; and I cannot see that this position is in any degree altered by the circumstance of admitting into the Union, in pursuance of an express provision of the articles, a State at an earlier period than that at which it must necessarily be admitted.

The conditions inserted in the fourth article of the compact in relation to that object, and which constitute all that Congress thought at the time necessary to reserve in order to secure to the Union their right to the soil, are: 1st, that the Legislatures of the districts or new States shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by Congress, nor with regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers; 2d, that no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and 3d, that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents. Farther than that Congress cannot demand; and it is on account of the second provision that the district or State Legislature has not a right to tax, or, at least to sell, for non-payment of taxes, the lands on which, although conditionally sold, the United States still retain a lien.

It follows that, if it be in a high degree, as I believe it is, the interest of the United States to obtain some further security against an injurious sale, under the Territorial or State laws, of lands sold by them to individuals; justice not less than policy requires that it should be obtained by common consent. And as it is not to be expected that the new State Legislature should assent to any alterations in their system of taxation which may affect the revenue of the State unless an equivalent is offered which it may be their interest to accept, I would submit the propriety of inserting in the act of admission a clause or clauses to that effect, leaving it altogether optional in the State Convention or Legislature, to accept or reject the same.

The equivalent to be offered must be such as shall not affect the value of the pledge which the public creditors now have by the appropriation of the lands, and as shall be fully acceptable to the State, and, at the same time, prove generally beneficial either in a political or commercial view to the Union at large. From the best view I have been able to take of the subject, the following provisions appear to me fully adequate to answer those several objects, namely:

That, provided that the Convention or Legislature of the State shall assent, that every and each tract of land sold by Congress shall be and remain exempt from any tax raised by or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose, for the term of ten years, from and after the completion of the payment of the purchase money on such tract to the United States, the United States shall on their part agree:

1st. That the section No. 16 in every township sold or directed to be sold by the United States shall be granted to the inhabitants of such township for the use of schools.

2d. That the six-miles reservation, including the salt springs, commonly called the "Scioto salt springs," shall be granted to the new State for the use of the people thereof, the same to be used under such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature of the said State shall direct, provided that the said Legislature shall never sell nor lease the same for a longer time than — years.

3d. That one-tenth part of the net proceeds of the lands lying in said State, hereafter sold by Congress, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied towards laying out and making turnpike or other roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the Ohio, and continued afterwards through the new State; such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the same shall pass.

That such conditions, instead of diminishing, would greatly increase the value of the lands, and therefore of the pledge to the public creditors, and that they would be highly beneficial and acceptable to the people of the new State, cannot be doubted. And they are particularly recommended, as among the most eligible which may be suggested, from the following considerations.

The provision for schools, exclusively of its intrinsic usefulness, made a part of the former ordinance of Congress for the sale of lands; the grant has actually been made in the sale to the Ohio company, and to John C. Symmes; and, although the ordinance be no longer in force, and such a grant be no part of the articles of compact, yet it has always been at least hoped by the inhabitants of the Territory that it would be generally extended.

The grant of the Scioto salt springs, will at present be considered as the most valuable, and alone would, most probably, induce a compliance, on the part of the new State, with the condition proposed by Congress. And if it is considered that at least one-half of the future population of that district will draw their salt from that source, the propriety of preventing the monopoly of that article, falling into the hands of any private individual, can hardly be disputed.

The tenth part of the proceeds of the lands, as it will be coextensive with the sales, will continue to be considered as an equivalent until the sales are completed, and after the present grant might have ceased to operate on the minds of the people of the new State. The roads will be as beneficial to the parts of the Atlantic States, through which they are to pass, and nearly as much to a considerable portion of the Union, as to the Northwestern Territory itself. But a due attention to the particular geographical situation of that Territory and of the adjacent Western districts of the Atlantic States, will not fail to impress you strongly with the importance of that provision, in a political point of view, so far as it will contribute toward cementing the bonds of union between those parts of the United States, whose local interests have been considered as most dissimilar.

I have the honor to be, with sincere respect, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. Mr. GILES, Chairman, &c.

The first resolution being under consideration, Mr. FEARING said he should oppose this resolution, but not on the ground of expediency. As the business had been urged forward hastily, he had not had an opportunity of consulting his constituents, to many of whom he had forwarded the report of the select committee on its being presented. He would, therefore, waive any remarks on the expediency of it until a bill was brought in, in the event of the resolution being agreed to, in the mean time expecting to hear from his constituents. But he was opposed to the resolution on Constitutional principles. He conceived Congress had nothing to do with the arrangements for calling a Convention. It was neither necessary, on general principles, nor under the compact, that the Territory, in order to be admitted into the Union, should form a constitution. By the compact, Congress can give their assent to admit the Territory into the Union before the population amounts to sixty thousand. Their power extends no further. The compact is the supreme law of the land, and is in the nature of a treaty. What it prescribes must be executed; but as to arrangements not made in it, they may or may not be made, and they may be made either by law, or by a constitution, as the Territory may see fit. Can Congress exercise powers given exclusively to the people? He conceived it would be as great an encroachment upon their rights to say they shall meet together in Convention and form a constitution, as it would be to say so to any State in the Union.

Gentlemen may say that this power is given to Congress by the consent of the people. The printed documents accompanying the report, if they mean anything, mean to express the opinion of the people. Among these is the letter of Samuel Findley to T. Worthington. [Mr. F. here quoted the concluding part of the letter.] Now, if this committee at Chillicothe speaks the voice of the Western Territory, the Congress have the right contended for; but this the citizens of other towns and counties will not admit. What example will the adoption of this measure hold out to the people of the Territory? If Congress violate the compact, will not the people of that Territory have an equal right to violate it? He hoped, for these reasons, that Congress would, on their part, preserve it inviolate.

Mr. DAVIS said he was as unwilling as any member on that floor, or as the Delegate from the Territory, to violate the compact; nor did he believe Congress would violate it by adopting the resolutions before them. Surely, to allow to the people of the Territory the liberty to become a State could not be considered as a violation of it. The honorable gentleman says, the Territory may come into the Union with or without a constitution, and yet the ordinance reads that "they shall be at liberty to form a constitution, provided it be republican." It says, therefore, they shall form a constitution on no other ground but its being republican.

When the population of the Territory amounts to sixty thousand, "it shall be admitted into the Union." This obligation is as binding upon Congress to admit, as upon the Territory to be admitted into the Union. Suppose, then, when the Territory shall have reached a population of sixty thousand, it should not consent to become a State. Can it be doubted whether Congress will have power, notwithstanding, to admit them?

But the ordinance says: "Congress shall have power to admit them before their numbers amount to sixty thousand." Before the existence of a certain population, there can be no territorial Legislature. But, suppose Congress thought fit, before those numbers were attained, to admit them, they having by the compact the undisputed right to do so? Thus it appears they could admit them when there was no Legislature in the Territory, to give its assent, which demonstrates that the assent of the Legislature is not necessary.

We are not, however, for doing anything compulsory. We only propose doing that, which, unless confirmed by the people of the Territory, will amount to nothing. Congress can only prescribe terms by which itself will be governed; nor can I see that the privilege of admission into the Union can infringe in the least the rights of the Territory. I am in favor of admitting the Territory into the Union for the reasons detailed in the report, and particularly from the general dissatisfaction which prevails under their present form of Government. We all know the great dissatisfaction that has existed in all the territorial governments, and I believe that a very great dissatisfaction exists in this Territory.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—This is not the first project started this session that goes to a consolidation and destruction of all the States. That this will be the effect of the present measure cannot, I think, be denied. What is the condition of the people of the Territory? They are not, it is true, as to every purpose of government, a State. But they have a complete Legislature, as fully competent to legislate as the Legislature of Maryland, or any other Legislature in the Union. They are fully competent to the making of all laws to regulate the internal concerns of the government. Now these resolutions go to interfere with these internal concerns, and to regulate them by a national law. When the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. DAVIS) undertakes to decide the terms on which the members of the Convention shall be chosen, I ask him where is the power? Are not the powers of the Territorial Legislature as full as those of the Legislature of Maryland; and have not we as good a right to interfere with the State concerns of Maryland as to interfere with the concerns of the Territory? I call, then, upon gentlemen to say, whether they are willing to sanction a principle that goes to the length of consolidation of these States? We have the determination of the territorial Legislature that it is not desirous of forming a Constitution at this time. If, then, we go abreast of the determination of one Legislature, why not of another? If we go abreast of that of the Northwestern Territory, why not go abreast of that of Maryland? If, too, you may legislate for these people before they are admitted into the Union, you may also legislate for them afterwards; and if you do not like the constitution they now form, you may pass a law for another Convention. By a parity of reasoning you may force down a constitution on Connecticut, and say that as that State has no written constitution, you will give her one. Acting under such a principle, there can be no stopping, you may go any length. If you interfere with the authority vested in others, you may proceed any length, and that consolidation of the States, which some gentlemen wish to see effected, will be accomplished. I am, therefore, on Constitutional ground, opposed to these resolutions. I do not inquire into the expediency of the measure. Let the people judge of this. If they wish a constitution, I have no objection; but I would not impose upon them what the compact does not warrant, nor would I impose arbitrary power any more upon them than upon any of the States.

The report says:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for calling a Convention within the Eastern division of the Territory, to be composed of members to be apportioned among the several counties therein, in a ratio of one Representative for every — inhabitants of the said counties, according to the last enumeration of inhabitants thereof," &c.

I understand the project is to portion out the people into districts to choose members of Convention; and I say, as you have not the power, it is arbitrary and unjust.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—I am surprised at the ground taken by the gentleman from Connecticut. I never doubted the authority of Congress to admit new States into the Union, as the Constitution expressly declares that new States may be admitted. That gentleman says, this measure tends to a consolidation of the State governments. I do not know what idea he entertains of consolidation, nor do I know to whom he alludes, when he says a consolidation of the States is the wish of certain members of this House. I can only say, that I have heard gentlemen on this floor express their universal abhorrence of this event, because they knew that, if the States are destroyed, we shall have a consolidated instead of a confederated Government.

The gentleman says that, if we pass these resolutions and authorize the people of the Territory to form a government for themselves and come into the Union, we might as well say the same thing to the people of Maryland. Was there ever a more absurd doctrine that States, acknowledged to be sovereign and independent, should be compared to a Territory dependant upon the General Government? I ask if Maryland can be compared to the Territory? Have both similar powers? What power has Maryland? The power of altering her form of government whenever she sees fit, so that she does not change it for an anti-republican form of government. Have the people of the Territory the same right? No; because the Governor and Legislative Council are appointed by the President, and have the power of preventing the passage of all laws. Hence the powers are different, and essentially dissimilar. Congress have passed an ordinance, which is in some measure the constitution of the Territory, and from which they cannot deviate.

The gentleman from Connecticut calls these resolutions an interference with the Legislative rights of the Territory, and asks, if the Territory has not as complete Legislative rights as any of the other States? I answer that, in some respects they have, and in other respects they have not. They have not the right of saying how their Governor shall be elected, or their judges appointed, as in Maryland; the Governor and judges are, in fact, prescribed them by the United States.

If these resolutions are passed, they do not interfere with the rights of the citizens of the Territory; they do not say they shall come into the Union, or that they shall form a constitution; they only lead to the passage of a law enabling them to do that which, it is allowed on all hands, they have themselves a right at present to do.

The gentleman says, we ought to wait for the approbation of the Legislature. But if the government of the Territory were to remain organized as at this time, I believe we might wait till doomsday, before we obtained their approbation. Have we not seen a law passed by that Legislature, not for bettering the condition of the people, but for dividing them in such a manner as to protract their admission into the Union, and thus enabling the present Governor and judges to hold their offices after the Territory, from its population, ought to become a State? I ask if, under these circumstances, it is to be expected that the Governor and Legislative Council would consent to the application of the petitioners? The thing is impossible. And it will appear that they have taken every step in their power to prevent the people from enjoying the rights of citizens as attached to a State. By subdividing the Territory, they have reduced their numbers so low that there is not a probability that they would come into the Union for ten years to come. And yet we are told the people ought to wait until the government of the Territory applies for admission into the Union. The Governor and Legislative Council are not chosen by the people, who may therefore earnestly desire an admission, as long as they please, without the power to obtain it. This scheme, in fact, puts everything in the power of the President of the United States.

The people, to the number of several thousands, have expressed a wish to be admitted into the Union. Who makes objection? It is merely made by the Delegate from the Territory, who tells you he has no instructions, and yet he is the only man in the whole Territory that opposes the wishes of the whole people of the Territory. If we are not to attend to the voice of the people, and are to wait for Legislative interposition, we may wait until the present Governor's time expires, and, until the President shall choose a better man; by better man, I mean no other allusion than to the fact that the present Governor has declared that it is not his wish that the Territory should be admitted into the Union. Thus you would put it in the power of the President to keep this district under a Territorial government as long as he pleases. We ought not, then, to run the chance of the President's appointing a particular man to the office of Governor; but at once to regard and conform to the reasonable wishes of the people of the Territory.

I repeat it, that, in these resolutions, there is nothing compulsory. If the people of the Territory do not think proper to form a State government there is no compulsion to do it.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS said, he had hoped the gentleman from the Territory, when he was up, would have given some information to the Committee, in answer to the inquiry made by the member from Pennsylvania (Mr. GREGG) as to the petitions on this subject. But he had thought proper to avoid it, for what purpose he knew not, unless from a conviction that their objects and numbers would militate against his wishes; this, he presumed, was the true reason, which forbid a compliance. He said he had, in haste, attempted a selection of those petitions, but really found them so numerous as to render it perhaps improper to attempt to detail them to the Committee at this time. He would only state that, since Congress had rejected the law passed by the territorial Legislature for dividing it, more than twenty petitions had come on, signed by thousands of the inhabitants, and many by select men chosen for the express purpose by the people, and these, too, from almost every county in the Territory, praying for a State government, and stating their grievances in the most respectful terms. He said there were also a much greater number against the law which he had just mentioned, which also had the same object in view, that of a State government; as it was known the effects of this law and its objects were to prevent a State government, by cutting them into small sections and dividing the population, so that their numbers in no part should be sufficient to entitle them to a State government.

Mr. W. said, from every information he could obtain, he had no doubt but that nine-tenths of those people were in favor and wished a State government. Nay, there was not a solitary petitioner to the contrary, except the member from the Territory, notwithstanding his great desire to defeat this measure, by opposing the will of the people whom he ought to represent on this floor. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) has started a Constitutional objection to this resolution, to enforce which he had supposed it to be intended for one of the States now in the Union, and asking, whether Congress have the right to direct the State of Maryland to call a Convention, &c. ? No. Mr. W. said, he could see no analogy between the case put by him, and the present one before the Committee. The State of Maryland was an independent State, and was so before the formation of the Federal Government, and had her constitution independently of the General Government, which she as well as every other State, has a right to alter at discretion, and many of which have done so, since the present Government. But what is the situation of this Territory? Here is a tract of country belonging to the United States, which they wish to settle; they form for the people who shall go there, a temporary government, and at the same time, agree that, whenever this tract of country shall have a certain number of inhabitants, to wit: sixty thousand, it shall be admitted into the Union; and, if consistent with the general interest, such admission may be sooner, and when there may be a less number of inhabitants than sixty thousand.

It is to be observed that the term of admission is two-fold; first, when they have the number sixty thousand, the right of admission is absolute; in the second, when they have not the numbers, it is discretionary with Congress; but this discretion, he presumed, ought to depend on the expediency and policy of the measure; but, surely, gentlemen will not contend there is any Constitutional impediment in the way, if gentlemen will attend to the ordinance, and the Constitution giving the right to Congress to form and lay out new States.

The same gentleman (Mr. G.) has stated, as a further objection, that this application for admission into the Union, does not come through a proper channel, by which we are to know the public will, and says it ought to have come through the Legislature of the Territory; that this is the source from which we are to look for an expression of the public will; and again refers to what ought to be an application from any of the States.

Mr. W. said, although he admitted it was not common for that gentleman and himself to agree, as to what ought to be an expression of the public will, yet, on the present occasion, for argument sake, he would agree to the case stated, that we should regard the act of the Legislature of any of the States as expressive of the will of the people in such State, and still it does not bear on the present case. In all the States, said he, the people have a government of their own choice, which themselves have formed; they are represented by those of their own appointment, and who are responsible to the people at short and stated periods by elections; hence we may infer that, in their public acts, the interest as well as opinions of the people are consulted. But, how is it as to this Territory? Have the people a government of their own choice? Are not two branches of the Legislature, the Governor and Council, appointed by the President of the United States, independent of the people, and under no kind of responsibility to them? Even the salary which the Governor receives is paid by the United States. The Representatives are chosen by the people, but by a very limited suffrage indeed; and the Governor, it is to be observed, has an unqualified negative on all the acts of the Legislature, with a power to dissolve, and prorogue them, &c.

Mr. W. said, this being the situation of those people as to a government, he would venture to say that, if Congress disregarded the direct application of the people for a State government, and wait for a Legislative application, that it never would be made; for it is not to be supposed that those men who have the power to nullify every act of the people, through their Legislature, will ever sanction one which is calculated to put an end to their political existence. Nay, said Mr. W., have we not had, before the present session, a memorial, for example, which proves what those men would do had they the power? Did they not pass a law, which this Congress almost unanimously rejected, in palpable violation of their constitution (the ordinance) and which was intended solely to prevent the people from obtaining a State government, by dividing the population in such manner as that their numbers would not entitle them to a government? When, said he, men will so far disregard their oaths and the interest of the people, as to do acts of this kind, what may we not expect them to do, in order to promote their own private views? Thus, he said, we might fairly conclude, that neither from the nature nor practice of this Government, was an expression of the public will to be expected through its Legislature, but the reverse. But, it is asked, why force these people into a State government? This is not a fact, as relates to the petitioning of the people, or the report of the Committee; if gentlemen will attend to the report, they will find it is left optional with those people, when in Convention, to say whether they will go into a State Convention, or not. Where is the impropriety? It only gives them a fair opportunity of exercising those rights, which belong to every people, and which it seems strange any should be disposed to deny them. It also will afford a fair opportunity of trying the validity of the assertion, made on this floor, that these people do not wish a State government; should that be the case, no doubt they will act accordingly, and all parties be satisfied in the will of the majority.

Mr. W. said, these territorial governments, which the United States have been obliged to resort to, were arbitrary at best, and ought not to exist longer than they could with propriety be dispensed with. They were, he said, opposed to the genius of the people of this country, and in direct hostility with their notions of government; of course we were not to suppose they would be satisfied under them any longer than they may be incapable of self-government. He said he did not wish to take up the time of the Committee in detailing the powers of this Government, and the abuse of them by the government of the Territory, to prove what he had just stated, because he believed they were well known to every member of the Committee, which was quite sufficient for the present purpose.

Mr. W. said, he believed it to be a degree of justice due to those people, as well as sound policy in the General Government, to admit them into the Union at this time. The people resident in the Territory had emigrated from the different States in the Union, where they had been in the habit of enjoying the benefits of a free form of government; they no doubt looked forward to a very short period, at which they might again enjoy the same as pointed out by the ordinance, to effect which, it was natural to suppose they had invited a migration to their country; but if the doctrine now contended for in opposition, shall prevail in this House, all their hopes are blasted. Ought we not, said he, to have a fellow-feeling for those people? Let any gentleman make their situation his own, and will he longer hesitate as to the propriety and justice of the measure? It cannot be doubted but that these people are ripe for self-government; they now have, or will by the time proposed for their admission, the number required by the ordinance, viz: sixty thousand. By a recurrence to the census taken more than a year past, it will be found their numbers were forty-five thousand; since which we are to suppose a great increase of population, for we find that the United States since then have sold more than a half million acres of land within this Territory, for a sum amounting to more than a million of dollars. It is also to be observed that agreeable to the census taken in that country in the year 1794, the number of its inhabitants did not exceed six thousand; thus in about seven years we find an increase in this country of about forty thousand people. They now pay an expense nearly equal to some of the States, to support their government. From this statement of facts, Mr. W. said, by the time proposed for their admission by the report of the Committee there could be no doubt of their absolute admission into the Union under the ordinance.

Mr. W. said he had stated that it would be the policy as well as the interest of the Federal Government to admit this State into the Union; he believed there were many considerations to warrant this opinion. The General Government owned much valuable land in this country which it wished to sell; that it was a source from which much of our revenue is calculated to be drawn. Certainly then to form this country into a State, and the people to have a free government of their own choice, and enjoy their natural and political rights, will contribute more to the settlement and increase of its population, than under the present form of government. The natural consequence will be a demand for our land as well as an increase in its value; but let Congress once show a disposition not to admit them to those rights, or delay them, and the reverse will certainly be the fact; for it is not to be supposed that the people of America will be disposed to go from a free, into an almost arbitrary form of government, or to remain there. Again, the United States pay towards the support of this Territorial government, between four and five thousand dollars annually, which they will be freed from by adopting the proposed measure. Mr. W. said there was one further consideration, which he thought ought to have weight on the present occasion; he confessed it had much weight with him; which was, that the people in this country were extremely dissatisfied with their present government, and particularly its administration; and this dissatisfaction would increase in proportion to their sense of being entitled to, and ripe for a better. He conceived it to be the duty of all Government to make its people as quiet and happy as possible, consistent with the general good, and to effect which it is of primary importance to grant their reasonable requests. In the present case, he could see no way so well calculated effectually to remove this dissatisfaction, as to give them the liberty of forming for themselves a government. That there would be some still dissatisfied, he had no doubt, but who would they be? He supposed those now in power, and their adherents, who hold offices and appointments not derived from the people, but independent of them; this was a natural consequence. It was not to be expected they would ever agree to a change likely to prove unfavorable to their present situation.

H. of R.

Northwestern Territory.

MARCH, 1802.

Mr. W. said he would further remark, that, in admitting the Territory to become a State at this time, certain articles of compact were proposed to the convention to be called for forming a government, which, if agreed to, he thought, must prove highly beneficial to the United States as well as that State; among which was, that the lands of the United States to be sold, should be exempted from taxation by that State for a term of years; those articles, to be sure, they were free to reject; yet, he believed, they would be agreed to, as there was an equivalent tendered on the part of the United States, which would induce acceptance. But, in case Congress disregard the wishes of these people at present and keep them out of the Union, until they shall be admitted under absolute right, we are not to expect any favor but in the same way.

Mr. W. said that, in every point of view in which he had been able to consider this subject, its propriety presented itself to his mind so forcibly, that he could not but be surprised at the opposition of some gentlemen. The people settled a country under an express agreement with the United States, that at a certain period they should be admitted to the rights of a free Government, and form a member of the Union. They now come forward, ask it, and show themselves entitled; and that the present Government you have given them has become oppressive, and incompetent to promote their happiness; yet are they to be told, remain as you are, because a few interested characters among you are not agreed that you shall be free. He concluded by saying, however some members of the Committee might be opposed to the measure, he hoped that there would be found a large majority in favor of it.

Mr. BACON.—These resolutions involve two questions. The first of which respects their constitutionality; and the second, their expediency. With respect to the first question, there appears to me to be no reasonable doubt. By the Constitution, the power of admitting new States into the Union is vested in Congress. The third section of the fourth article says: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union." The mode of admission is left discretionary. The power, then, being vested in Congress, and the mode in which this power may be exercised being determined in that other part of the Constitution, which says, Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof;" if this resolution be necessary to carry the vested power into effect, every objection against the constitutionality of the measure must vanish. Not only the power of admission, but also the power of passing the laws necessary for admission must be granted.

As to the expediency of the measure, we may not be so competent to judge; but by the ordinance we find that, when the Territory shall attain a population of sixty thousand, it shall be admitted as a State into the Union; and that, so far as it may be consistent with the general interests of the Confederation, it shall be admitted earlier. If, then, the admission be consistent with the general interests, Congress having the power to admit, ought to exercise it. For we all know that the possession of liberty is a very desirable thing, and ought to be extended liberally, especially where no injury can arise from it.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—I have long been persuaded that when gentlemen are determined upon any particular measure, they can readily find pretexts for it. The Constitution is brought in to their aid, though the fact is, that Territory existed before the Constitution was formed. The people of the Territory never consented to it; nor are they bound by any part of it which gives more power to the Federal Legislature than it gives by the compact. Their rights, under the compact, cannot be taken away by any provisions of the Constitution, to which they were not a party. I shall, therefore, lay the Constitution totally out of the question.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) and myself, agree in one or two points. We agree that it is competent to Congress to admit the Territory into the Union before it has attained a population of sixty thousand. If this were the sole object of the resolutions, I would agree to them. We agree in another point; that Congress has not the right to impose a convention upon these people without their consent. The question, then, is, whether it is, or is not, the object of these resolutions to impose a convention. Let us turn to the third resolution, which is calculated, in express words, for calling a convention by a law of the United States, and by taking the population of the last census as the basis of representation. If the principle be a sound one, that we have a right to impose a convention upon the people of the Territory, without their consent, how are the opinions of the people on the calling a convention to be obtained? How is their consent to elect Delegates to be obtained? The consent expressed on the face of the petitions before you cannot be said to be a legal consent. How else, then, can such consent be obtained? In no other way, than by an act of the Territorial Legislature, or by going round to every man in the Territory, and obtaining his opinion. If this be left undone until the election for members of the convention, the result will be a partial expression of the public mind. For one man may vote, and another refuse to vote. Thus you may get a partial convention, composed of a few demagogues. I say, therefore, that, however defective the provisions of the compact, you must obtain the consent of the Territorial Legislature, before you take the step of calling a convention.

Believing the inevitable effect of these resolutions will be to impose a convention on the Territory, I am justified in saying they involve a usurpation of power by the United States, of power not belonging to them. If the resolutions amount to anything, they amount to this; if gentlemen will first obtain the consent of the Territory, in a proper mode, though their population does not amount to sixty thousand, I will consent to their admission into the Union. I am disposed to let them act for themselves, to let them divide, or not divide, the Territory into States, as they please; but I am against imposing anything upon them contrary to their will. They are more deeply interested than we are in the establishment of a proper form of government. They, and not we, are to be bound by it. They, then ought, in its establishment, to act for themselves, and not we for them. I contend that such a measure is extraordinary in this country. I know that it has been practised in other countries. I know that, in Switzerland and in Holland, the people were told by the Republic of France, they had bad constitutions that required alteration, and that the Republic, with sisterly kindness, without asking their consent, imposed conventions upon them, which formed for them entirely new systems of government. But I trust the same thing will not be done here.

I do not think it necessary to inquire into the expediency of this measure, as I have no objection to giving my consent to the admission of the Territory into the Union, even without a population of sixty thousand, if wished for by the people; though I have no idea that the people will be benefited by it, as they will then have taxes to pay, from which they are now exempt. But I do not consider this as a proper objection for us to make, as it ought to rest with the people to say, whether they are willing to pay those taxes.

I say again, we have no right to impose a convention. I believe that the principle on which we take this step goes the full length I have stated, and may, if adopted in relation to the Territory, be applied to all the States. The powers of the Territory, on this head, are as complete as those of the States; and if we interfere with the first, we may interfere with the last. I know that, in Connecticut, the Legislature may regulate the choice of Governor, and that the Legislature of Maryland chooses the Governor; but these provisions do not give a right to the National Government to interfere in the regulations of the one or the election of the other. So, if the Legislative powers of the Territory are limited, no power is thereby given to the National Legislature over those powers which exclusively belong to the Territory.

Gentlemen may say what they will, but there is nothing under the ordinance to prevent an expression of the public voice of the Territory. It is true that one branch of the Territorial Legislature is chosen by the President, but the other branch is chosen directly by the people. It is, therefore, perfectly safe to trust to the expression of the public will through a Legislature, which is chosen every two years. If gentlemen will confine themselves to giving the assent of the Government to the calling a convention, I will agree to it; I cannot agree to impose one.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—I will not undertake to say, with the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. Griswold,) that the people of the Northwestern Territory are not bound by the Constitution, as that doctrine might carry us farther than we mean to go; but I will say, there is nothing in these resolutions that abridge the rights of the people. They, in fact, extend them; and though, in the opinion of the gentleman, the people may not be bound by the Constitution, they may not be unwilling to accept the privileges we now offer them. We are about to bestow upon these people, what man has ever considered as his greatest blessing, the right of self-government; to offer them a full participation in all our rights. They have a right, if they please, to accept these high privileges, which we have a Constitutional right, if we please, to bestow. I do not know that I said, what the gentleman from Connecticut ascribes to me, that Congress has no right to impose upon these people the calling a convention. I did say that Congress had no right to give them a constitution, without their consent. But take gentlemen on their own ground; grant, for argument sake, that we have no right to impose upon them a convention. Is there anything like this contained in the resolution? We only enable them, by the first resolution, to come into the Union under principles not repugnant to the Constitution, or to the ordinance of 1787.

The gentleman from Connecticut says, we are not to collect from the petitions on our table, that every man in the Territory should be admitted into the Union. True, we see that this is not the case. We have evidence here, from the language of the Delegate of the Territory, that there is one man, at least, against it. But, from the completion of these petitions, and from the great number of signatures, we have reason to believe that a large majority of the citizens are for the admission, particularly as we have received no opposing petitions. We have reason to believe that a portion of the people are opposed to the admission, because those elected by the people have communicated to us their indisposition to come into the Union; also, the Governor, and the member on this floor, are of the same opinion; but when the small number of this description of citizens is contrasted with the several thousand petitioners, who pray for admission, the fair inference is, that a large majority wish to be admitted.

The gentleman from Connecticut says, there is no way of getting the consent of the Territory, but through their usual Legislative organs, or by going throughout the Territory and collecting the opinion of every citizen. But I will ask him how the assent of the people of the United States was obtained to the Constitution, under which we now live? Was it obtained by the assent of all the Legislatures, or by that of every man in the country? No; the same mode was then adopted that we are now pursuing. Conventions were assembled, which ratified the Constitution for their respective States, which was not binding upon those States that ratified it, until adopted by nine States; and then it was adopted as the supreme law of the land in those States. Now, what do we wish? Not to impose a convention upon the people of the Territory, or to say, when the convention shall be convened, they shall adopt a constitution. We take, on the contrary, the same mode pursued by the grand Convention, which did not say that every State should elect conventions, but that, when the conventions of nine States should adopt the Constitution it should be in those States the supreme law of the land. So we say that, when the people of the Territory shall have elected a convention, and adopted a constitution, it shall be valid. Here is no compulsion; we only take the best measures we can devise for obtaining the sense of the people. This, while it is the only, is also the fairest opportunity they can have of freely and fully expressing their sentiments, because, by voting for a man who shall declare himself an advocate of, or an opponent of the measure, the sense of the public will be obtained. This will be accomplished more completely and distinctly, by voting for a man, whose duties will be confined to this single object, than by electing to a Legislature men whose duties are various and multifarious.

I must say that I do believe that the wishes of the people will be better expressed by a convention appointed by the people themselves, than by a Legislature, two branches of which are appointed by the President of the United States.

As to pecuniary considerations, I am at a loss to understand the gentleman from Connecticut, who seems to think that the Territory, when formed into a State, actuated by the inordinate possession of power, will be likely to grasp at our lands. But there will be this difference between his plan and ours. If we admit them now into the Union, we may make very important terms, which they will observe inviolate, if not lost to every principle of good faith; whereas, if we wait until they shall have acquired the right of admission, without our consent, we can make no terms with them whatever.

Mr. GODDARD.—The present question arises out of a question decided before. A proposition was made by the Legislature of the Territory to divide it; an application to this effect was made to Congress, who refused their assent to it. The people, in consequence of that refusal, now come forward and ask to be adopted as a State into the Union, and we are now called upon to make them a State. If the object of these resolutions were barely to say, they might be a State, I should have no objection; but we are about exercising a power over that Territory, that belongs to the Legislature of the Territory. Does not that Legislature possess every power that we are called upon to exercise? Suppose Congress were to decide that they should be admitted; would not the Legislature of the Territory have the power of deciding whether, and how, a convention should be called? Take the case of Maine. Suppose that we not only admit Maine into the Union, but say that a convention shall be called. Would we not, in that case, interfere with the powers of Massachusetts? And do we not, in these resolutions, violate the power of the Territorial Legislature in the same way?

[Here Mr. G. read the third article, which respects the calling a convention.]

The adoption of the first resolution being perfectly useless without the adoption of the third resolution, we are to infer that, if one shall be adopted, the other will also be adopted. For, if this should be the case, we must wait for the expression of the Legislative will of the territory, which we may as well wait for before we adopt the first resolution. It is to be remembered also, that under these resolutions Congress are to pay the expenses of the convention, and that the whole business is indeed under the direction of Congress. Why precipitate this measure, when in all probability, before these details can be made, the Territory will have obtained the number of sixty thousand, and be entitled of right to admission into the Union? For these reasons, I am of opinion, that it will be best to leave the business where it is.

Mr. MACON said the House was brought to a consideration of this subject by the petitions of the people of the Northwestern Territory, who were dissatisfied with their present situation. The people not only of this Territory but of all Territorial government, will be dissatisfied, from the very nature of the government. We first live in one kind of government, and then go into territorial government and we don't find there the same government with the one under which we previously lived. Hence the invariable dissatisfaction.

The only question now is, on agreeing to the first resolution, that is, to give our consent to the Territory being admitted as a State into the Union, before they have attained a population of sixty thousand inhabitants. It seems to me from the petitions before us that a decided majority of the people are in favor of being admitted. These numerous signatures could not be obtained in a corner, or without being known over the whole Territory; and had sentiments prevailed in the Territory different from those expressed in the petitions, we should have had before this time our table covered with counter-petitions.

Mr. M. said he had never heard a Constitutional question started where there was so little ground for it. He asked whether there was any violation of the Constitution in admitting the Mississippi Territory to the rights of a Legislature before their numbers justified them in requiring it?

Northwestern Territory.

H. OF R.

The gentleman from the Territory says they may be admitted without a Constitution. But does not the ordinance require that the government shall be republican, and he would ask whether the present government is republican? He believed not. So much did he dislike these Territorial governments, that he wished all the Territories were formed into States, that they might have a share in passing the laws by which they are governed.

The gentleman from Connecticut says this measure will lead to a consolidation of the States. Its effects will be directly the reverse, for the more States there are in the Union, the farther removed shall we be from a consolidation.

We are told that if this application were regular, the gentlemen would have no objection to it. But can any act be more regular than that which proceeds directly from the people?

Mr. FEARING conceived nothing would be more likely to promote disturbances in the Territory than this law, as "he conceived a large portion of citizens would not consider themselves bound by it, and of consequence not send delegates to the convention. He conceived it unconstitutional, as under it a convention might be called, a constitution made, and yet that constitution be void. For suppose that under the act proposed to be passed a convention should be chosen according to the present census, and a constitution formed by them; and suppose that another constitution should be formed by a convention convened by the Legislature of the Territory under a different census; which would be the real constitution of the Territory? Certainly the last, because formed on a true apportionment of the population, and under a law of the Legislature by which the Territory is governed.

The gentleman from Maryland says, that unless Congress interfere, the Territory can never become a State; and to prove this, he refers to the law of the Territorial Legislature, lately before us, expressive of their disapprobation of coming into the Union. But this opinion is not correct; for many of the people of the Territory, though better pleased with the division of the Territory proposed in the law, would still wish a State government, in the event of that division being rejected; and it appears on the journals of the Legislature that some members voted for a State government in that event. If the arguments of gentlemen are sound, we might be kept from obtaining a State government for one hundred years, in case the President should appoint or continue a Governor hostile to such a government. But, Mr. F. said, he conceived the people had a right, when their numbers amount to sixty thousand, to be admitted, even if Congress shall be against admitting them, or the Governor and upper House in addition. He conceived that, under the resolutions of the representatives proposing a convention, if the people agreed to them, a constitution might be formed that would be fully obligatory.

Mr. F. said, when the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) spoke in relation to the petitions on the table, he had presumed that he was going to state the number of petitions in each county. This, however, he had not done. As to himself he did not know from which counties the petitions came, but he presumed they were principally from Ross and Adams.

The gentleman from North Carolina has said, the present revenue of the Territory is sufficient to support a State government, as appeared from the contents of the petitions. The reverse, however, of this is clear, by a document on the table, which furnished information more worthy to be relied on than that of the petitioners, who, themselves, he presumed, paid little, as the present revenue was derived altogether from land.

If the Constitution is as binding as gentlemen contend, Mr. F. conceived that the law of Congress had vested a right in the Territory which Congress cannot impair, viz: the right of the Legislature to call a convention when the numbers of the Territory shall reach sixty thousand.

As to the idea of gentlemen respecting a republican form of government, Mr. F. conceived Connecticut to be under a republican form of government, which, however, consisted of nothing more than fixed habits, which depended upon a law which might at any time be repealed. There was, in reality, no constitution, therefore, in Connecticut; so he conceived the Territory at liberty to form, or not to form, a constitution. If not at liberty, the terms of the ordinance would have been imperative.

Mr. GODDARD moved to amend the first resolution, by inserting the words "for giving the consent of Congress;" so as to read, "that provision ought at this time to be made by law for giving the consent of Congress to the inhabitants of the Eastern division of the Territory, to form for themselves a constitution and State government," &c.

Mr. G. said, his only objection to the original resolution was that, under it, Congress usurped powers vested in other bodies. Should this amendment prevail, there would be no occasion to inquire into the principles involved in the subsequent resolutions.

The question was taken on this amendment, and lost—yeas 13.

The question was then taken on the first resolution, and carried—yeas 47.

WEDNESDAY, March 31.

Mr. DAVIS, from the committee to whom was yesterday referred a motion respecting "members of this House dying at the seat of Government during a session of Congress," made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the expenses accruing by order of the House, in attending the funeral of NARS-WORTHY HUNTER, a member from the Mississippi Territory, be paid out of the contingent funds of the House.

Resolved, That the legal representatives of a member of this House, who shall die at the seat of Government during the session, shall be entitled to receive the same allowance for his itinerant expenses, as the member would have been entitled to, had he returned to his place of abode.

A petition of David Austin, in behalf of himself and others, inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying that such a sum of money as Congress, in their wisdom, may deem sufficient, may be appropriated for the building of a house for the exercise of public worship, on the Capitol Hill, for the accommodation and benefit of the inhabitants, and the improvement of the said city.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

According to the desire expressed in your resolution of the twenty-third instant, I now transmit a report of the Secretary of State, with the letters it refers to, showing the proceedings which have taken place under the resolution of Congress, of the sixteenth of April, one thousand eight hundred. The term prescribed for the execution of the resolution having elapsed before the person appointed had sat out on the service, I did not deem it justifiable to commence a course of expenditure after the expiration of the resolution authorizing it. The correspondence which has taken place, having regard to dates, will place this subject properly under the view of the House of Representatives.

TH. JEFFERSON.

MARCH 31 1802.

The said Message was read, and, together with the papers referred to therein, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the twenty-seventh instant, the bill further to alter and establish certain post roads, reported an amendatory bill, which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, entitled "An act to amend, and reduce into one, the several acts of Assembly for improving the navigation of Appomattox river, from Broadway to Pocahuntas bridge."

Ordered, That Mr. GILES, Mr. WALKER, and Mr. STANFORD, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to repeal the internal taxes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY.

The House went again into Committee of the Whole on the report of a select committee respecting the admission of the Northwestern Territory as a State into the Union.

The second resolution being under consideration, Mr. FEARING referred to the provisions of the ordinance empowering Congress to divide the Territory, from which he inferred that Congress had not the right to divide the Territory so as to form one part of it into a State, while the remaining section was not made a State, without the consent of the Territory; he conceived that Congress must, in such event, form this section also into a State. He, therefore, was of opinion that Congress must consult the people of the Territory before they shall divide the Territory.

As to the expediency of the resolution, he thought it very inexpedient to make the division therein marked out. The effect of it would be that the whole of Lake Erie would be thrown out of the State to be formed, and the inconvenience to the section of the Territory not incorporated in the new State would be very great, if it should be attached to the Indiana Territory, from its great distance, which he understood was contemplated.

Mr. GILES said that the committee who reported these resolutions, so far from entertaining a disposition to change the ordinance, had strictly observed the conditions therein prescribed. [Mr. G. here quoted the ordinance.] It appeared therefrom that Congress was under an obligation, after laying off one State, to form the remainder into a State. But when? Hereafter, whenever they shall think it expedient to do so.

Mr. BAYARD agreed that there was no obligation imposed upon Congress to decide definitively the boundary of a State. If the ultimate right of Congress, after the formation of a new State, to alter the boundary be doubted, they have a right to remove all doubts by so declaring at this time. It is certain that at present great inconvenience would arise from drawing the boundary as fixed in the resolution.

The population of the Territory does not amount to that which is sufficient to give it admission into the Union. He had, however, no disposition to oppose its admission, notwithstanding this circumstance. The population in the Eastern State does not exceed forty-five thousand. We are now about to pare off five or six thousand inhabitants, which will bring it down to thirty-nine thousand. A population of forty-five thousand is quite small enough for an independent State. It is a smaller population than exists in any of the present States in the Union. From this consideration, it might have been expected that Congress would take no step whose effect would be a diminution of that population.

The division, as made in the resolution, is manifestly unjust, as far as it relates to the people north of the dividing line. By it they are about to be severed from their connexion with the other portion of the Territory. Mr. B. wished to know to whom they are to be attached? If attached to the Indiana Territory, the inhabitants, to arrive at the seat of Government, will be obliged to go across the new State, a distance of two or three hundred miles. Besides, after having advanced them to the second grade of territorial government, you will consign them back again to the first, and thereby give them a system of government extremely odious, and which we ought to get rid of as soon as possible. Thus, after having held out to them the flattering prospect of being elevated to the high rank of a State, you degrade them, contrary to their expectations, to the humblest condition in the Union. Mr. B., therefore, thought it would be most just and politic to include this population of five or six thousand in the bounds of the new State, subject to the reserved right of Congress to alter the boundary hereafter.

MARCH, 1802.

Northwestern Territory.

H. OF R.

Mr. GILES said he was not tenacious of his opinions; but it was necessary to justify the contents of the report by stating some considerations that might not be generally known to the members of the House.

Mr. G. said he supposed the section of the Territory, not embraced in the new State, would be attached to the Indiana Territory; nor would any great hardship result from this disposition; and such as did result would arise from their local situation, and not from any circumstances over which the National Legislature had a controlling power. He believed that people, to reach the seat of Government, had as far to go now as they will then have. His object was to reserve in future to Congress the right of determining the boundary of the States in the Territory. If this section should once be admitted, he believed it would be very difficult, however proper, to detach it from the State to which it had become attached.

The report contemplates the forming a constitution. Should the people on the northwardly side of the line be admitted as a part of the State, they will participate in the formation of the constitution—a constitution which will not be ultimately for themselves, but after a short time exclusively for others. This participation would be unjust. The question then is, whether you will suffer those to form a constitution who are not to be permanently affected by it; and whether, if you once constitute a State, you will be able hereafter to alter its boundaries? For if this section be now admitted, gentlemen, by looking at the map, will see that the boundary now fixed cannot be permanent.

As to the remarks made by the gentleman from Delaware, Mr. G. said he was extremely glad that gentleman was for giving to the Territory the right of a State. If, however, he had attended to the report, he would have found that his calculation of numbers was incorrect. The population of five thousand had been deducted by the Committee, and after that deduction forty-five thousand remained. Though the numbers in the Territory proposed to be formed into a State amounted, a year ago, to no more than forty thousand, yet it might be stated upon strong ground, that, before the new government can get into operation, there will be a sufficient population to demand admission as a matter of right. By attaching the inhabitants on the north of the line to the Indiana Territory, they will remain in the same grade of government they now are, and not be degraded, as stated by the gentleman from Delaware, to a lower state. This disposition appeared to Mr. G. the best that could be made. But if, when gentlemen came to the details of the bill, it should be thought best to introduce into the new State the population north of the line, he said he might have no objection.

Mr. FEARING stated the great inconveniences that would be felt by the inhabitants north of the line, if attached to the Indiana Territory. He considered the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) respecting the participation of this description of citizens in forming a constitution for others as entitled to little weight. Such a measure was by no means uncommon. It had been done in the case of Kentucky, and other States.

Mr. F. conceived that the people of the Territory had all equal rights under the ordinance; they had been virtually promised that they should not be attached to any other Western Territory, and Congress had only reserved to themselves the right of admitting them into the Union as States. More they could not do, without their consent.

Mr. BAYARD moved to strike out of the resolution the words that fix the boundary, for the purpose of introducing words that should prescribe that the new State be circumscribed by the original boundaries of the Eastern State, referring to Congress the right of making one or more States in said State at any future time.

Mr. GILES said that the State, as formed in the report, was one of the most compact and convenient in the Union. The amendment would materially change its character. Besides, it would in fact impair the right of Congress to accommodate the boundaries to future circumstances. It was well known, and sensibly felt, that there were many inconvenient boundaries to several of the States now in the Union; yet so great was the difficulty attending their alteration, that they could not be changed.

Mr. BAYARD was not so sensible of the difficulty of altering the boundaries as the gentleman from Virginia, who had stated that Congress would not have power to alter them when once fixed. This difficulty might exist as to the States now in the Union, because Congress had not the Constitutional power to alter them without the consent of the adjacent States. But if this power be referred to Congress, which will be a disinterested tribunal, there will be no difficulty in varying the boundaries as circumstances shall dictate.

Mr. B. asked, if, while gentlemen are attending to the interests and wishes of one part of the people, they are disposed to disregard the interests and wishes of another part? If they were not, they ought to admit the section, proposed by the resolution to be cut off, to a participation in State rights.

Mr. BACON objected to the amendment. He said that Congress were vested by the Constitution with certain powers which they cannot increase, or diminish, or delegate. By the Constitution, likewise, the several States are vested with certain powers which they cannot increase, diminish, or divest themselves of. By the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution, "new States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union." This act proposes to make this Territory a State with State powers under the Constitution. How, then, can these people, once a State, divest themselves of these powers. This is a question that does not interest simply the State proposed to be formed, but every State in the Union. All are equally interested in preserving the powers vested in them by the Constitution.

Mr. GODDARD said, that were he to vote for making the Territory a State, he should be in favor of extending State rights to all the inhabitants of the Territory. He moved to strike out the proviso to Mr. BAYARD's motion, which reserves to Congress the right of altering the boundary.

Mr. FEARING remarked that he was not a little surprised to find gentlemen, who a few days since voted that the Legislature of the Territory had not a right to alter the boundaries without the permission of Congress, now contending that Congress have that right exclusively.

Mr. BAYARD said he did not see any occasion for striking out the proviso. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) goes on the principle that Congress has only a right to admit, without any reservation. Mr. B. said he had always believed the greater included the smaller. If you are vested with the greater power of admitting, you have certainly the minor powers included in the greater power. From the nature of the ordinance, it constitutes the fundamental principle on which the States are admitted—they are not admitted under the Constitution. They are to be admitted exclusively under the provision of the ordinance. You may, therefore, say that you will not now exercise the whole power committed to you, but reserve the right of exercising it hereafter.

Mr. SMILIE did not consider the principle laid down by the gentleman from Delaware as Constitutional. We must be governed by the Constitution. If the Territory be admitted as a State into the Union, when admitted it must be bound down by the Constitution, which says the boundaries of States shall not be altered but with the express permission of the State.

The question on striking out the proviso was lost without a division.

The question was then taken on Mr. BAYARD's amendment; which was lost—yeas 18, nays 38.

Mr. FEARING moved to strike out that part of the resolution which reserves to Congress the right of altering the boundary after the State is admitted. Lost—yeas 20.

The question was then taken on the second resolution, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 42.

The third resolution was then agreed to—yeas 42.

The fourth resolution was agreed to without a division.

On motion of Mr. FEARING the right to two salt springs, besides those at Scioto, was vested in the new State.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to strike out the third article, which provides that one-tenth part of the net proceeds of the sales of Western lands should be applied to the making roads "leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the Ohio, and continued afterwards through the State of —."

Mr. G. said he objected to this article, because the proceeds of the Western lands had been appropriated to the payment of the public debt, and to make roads for the States of Virginia and Pennsylvania would be the sole effect of this article. This, however disguised, would be the effect. Mr. G. said he knew, how large and powerful were the delegations of Virginia and Pennsylvania on that floor; yet he hoped, notwithstanding their strength, so unjust a measure would not be agreed to. He knew the proposition came from a public officer, whose estate lay in the western parts of Pennsylvania, whose value must be appreciated by the roads contemplated in the resolution. He alluded to the Secretary of the Treasury, whom he was justified in considering as the author of the plan from his letter accompanying the report.

Mr. GILES said he was sorry there was any part of the report that had a local aspect. But this was unavoidable. Local considerations were often necessarily blended with principles of general utility. He recollected the passage of several bills for the erection of light-houses; though he did not recollect how many of these were raised at the public expense on the Connecticut shore. Considering them as useful, though they had a local effect, he had always voted for them. He would also mention certain circumstances attending the aiding of the fisheries to the eastward, to which certain benefits were attached that were derived from the contributions of other parts of the Union. Yet he had always voted for them, notwithstanding their local application.

So far as relates to Virginia, the simple effect of this resolution will be to form a road over a mountainous country. Mr. G. said he was himself as little interested as the gentleman from Connecticut. Yet, where measures were devised whose great object was the general benefit, though they might be attended with local advantages, he had no objection to them. He believed the State of Maryland, the Federal City, Alexandria, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, would be most benefited by facilitating an interchange of commodities.

Mr. G. said he considered the circumstances of connecting the different parts of the Union by every tie as well of liberal policy as of facility of communication highly desirable. He further believed that the devoting one-tenth of the proceeds of the lands to the laying out new roads would be in fact no relinquishment on the part of the United States, as the lands thereby would be greatly enhanced in value. If, however, it shall be thought that this sum will be better applied in the opening roads in the interior of the State, he should have no objection to that.

APRIL, 1802.

Northwestern Territory.

H. OF R.

The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) affects lately to have discovered a great deal of disguise in the proceedings of this House. What disguise? What were the committee to do? This country is placed in a certain peculiar situation. We have waters running to the East—they to the West; and the committee thought it was desirable to connect these by good roads. With the committee, State principles or interests had no influence—they were governed entirely by general principles and the common interest.

The gentleman has also insinuated that the Secretary of the Treasury holds lands that will be benefited by these roads. It may be so. Mr. G. had not inquired; but he supposed he did not hold all the lands. Congress may lay out these roads as they please. He could foresee how Congress would lay them out, and it is a million to one that they will not touch his lands.

The United States are about making a new contract. These propositions are made as additional securities for the national property. The Secretary of the Treasury having estimated the annual product of these lands at four hundred thousand dollars, Mr. G. said, as chairman of the committee, he had applied to him to know his opinion of the manner in which this sum could be best secured, and he gave his opinion that this provision would be most likely to effect that object. This is all the mystery and disguise attending the resolution.

Mr. SMILIE said when gentlemen charge particular States with injustice, they ought to be prepared to prove what they advance. If there had been any co-operation between the delegations of Virginia and Pennsylvania on this occasion, he had never heard of it. The fact was, that no peculiar good could result to Pennsylvania from this measure. The great object was to keep up that intercourse which will attach the people of the Territory to you. When the Territory shall become a State, she will have a right to tax your lands. This benefit, together with the salt-springs, as I understand, is proposed as a substitution for the relinquishment of those rights.

Mr. FEARING said he considered a part of the rights of the Territory given up by this resolution; and though the Territory would be highly benefited by the projected roads, and the cession of the salt-springs, yet he conceived they would be much more benefited by laying out the roads within the Territory.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he was glad the honorable gentleman from Virginia had assured the House there was no disguise in this business. If the object be to make an advantageous contract with the Territory to secure our Western lands, let us offer them five per cent. of the proceeds of those lands, to be paid into their treasury. If they shall be disposed to make roads through Pennsylvania and Virginia, he should have no objection.

He was as sensible as the gentleman from Virginia, that whatever improves a part of the Union improves the whole; though this was undoubtedly the case, he was not of opinion that a sum of money should be taken from the public treasury, and specially applied to local purposes. Under this resolution, according to the calculation of the Secretary of the Treasury, forty thousand dollars was the smallest sum that would be annually applied to the laying out those roads. Mr. G. said he thought the sum too large to be withdrawn from the national treasury, and directed to local objects.

The allusion of the gentlemen to light-houses raised on the Connecticut shore does not apply. There was but one light-house in Connecticut, ordered to be built by this House, for which the enormous sum of twenty-five hundred dollars had been appropriated. Yet this solitary measure had been rejected by the Senate. This is the great boon given to Connecticut!

For these reasons Mr. G. hoped the article would be stricken out, and that, if it was necessary to make terms with the new State, they might receive five per cent. on the receipts of the land, to be paid into their own treasury, disposable by themselves as they saw fit.

Messrs. R. WILLIAMS, JACKSON, and HOLLAND, said a few words in favor of retaining the article; when the question was taken on striking it out, and lost—yeas 17.

Mr. FEARING, wishing that half the proceeds of the Western lands should be laid out on roads within the Territory, made a motion to that effect; lost—yeas 25.

The report of the select committee, without further amendment, was then agreed to, and a bill ordered in conformity thereto.

THURSDAY, April 1.

Mr. DENNIS, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of John Travers and Charles A. Beatty; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the whole House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to repeal the internal taxes;" Whereupon, the said bill, together with the amendments, was committed to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish this House with an estimate of the expenses incurred by the United States in the exercise of jurisdiction over the Territory of Columbia, since the assumption of jurisdiction by Congress.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act making appropriation for defraying the expense of a negotiation with the British Government to ascertain the boundary line between the United States and Upper Canada; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to empower John James Dufour and his associates to purchase certain lands. After making some progress therein the Committee rose and were refused leave to sit again; so the bill was recommitted to Mr. ELMENDORF, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. CUTLER.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Isaac Zane," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, of the thirtieth ultimo, to whom were referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the rebuilding the light-house on Gurnet Point, at the entrance of Plymouth harbor, for rebuilding the light-house at the eastern end of Newcastle Island; for erecting a light-house on Lynde's Point, and for other purposes;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the same.

The House then proceeded to consider the said report and amendments at the Clerk's table: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the first, third, fifth, and sixth amendments.

Resolved, That this House doth also agree to the second part of the second and fourth amendments, with amendments to the same, respectively.

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to so much of the second and fourth amendments of the Senate, as proposes to strike out certain words in the fourth and fifth sections of the original bill.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Isaac Zane." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on a report respecting the City of Washington.

In lieu of the first resolution, one was substituted, on motion of Mr. DENNIS, for abolishing the present Board of Commissioners, and empowering the President to appoint one or more agents to manage the affairs of the city.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to amend the third resolution by striking out that part which empowers the President to advance moneys from the Treasury to pay the instalments of $200,000, and, in case too great a sacrifice would be made by selling city lots.

This motion was opposed by Mr. NICHOLSON, and lost—yeas 20.

Mr. GREGG moved to strike out the proviso in the fourth resolution, which saves from immediate sale a certain portion of city lots pledged to the payment of $50,000 loaned of Maryland.

This motion was supported by Messrs. GRISWOLD, EUSTIS, MITCHILL, BACON, RANDOLPH, and ALSTON; and opposed by Messrs. NICHOLSON and HOLLAND; and carried—yeas 45, nays 20.

* Mr. NICHOLSON moved to strike out the first part of the fourth resolution, and insert in lieu thereof a provision that in case the proceeds of the lots do not prove adequate to repay the loan of Maryland, the deficiency shall be paid out of the Treasury.

This motion was supported by Messrs. NICHOLSON, ALSTON, T. MORRIS, and DENNIS, and opposed by Mr. GREGG.

The Committee rose without coming to a decision, and asked leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, April 2.

Mr. BACON, from the committee appointed on the fourth of January last, to whom it was referred, on the twenty-fifth ultimo, "to consider whether any, and if any, what, reduction ought to be made from the pay of the Senators and Representatives in Congress, as now established by law," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed on the thirty-first ultimo, presented a bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of Virginia therein mentioned; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed on the eighth of February last, presented a bill to repeal so much of the acts, the one entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," the other, "An act entitled 'An act supplementary to the act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States,' as relate to the establishment of the Mint; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed, on the twenty-sixth ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency or inexpediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit the duties, in all cases which have accrued, or may accrue, on spirits distilled, and on stills, within the United States, upon satisfactory proof being made to the said Secretary that such stills, or distilling materials, have been accidentally destroyed by fire, rendered useless by an inundation of water, or other unavoidable casualty," made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to authorize the remission of the duties which have accrued, or may accrue, on distillation, in any case whatever.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed on the thirty-first ultimo, presented a bill to enable the people of the Eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were yesterday referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to repeal the internal taxes," reported that the committee had had the said amendments under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their agreement to the same.

APRIL, 1802.

City of Washington.

H. OF R.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the time therein mentioned,'" and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching, historical and other prints; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

The House proceeded to the further consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to repeal the internal taxes;" to which the Committee of Ways and Means this day reported their agreement: whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth concur with the committee in their agreement to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee of the twenty-sixth ultimo, on the petition of Richard Soderstrom, attorney in fact for Paolo Paoly, a subject of the King of Denmark, referred the twenty-second of the same month; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to refund and pay to the petitioner, Paolo Paoly, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of seven thousand and forty dollars and fifty-five cents, it being the amount of damages and costs of suit awarded by the circuit court of Pennsylvania, in its judgment of restitution, on behalf of the petitioner, against Captain William Maley, commander of the public armed vessel the Experiment, belonging to the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. GREGG, and Mr. J. C. SMITH, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That Mr. R. WILLIAMS be added to the committee appointed on the fourteenth of December last, "to inquire and report whether moneys drawn from the Treasury have been faithfully applied to the objects for which they were appropriated, and whether the same have been regularly accounted for; and to report, likewise, whether any further arrangements are necessary to promote economy, enforce adherence to Legislative restrictions, and secure the accountability of persons entrusted with the public money," in the room of Mr. JONES, who has obtained leave of absence for the remainder of the session; and that the said committee have leave to sit to-morrow, during the sitting of the House.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee of the twelfth of February last, to whom was referred a Message from the President of the United States, transmitting a memorial and letter to him from the Commissioners of the City of Washington; and to whom was also referred, on the fifth of the same month, a motion respecting the discontinuance of the offices of the said Commissioners; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follow:

1. Resolved, That, from and after the — day of — next, the Board of Commissioners in the City of Washington ought to be abolished, and thereafter all the powers vested in the said Board ought to be vested in, and discharged by, an agent, to be appointed by, and to be under the control of, the President of the United States.

2. Resolved, That, prior to the first day of March next, the said Commissioners ought to settle their accounts with the accounting officers of the Treasury; and all debts which have been contracted by them in their capacity as Commissioners, and for the payment of which no particular provision is hereinafter made, ought to be discharged in the usual manner, by the said agent.

3. Resolved, That so many of those lots in the City of Washington which are pledged for the re-payment of a loan of two hundred thousand dollars, made by the State of Maryland, in the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six and one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, to the Commissioners of the said city, ought to be annually sold, as may be sufficient to pay the interest and instalments of the said loan as they may respectively become due: Provided, That if, in the opinion of the President of the United States, the sale of a sufficient number of the said lots, to meet the objects aforesaid, cannot be made without an unwarrantable sacrifice of the property, then so much money as may be necessary to provide for the deficiency ought to be advanced from the Treasury of the United States.

4. Resolved, That all the lots in the said city which were sold prior to the sixth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, and have since reverted to the Commissioners, in consequence of a failure on the part of the purchasers to comply with their contracts, ought to be sold for the purpose of paying to the State of Maryland the sum of fifty thousand dollars, with the interest thereon, on or before the first day of November next; which said sum was loaned by the said State, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, to the Commissioners, for the use of the City of Washington: Provided, That if a sufficient sum to meet the objects aforesaid cannot be raised by the sale of the whole of the lots, then so much money as will be sufficient to make up the deficiency ought to be advanced from the Treasury of the United States.

5. Resolved, That all moneys advanced out of the Treasury of the United States, in pursuance of these resolutions, ought to be reimbursed as soon as possible, after the debts already contracted by the Commissioners have been discharged, by applying towards the reimbursement every sum of money which may be afterwards raised out of the city funds, until the whole of the money advanced shall be repaid.

Ordered. That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. BAYARD, Mr. J. TALIAFERRO, jun., Mr. HASTINGS, and Mr. ALSTON, do prepare and bring in the same.

Proceedings.

APRIL, 1802.

SATURDAY, April 3.

An engrossed bill declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of Virginia therein mentioned, was read the third time and passed.

A petition of James Johnson and others, justices of the court of common pleas of the county of Knox, in the Indiana Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying that the ordinance of Congress under the former Government, of the thirteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, may be so far revised and amended by law, as to give chancery powers to the judges of the said Territory.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed on the fourth of January last, "to inquire whether any, and what, alteration should be made in the Judicial establishment of the United States; and to report a provision for securing the impartial selection of juries in the courts of the United States."

A memorial of the Mayor and Commonalty of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, stating the inconveniences and injury sustained by the poorer classes of citizens in the town and county of Alexandria, by the operation of the existing laws for the government of the said District, in the case of fees allowed to be taxed upon suitors, to the lawyers, marshal, attorney for the District, and for the attendance of witnesses, in the circuit court of the United States, held in and for the said city and county; and praying relief in the premises. Referred.

On motion of Mr. MILLEDGE, it was Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to cause such documents as may remain in the War Office, or such as he may be able to procure from the files of the Executive of Georgia, for the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five; also, from the agent of the War Department for the Southern district, for those years; with every other statement and paper he may become possessed of respecting the militia claims of that State against the United States, together with his opinion of the propriety and justice of allowing the same; and that he report such opinion and documents appertaining thereto, on the first day of the next session of Congress.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Paolo Paoly; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendatory bill further to alter and establish certain post roads; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said bill be postponed until Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for revising and amending the acts concerning naturalization," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee, of the twenty-fifth ultimo, to whom was referred the petition of Theodosius Fowler, presented the third of February, one thousand eight hundred and one; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported two resolutions; which were read, amended, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the claim of the United States against Theodosius Fowler, for moneys advanced or paid on account of his contract with the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the twenty-eighth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, ought to be extinguished.

2. Resolved, That the suit commenced by the United States against the said Theodosius Fowler, in the circuit court of the district of New York, for a claim on account of the said contract, ought to be no further prosecuted, and that the Comptroller of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and required to cause the same to be withdrawn.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. ELMENDORF, Mr. L. R. MORRIS, and Mr. HOLMES, do prepare and bring in the same.

MONDAY, April 5.

A petition of sundry citizens of Georgetown and its vicinity, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying that the present directors of "The Columbian Library Company," therein named, and their legal successors, may, by law, be incorporated, and constituted a body politic, with such privileges and immunities as are usual in such cases. Referred.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a statement of goods, wares, and merchandises, exported from the Mississippi district during the year 1801, in addition to the general statement of exports received by the House on the eleventh of February last; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to provide for the establishment of certain districts, and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

The House proceeded, at the Clerk's table, to the farther consideration of the amendatory bill further to alter and establish certain post roads; and the same being further amended, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled

"An act for revising and amending the acts concerning naturalization:" Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said amendments, together with the bill, be committed to Mr. MITCHILL, Mr. GODDARD, Mr. SMILE, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. LEWIS R. MORRIS, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. STANFORD.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the account of Samuel Dexter, for his expense in defending against the suit of Joseph Hodgson;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee arose and reported their agreement to the same. The House then proceeded to consider the said amendments at the Clerk's table: Whereupon, the question being taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. VAN NESS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That any ship or vessel, two-thirds of which shall have been, or may be, rebuilt within the United States, of American materials, and belonging wholly to a citizen or citizens of the United States, may be registered, and considered as an American ship or vessel: and that it shall be the duty of the collector of the district within which such ship or vessel is or may be owned, upon satisfactory evidence of the above facts, to grant such register, according to the rules by law established in other cases.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Paolo Paoly. The Committee reported the bill without amendment; and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

A bill from the Senate for the better securing of public property in the hands of public agents, was read a second time.

Mr. BAYARD stated the great inconveniences which, in his opinion, would arise from the provisions of this bill; one of which made the bonds given by the public agents a lien on the landed property, the existence of which bonds, not being entered of record, could not be known to the purchaser. Mr. B. stated further reasons, which induced him to move a reference of the bill to a select committee.

After a short discussion the question of reference obtained.

Mr. ELMENDORF, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Theodosius Fowler; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

CORVETTE BERCEAU.

Mr. GRISWOLD remarked that much had been said respecting the money expended on the Berceau. In order to obtain correct information he submitted a resolution substantially as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to report to this House whether the sum of $32,839 54, laid out in repairing the corvette Berceau, before her delivery to the French Republic, was expended, in order to equip her for the service of the United States, or for the purpose of delivering her to the French Republic, agreeably to the stipulations of the Convention between the United States and France.

Mr. S. SMITH said this object had been already reported upon, and full information obtained. Now gentlemen want to arrive at the motives of the Executive, and desire this House to aid them in their efforts. He believed, however, it was the first time the motives of public officers had been called for by Congress.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—The fact is ascertained that the money has been taken from the Navy fund; also, that the Berceau became by capture an American vessel; but other important facts are not ascertained. It is a little extraordinary that, if the repairs were made for the Berceau as an armed vessel of the United States, they should have been made after a law had passed reducing the public armed vessels to thirteen. If the information required be a secret of State, it ought not to be disclosed; but I suppose it is no secret; I see no valuable purpose to be answered by secrecy. Further, when these repairs were put on the corvette, the convention was partially ratified, and the vessel in fact was given up before the treaty was returned from France. I suppose, therefore, the repairs were put upon her for the purpose of delivering her up to the French Republic. I wish to know whether they were made for this object.

Mr. S. SMITH.—The gentleman from Connecticut is under a mistake. The Berceau did not become a vessel of the United States in consequence of her capture. She was purchased in by the Navy Department. I believe that everything the House has a right to demand from the Executive has been given. I do not see the reason for asking why the Executive did such or such a thing. The House have a right to ask for facts, but not opinions.

Mr. GILES hoped the resolution would be suffered to lie on the table. He did not believe there existed any precedent to warrant it. He was surely one of those who desired everything to be disclosed. He believed, however, the Secretary of State knew nothing about the business of the Berceau, which came not properly before his department. Much had been said respecting the Berceau. He believed very little could be obtained by gentlemen from all the inquiry they could make. The fact was, that, under the late Administration, the Berceau had been purchased, and by the late Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose of delivery. This information, Mr. G. said, he had from the late Secretary himself.

Mr. BAYARD.—The honorable gentleman from Virginia has given the House sufficient cause for complying with the wishes of the mover of this resolution. He has stated certain information obtained by word of mouth from the late Secretary of the Navy. I also possess information derived from the same gentleman, but directly the reverse of that given by the gentleman from Virginia. My information, too, is extremely recent, and therefore such as I cannot but depend upon. However, all this shows the necessity of having written and official information, which can be subject to no misconception. As the gentleman has stated his information, I will state mine, received recently from the Secretary at a dinner table.

From the late Secretary, I understood that after the proceedings in the district court of Massachusetts, and the property was ordered to be sold, it was thought by the Secretary of the Navy that there would be a great sacrifice, and he directed her to be bought in; but he expressly directed that there should be no repairs made, as it was not then known whether she would be the property of the United States—his orders directing barely so much to be done as to prevent the corvette from being deteriorated. I also understood that the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH,) the day after the former Secretary went out of office, ordered the repairs.

I do not see how gentlemen can resist agreeing to such a resolution—a resolution which simply calls for information. It is said the Secretary of State knows nothing about the business. If so, it is easy to insert the name of the proper officer, viz: the Secretary of the Navy.

The information required is proper for this House to possess. Before this Congress, I never knew that any information had been refused, necessary to enable the members to form opinions on subjects properly under their direction. If such information ever has been received, it was wrong, and the precedent ought not to govern us.

The gentleman from Maryland says we are not to call for this thing or that thing from the Executive officers. But if such a doctrine as that prevails, they will soon cease to be the servants of the nation. And surely they have at present no reason to complain of the trouble we give them, as we are about to be liberal and to augment their salaries.

This resolution contains no reference to motives; it is an inquiry into facts, whether the repairs put upon the Berceau were made for the purpose of retaining her as an armed vessel of the United States, or for the purpose of delivering her to France under the convention with that nation. Are not these facts? Are France and the United States the same nation? Gentlemen can discover no other way of getting rid of this resolution, but by declaring an identity between them. Were we to call upon the Executive to say why the Berceau was delivered to the French Government, gentlemen might complain; but we simply ask a fact.

If it shall be replied that the repairs were made, in order to deliver her up to France, I am not prepared to say they were improperly made. After the answer is given it will be in season to judge. Our object in making this motion is no secret. We wish to know from what fund the money has been taken, or whether from any fund. Holding the purse-strings of the nation, we have a right to be acquainted with these circumstances; that if public money has been properly disbursed, we should be satisfied of the fact; if wrongly disbursed, that such fact also should be known to us.

Mr. S. SMITH.—So far from there being any secret in this business, I read in a late debate, from documents then in my possession, whatever related to it. The arguments of gentlemen show that the resolution should be suffered to lie on the table. If it is sent to the Secretary of State, he will reply, that he knew nothing about the business. It does not properly come under his department. Why, then, refer a business to him which he cannot elucidate, especially when his ill state of health should recommend forbearance? The statement of the gentleman from Delaware is not entirely correct; indeed, I am inclined to believe with him, that he received it at a dinner table. I believe the whole letters will be exhibited, and that there is not the least secret in the whole affair. It is true, that the last order was given by me. But before issuing that order, it was submitted to the former Secretary of the Navy, and the letter accompanying it was drawn by his advice and with his approbation. The fact is, that at that time I was engaged in rendering some assistance to the department, until it should be filled by a permanent officer, and that the place was offered to me and other gentlemen. That letter, to which I have just alluded, gave instructions to put the Berceau in the precise situation she was in at the period of capture.

Mr. DANA said there might be an error in the style of the resolution, and it might be proper to substitute Secretary of the Navy in the room of Secretary of State.

Mr. GILES.—The gentleman from Delaware says, that the information to him by the late Secretary of the Navy differs essentially from that given by me. I believe that is not the case. The information given to me was not verbal, but written. The only difference between the gentleman and myself is, that he states that the late Secretary did not give the orders, whereas I stated that he had advised and approved them on a new Secretary coming into office.

Mr. BAYARD.—I certainly thought there was a material difference between our statements. I understood that gentleman (Mr. GILES) to have said that the orders were actually given by the former Secretary. I may have forgotten what he said; or he may have forgotten, and may deem himself at liberty to retract his expressions. We are now told that the late Secretary only advised and approved. I was correct, therefore, in saying the orders were not given by the late Secretary.

I cannot say with certainty what the private opinion of the former Secretary is. I am, however, rather inclined to think, though I express it doubtfully, that his opinion was, that the repairs were proper.

The gentleman from Maryland says my statement is not correct, and adds, it may have been obtained at a dinner table. But it is perfectly immaterial whether obtained at a dinner or a breakfast table. That gentleman, though from his situation better acquainted with the circumstances of this transaction than any member on this floor, has not invalidated any part of my statement.

I do not, however, wish to inquire into the private opinions of the Secretary of the Navy, either those of the past or present officer. I do not know what they have to do with the subject before us. If the orders were given under the present Secretary, or the past Secretary, still the President is answerable for them, and it is totally immaterial who was consulted on the occasion. Our only wish is to get this information, and why we are denied it I am at a loss to know.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to postpone the resolution till to-morrow. He was not disposed to deny gentlemen any proper information that they might want. But gentlemen have so repeatedly asserted that there was a disposition in those opposed to taking up this resolution, at the present time, to deny all information.

Mr. BAYARD said the gentleman was mistaken; he said no such thing.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—The gentleman asked, why evince this disposition to deny information? Does not the House recollect the words? We have so often heard from gentlemen what are and what are not precedents that have taken their rise in this House, that sometimes I have been tempted to doubt whether I have heretofore been a member of the House. But I will refer to a case where information was asked and denied; such information as, in the opinion of those who required it, was calculated to criminate the Executive; and on the refusal of which another resolution, approbatory of the conduct of the President, was grounded. Gentlemen on that occasion declared that they wanted information to form their judgments; yet the information was denied.

[Mr. RANDOLPH referred to the case of Jonathan Robbins.]

I am not, however, for imitating gentlemen in refusing information. But I think it improper to act on a minute's notice. If the information asked be so important, I see no reason why a motion for it was not brought forward at an earlier day. I see no reason for demanding us to act instantly, at a period when important business is pressing upon us. I should, indeed, wish to see the practice introduced of notice being given of all business of importance. It is known, that though not strictly conformable to the rules of the House, committees do sit during its session. Without such notice, opportunities may be watched, and seasons seized for unfairly carrying a favorite measure.

Mr. BACON hoped the consideration of the resolution would not be postponed. Gentlemen say there is nothing so intricate in it. It only requires facts to be exposed. They disclaim all relation to views. Now, what facts do gentlemen want? I verily believe the official documents before the House display every fact in relation to the business; one fact is, that the Berceau has been repaired; another is, that she has been delivered to the French Republic; and from these facts it is for us to infer the design.

Mr. S. SMITH said he was against the postponement. He wished to meet the object fairly. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman from Connecticut would withdraw his motion, or that the House would reject it, for the purpose of introducing in its room one which he held in his hand, and which he read, (calling upon the Secretary of the Navy for all papers respecting the repairs of the Berceau.)

Mr. GRISWOLD.—I hope the consideration of the resolution will not be postponed. There is no perplexity in the resolution proposed by me; it is even more simple and correct than that of the gentleman from Maryland. By the Messages received from the President, this subject appears to be before the Department of State.

Mr. RANDOLPH withdrew his motion of postponement. He said he would only observe, that all the information gentlemen wanted had been already given. Both the gentlemen from Connecticut and Delaware were members of the Committee of Ways and Means. They cannot surely have forgotten the answer of the Secretary of the Navy to a letter from the Secretary of State, who had been applied to on the subject by the Committee of Ways and Means. The amount of that answer was, that the Berceau, being a vessel of war of the United States, was repaired, and the expenses of repair derived from the fund provided for the repairing national ships. Gentlemen, therefore, must know, not only the amount of the repairs, but also the fund from which those repairs were paid for.

Mr. BAYARD believed the better way would be to call upon the President to decide whether the repairs were made on the Berceau as a national ship, for the purpose of her delivery to the French; and, also, to lay before the House the papers, &c.

Mr. B. said the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) had observed that there was one case in which the House had requested information, and that was the case of Jonathan Robbins. He hoped the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) would excuse him for correcting his statement, which he would do by appealing to the Journals, from which it would appear that the only information sought was received and acted upon. He remembered, too, that the information required by the motion of a gentleman from New York was of such a nature as to wound the feelings of the then President, inasmuch as it was contemplated as the ground of severe crimination; yet the information was not refused.

He said he hoped the same course would be pursued on this occasion that had been on that.

As to the information being before the Committee of Ways and Means, that was altogether immaterial, since the information possessed by that Committee was not in the possession of the House; but the information possessed by that Committee does not go to the extent of the resolution; it only goes so far as to ascertain the amount of expense and the fund from which it had been drawn; whereas the object of this resolution is to ascertain whether the repairs were made for an armed national vessel, or for a vessel to be delivered to the French under the stipulations of the convention.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he did not expect that any difference of opinion would have been manifested on the facts stated by him to have taken place in the case of Jonathan Robbins. He did not state those facts with any view to the drawing them into a precedent on this occasion for refusing information. God forbid! that this or any other of the transactions attending that case, should be called up by him as a precedent to influence the proceedings of the House. But he had stated it as a fact, to demonstrate the inconsistency of gentlemen, that information contended to be necessary by several members on this floor had been denied by the majority.

[Mr. R. here read extracts from the Journals, to show that in the case of Jonathan Robbins, a resolution had been offered for obtaining a certificate of the proceedings of the Federal court, relative to the delivery of Jonathan Robbins; which resolution was rejected—yeas 44, nays 57.]

Mr. R. said that from the Journals it appeared that among those who voted in the negative were the honorable gentlemen from Delaware and Connecticut, (Mr. BAYARD and Mr. GRISWOLD.) He said he had never asserted that information asked in this case from the Executive had been withheld by the Executive; but he had said that information decisive, perhaps, of the important question before the House, had been withheld by the vote of the majority. The proceedings of the court, and the evidence there given, were the pivot on which the case turned, viz: whether Jonathan Robbins was a citizen of the United States or not.

Mr. GRISWOLD agreed to modify the motion by introducing Secretary of the Navy, in the room of Secretary of State, and to add to his original motion, the words calling for papers, as proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH.)

Mr. S. SMITH said, he then moved to strike out all the resolution, excepting that which called for papers.

Mr. T. MORRIS called for the yeas and nays on striking out.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—I shall vote for the amendments. This is the first time I have ever heard public officers called upon to assign their motives of action. That the Berceau has been repaired, and $32,000 expended, is known to the gentlemen, and not denied by us. Gentlemen do not pretend to say they are not acquainted with these circumstances. But they are not satisfied with a knowledge of these facts, but offer a resolution requiring the Secretary of the Navy to do a thing not in his power to do. The fact is he was not in office when these repairs were made. Now, what was the view with which these repairs were made by the former Secretary of the Navy, or by my colleague, who was in the temporary discharge of the duties of the Navy Department, it is impossible for the present Secretary to say. But even if the information could be furnished by the present Secretary of the Navy, I cannot see the propriety of calling upon him for his motives, which cannot vary the propriety of the measures. The ship belonged to the United States; there existed a fund out of which vessels of the United States are repaired; out of this fund the Berceau was repaired. Now, where can be the use of inquiring into the motives of the Executive? We know that the Berceau was delivered to France repaired. If improperly delivered, that will form a subject of distinct consideration. The gentleman from Connecticut says he wants information. All the information the gentleman desires is already before us, derived from the report of the Secretary of the Navy. Gentlemen who support this resolution might as well call upon the President to inform them with what view he has recommended certain things to our attention in respect to the Judiciary, the internal taxes, and other subjects.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that though he thought the call now made improper, yet being willing to give gentlemen all the information they desired, he would withdraw his motion to strike out, suggesting the propriety of amending the resolution by introducing the words "to purchase," before the word "repairs."

Mr. GRISWOLD said he had no objection.

Mr. EUSTIS said he hoped the amendment would go further, and state the "time of sale, purchase, and repair;" then the whole business would be before us. This was the more important, as a very material fact was involved in the sale.

Mr. GRISWOLD had no objection to making the resolution as extensive as was desired by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Gentlemen are not correct in saying this resolution is a demand of motives. I will mention a parallel case in which gentlemen will not say that similar information will not involve important, and even necessary, facts for us to know. Suppose an appropriation is made for cannon ball for the Army, and one also for the Navy—a purchase of this article is made in the interior of the country—it is necessary to know for which department the purchase is made, that we may determine whether the money disbursed is taken from the Army or Navy fund. So, in this case, it is equally necessary that we should know whether the Berceau was repaired for the service of the United States, or to be delivered up to the French nation, that we may determine whether the proper fund has been drawn on.

Mr. GILES said, that though he concurred with the gentleman from Maryland, that this was an inquiry into motive, and though it appeared to him to be a pernicious precedent—one which might lead to improper purposes—yet to satisfy the zeal of gentlemen, he was disposed to vote for it. He said he had never felt any disposition to deny useful information to the members of this House, or to the people. So far from that being the case, he had sometimes voted for information, to satisfy the wishes of gentlemen, even when that information was already on the table.

The case put by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) was not apposite. It would have been apposite had there been connected therewith an inquiry into the motives of the Executive in the purchase. As well might we, said Mr. G., demand of gentlemen their motives for this resolution; we might say it was designed to excite popular clamor—not that he believed it would have that effect, for he knew that the more the actions of the Executive were examined the more they would be approved.

APRIL, 1802.

French Corvette Berceau.

H. OF R.

There was one insinuation often made, not only here, but throughout the United States, that a moment's reflection would dissipate—an insinuation that could not produce the effect intended—an insinuation that the measures of the Executive, in the delivery of the Berceau, were grounded on a disposition to favor the French Republic. Mr. G. said, he would ask whether such an insinuation was not the most vain, unfounded, and irrational, that could be conceived? He would beg gentlemen who fostered it, to turn their attention to the situation of the French Republic, and they would there see whether there was the smallest probability, or least possibility, of the existence of any sympathy between the Executive of France and the American Administration; they would see whether, in their principles, they agreed in a single point. It may not, perhaps, be strictly proper on this floor to say anything of the leaning of our Executive to European Powers; but, on this occasion, it might be permitted to say that there was no analogy or sympathy between the Executive of the one country and the other. There could be no analogy or sympathy while the measures of the two Administrations were so essentially different. Mr. G. said, he believed the Executive entertained no sympathy or predilection for any European Powers; but there was not a reflecting man in the United States, in France, or in the world, who marked the course of the two Governments of the United States and France, who would not mark the essential difference between them. All this, Mr. G. said, he did not express from any kind of authority, or from personal acquaintance with the Executive Magistrate, but from the reflection of his own mind.

Mr. BACON moved for a division of the question. He was in favor of that part of the resolution which called for papers, but opposed to that part which related to the design of the Executive.

Mr. T. MORRIS moved so to amend the resolution, as to make it read that the President be requested to inform this House—with the variation at the close—and to direct the proper officer to lay before the House papers, &c.

Mr. GRISWOLD agreed to this modification; when, on motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, the House adjourned—yeas 55, nays 30.

TUESDAY, April 6.

An engrossed bill further to alter and establish certain post roads was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Paolo Paoly was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the petition of Arthur Morrison, referred to him by order of the House, on the fourth ultimo; which were read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen," and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for the relief of Thomas K. Jones which was reported without amendment and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

On motion it was Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the thirty-first ultimo, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying sundry documents relating to the claim of Comfort Sands, and others, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said letter and documents be referred to Mr. BACON, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. GODDARD, Mr. HANNA, and Mr. CLAY.

CORVETTE BERCEAU.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, that in order to meet the ideas of gentlemen who had spoken yesterday, he would withdraw the motion he had made, and in the room thereof propose the following:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to report to this House, whether the sum of 32,839 dollars and 54 cents was expended for repairing the corvette Berceau, after it was determined to deliver up the same to the French Government, agreeably to the stipulations of the convention between the United States and France; and to lay before this House copies of all papers and documents which relate to the sale, purchase, and repairs of that vessel."

Mr. GILES moved to strike out that part which related to the purpose of the Executive. He said he wished to carry the point of information as far as any person; but he believed that going the extent of the motion was going beyond the powers of the House; as he believed that in the present case the provisions of the treaty were merely of an Executive nature, and the repairs made of the same nature. He had himself, in his personal capacity, no objection to the President fully developing his motives, believing those motives to be highly honorable; but he did not wish unconstitutionally to interfere with the Executive Department. We have heretofore heard much about the independence of the departments and particularly of the Executive Department. He believed that during the period when a description of citizens now the majority, were in the minority, and who were then branded with the name of disorganizers, no such motion had ever been made by them. He knew not the views of gentlemen, who now made this motion; but it appeared to him the most disorganizing motion that had ever been made in that House.

Mr. G. said he held in his hand a paper which showed that which he had yesterday stated was perfectly correct. He would therefore, again remark that the business had taken its direction under the former Administration, and had been

H. OF R.

French Corvette Berceau.

only continued in that direction by the present Administration.

Mr. G. concluded by moving to strike out, "whether the sum of 32,832 dollars 54 cents was expended for repairing the corvette Berceau, after it was determined to deliver up the same to the French Government, agreeably to the stipulations of the Convention between the United States and France, and."

Mr. BACON believed the resolution required explanation. It indicated, perhaps, too great jealousy of the motives of the Executive. He was at a loss to know what was referred to by the words "after it was determined;" by whom determined? By the President of the French Republic?

Mr. GRISWOLD trusted the amendment would not prevail. The French corvette has been delivered up. This is a fact. The gentlemen has expounded this to be an Executive act. The vessel could not have been delivered without the determination of the Executive. Now, we are not for inquiring into the motives of the President. We state the facts, that the repairs have been made, the vessel has been delivered, and the determination must have taken place before the delivery; we ask then why gentlemen refuse us the knowledge of the fact whether the repairs were made after it was determined to deliver the Berceau to the French? This is a fact; it is not a motive. These 32,000 dollars are public money, applied to the support of the Naval Establishment. We wish to know whether this sum has been properly or improperly applied to naval purposes as appropriated by law, or whether it has been applied to the execution of a treaty. That that treaty ought to be carried into execution cannot be doubted. This we all admit. But we say that this money ought to be taken from its proper fund. I do not see why gentlemen deny this information. Our only inquiry is into certain facts; and I have never known such an inquiry prohibited. We are not inquiring into the secret motives of the Executive for carrying this treaty into effect before it was ultimately ratified by France. That measure was probably correct. The fact is well known, and yet I hear no gentleman condemn it.

The objections, therefore, of gentlemen are incorrect. We are not for inquiring into the secret motives of the President; his motives were undoubtedly virtuous and honorable, and his measures may have conduced to the welfare of the nation. But we simply want the fact whether the repairs were made before or after the determination to deliver the corvette to the French. This House has a Constitutional right to inquire into the faithful expenditure of the public money. We appropriate money for a marine barracks, and we find a Secretary of the Navy building with the public treasure an extensive house on his own estate; have we not a right to inquire for what purpose the money is applied?—to know whether the appropriations made by law have been observed? This is all we now desire; that we may ascertain whether the money laid out on the Berceau has been applied to naval purposes, or to other purposes. This we have a right to know, and I think gentlemen cannot refuse it. Mr. G. concluded by asking for the yeas and nays.

Mr. T. MORRIS was astonished gentlemen interfered to prevent information being given to the House. What! Have we not a right to know how the public money has been applied? Have we not a right to know how these 32,000 dollars have been expended? We know they have been expended; we know there is no fund out of which the money could have been taken. Have we then not a right to inquire into the circumstances attending the disbursement, and shall we be told that in making this inquiry, we are prying into Executive secrets! This is indeed going farther than has ever been done before. The gentleman from Virginia says, the conduct of the Executive will redound to his honor—why not then disclose the circumstances attending that conduct.

Mr. DAVIS.—Gentlemen were all day yesterday employed in framing a resolution; sometimes proposing one amendment, and then withdrawing that amendment to make room for another; and now, when it is nearly fitted to the mind of the whole House, it is withdrawn by the mover (Mr. GRISWOLD) and another substituted in its place, and we are again to occupy a whole day in talking about it. For what is this proposed? Are we about to engage in any Legislative act that renders it necessary that we should have the information it asks? If we are not, I cannot see the propriety of so much useless discussion about it. I therefore, move that its further consideration be postponed till the third Monday in November; and I hope those who are for going on with the public business will agree to postpone it till that time, and let those gentlemen, whose curiosity leads them to pry into the motives of the Executive, go to the public offices, and there obtain the information they say they want, while we are progressing in the public business.

Mr. LOWNDES said he was one of those who the most anxiously wished the public business despatched. But he knew no business so important as that which respected the expenditures of the public money. He did not conceive that one solitary objection could be urged against the motion. Gentlemen say, we are calling upon the Executive for his motives; but, Mr. L. said, he did not understand the English language, if this resolution involved an inquiry into motives. If the answer of the Executive shall be that these repairs were made in order to restore the Berceau to the French, will that be anything like a motive? Is it not a simple and abstract fact? Suppose the answer given shall be, that the Berceau was repaired that she might be employed in the service of the United States, will that be a motive? It will be a simple abstract fact; gentlemen, in truth, to resist the motion, are driven to the shift of saying, we are forced into Executive motives.

Mr. LOWNDES said, he was also anxious that the resolution should prevail, for the reason assigned by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS,) who had stated, that some important facts were involved in the business. That gentleman, and gentlemen on his side of the House,

APRIL, 1802.

French Corvette Berceau.

H. OF R.

may be acquainted with these facts from the facility with which they are enabled to get information from the Executive offices; but are not we entitled to the same information derived from official sources?

The gentleman last up asks for what purpose is this information wanted?—is it intended as the ground of a Legislative act? The proper answer to such a question is, that we must have the information first. If the repairs were made to fit the Berceau for the public service, Mr. L. said the expenditure was unwarrantable; and if they were made in order to deliver her to the French, he would say, the expenditure was without law. The gentleman from Virginia has said, that he is not disposed to be economical of information, but that his economy would be directed to the expenditure of public money. If so, he ought not to oppose this motion.

Mr. GILES said he had never been disposed to be economical of information. His only object at present was to be economical of an invasion of the Executive Department. He was not disposed to deny an atom of information that was required to enlighten our minds; and the resolution, as modified by his amendment, would give gentlemen all the information that is proper to be furnished. The gentleman from South Carolina says he has not the same facility with us of obtaining information; and he immediately goes on to decide on the conduct of the Executive, and he says that conduct is not lawful. But, on inquiry, it will be found that both the past and present Administration believed there was a law which warranted all the steps taken.

Gentlemen were informed yesterday, that the Berceau was purchased under the old Administration. This is a fact. It is also a fact that the purchased money was paid out of the contingent fund of the Navy Department, and that the repairs were made out of the same fund. Gentlemen say they wish to know the purpose, and not the motives of the Executive, as if purpose did not involve motive.

It had been truly said, there was no precedent for such a motion. If there were one, gentlemen would, without doubt, have brought it up. The most notable precedent that bore any application to the present case was that under the British Treaty. On that occasion we only asked the President to lay such information before the House as in his opinion might be disclosed without inconvenience to the nation; and yet for this reasonable request we are branded with the reproachful epithet of disorganizers. But now gentlemen, who were then so liberal in their reproaches, call upon the Executive to state—not any particular information in his possession, but the purpose for which he did certain acts. Notwithstanding the distinctions of gentlemen, we do understand the English language very differently from them if they do not admit that the term purpose includes in it motive and inducement.

However, if gentlemen will examine the resolution as it stands, after striking out the first part of the sentence, they will find that it will give them all the information the President can furnish from which any inferences can be drawn.

Mr. G. believed the purchase of the Berceau had been made under the old Administration; he believed it had also been made out of the Navy fund. For what purpose she was purchased was not specified at the time; and it would have been improper if it had been specified. After being purchased, she had been dismantled; and it was to this circumstance that the consequent embarrassment was to be ascribed. The repairs were only such as to place her in the situation she was in when captured. All this information will be derived from the resolution which shall remain, after the words are stricken out, which I have moved to strike out. Is not this information enough? Shall we go on and say to the Executive, why did you this or that act? Mr. G. was of opinion that it would be improper to reduce him to the necessity of refusing our request, which he believed he would and ought to do, as no right to make the request belongs to us. He at the same time declared himself as averse to concealment as any man. He concluded by saying that he was happy to find gentlemen on the opposite side of the House actuated by so lively a spirit of inquiry; he hoped they would continue to be animated by the same laudable spirit, as in this way the Government would be kept pure. The principle of giving all useful information was that of the present Administration, and he trusted it would be extensively practised, though he was not for carrying it so far as to interfere with the right of the other departments.

Mr. LOWNDES.—The gentleman has* misconceived me. I did not say there was no legal appropriation for repairing the Berceau. This we cannot know until we shall hear with what view she was repaired.

The gentleman says the order to repair was given under the former Secretary of the Navy. But it is quite immaterial to me and to the House under what Administration it was given. It is possible it might have been given by the late Secretary of the Navy, and notwithstanding be the act of the President, as that officer continued in the place for some time, under the present Chief Magistrate.

Mr. BACON required to know what the original resolution could precisely mean? What can the phrase determination refer to? Does it mean after the Executive had made up his mind to sign the convention, after he had actually signed it, or after the Senate ratified it? Surely it is so vague and inexplicit that it requires explanation before it is adopted.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he did not rise to take a part in the debate; but barely to notice a remark made by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Griswold;) a remark not probably meant to have the effect which it might have, if suffered to pass unnoticed, upon the public mind. He alluded to that part of the gentleman's speech, which put the case of a Secretary of the Navy building a marine barracks upon his own estate. Lest an unintentional impression should be produced by this re-

H. OF R.

French Corvette Berceau.

mark, Mr. S. said he would observe that no such thing had occurred in relation to the Secretary of the Navy; and that the site on which the marine barracks was built was in the City of Washington, and had been purchased from the Commissioners of the city.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he had not the least allusion to any such thing having occurred. He had only used it as an argument to them, that such an event might occur.

Mr. G. thought it important that this information should be obtained for two purposes. The first was, in order to pass a proper appropriation act on the subject. Gentlemen would recollect that we had replaced the amount of the purchase money to the Navy fund; if the repairs were made from the same fund, the amount ought to be replaced to the proper fund. In the second place, it is our duty to inquire into the due expenditure of public money. The Constitution requires that this shall be done; and if it shall be doubted whether the Executive has committed a mistake in the expenditure of the public money, the subject ought to be inquired into. If it shall appear that the Executive has committed a mistake, it does not follow that the Executive is to be criminated; the Executive cannot be criminated; but in such case there ought to be an appropriation subsequent to the expenditure, to cover it. This has been often done, viz: in the Western Insurrection, more money was expended than was authorized by law; but the expenditure was necessary, the Legislature deemed it right, and it was covered by a new law.

Mr. G. wished that the gentleman from Virginia had stated more clearly how we are impeaching the motives of the President by calling for this information. We say it is a fact that the Berceau was delivered to the French nation, that the expense of repairing her before delivered was $32,000; and all that we wish to know is whether this expense was incurred before or after the determination to deliver her.

Mr. G. said he would put a case. Suppose a certain sum of money should be appropriated for naval purposes. The treaty-making power resides in the President. Suppose he forms a treaty which stipulates the giving to a foreign Power a thirty-two gun ship. Suppose, for the purpose of carrying into effect this stipulation, the President takes the money necessary to build this ship from the Navy fund. Would it not be proper in Congress to inquire from what fund the money is taken? The Executive had actually stipulated to deliver to the Dey of Algiers, and had built for that purpose, a thirty-two gun frigate. Yet it had not been considered that the money for that object could be taken from the Navy fund; but that it was proper to take it from the fund created to defray the expenses of foreign intercourse.

This proposed inquiry is not only right, but it is our duty to make it, as it may be necessary to pass a law covering the expenditure. He did not, by this motion, mean to impeach the motives of the President. But when the information we request is received, we shall be able to judge whether the President has observed or transgressed the appropriation law, and whether this has been the act of the former or present President.

Mr. T. MORRIS had said that $32,000 had been laid out, without a dollar being appropriated. This he had stated on the authority of a paper exhibited by a gentleman from Virginia. It did appear from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy that the Berceau was purchased and repaired in order to be delivered to the French Republic; and if the purchase and repairs were made for this purpose, he did say the money had been expended without any appropriation by law.

Mr. SMITH.—It has been truly said that no demand similar to the present has ever been made—nor ought such a demand now to be made. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will obtain; and that we shall agree to that part of the resolution which is proper. We have a right to call for papers, and I hope we will exercise that right; but we have no right to demand from the President a knowledge of his motives, and I hope we shall not require to know them. Gentlemen say we refuse them information. It is, however, a little extraordinary, how differently the same gentlemen think at different times. In 1796, a proper demand was made and refused. The President was requested to lay before this House the instruction given to our Minister who negotiated the British Treaty; with the express reservation that he should withhold such parts as it be improper to communicate. Yet the request was not complied with; and if gentlemen will examine the journals they will see that the names of the gentlemen from Delaware and Connecticut (Messrs. BAYARD and GRISWOLD) are among those who were against granting the information.

Mr. ELMER said he hoped the postponement would not prevail. He was so solicitous to get information, that he would agree to almost any mode of obtaining it: though he thought the House had nothing to do with the motives of the President, and that, of consequence, the amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. S. SMITH.—The gentleman from Connecticut has stated a case, in his opinion, analogous to the present—that of the frigate built by a former President for the Dey of Algiers. I remember well that that vessel was built without any authority derived from law. I do not recollect whether at the next session of Congress we appropriated money for that object; but I remember that though it was said to be a considerable exercise of power on the part of the President, it was thought on the whole to be right, though there was no appropriation for it.

I remember too that a former Secretary of War did, unauthorized by law, build two galleys on the Ohio which cost $20,000, for which there was no appropriation; but the expenses of which were taken from the Quartermaster's department; and all this was done without any investigation.

With respect to the purchase of the Berceau, that measure took place on the 19th of December. Gentlemen say it was under the Treaty. But the truth is, that no official information of the treaty

APRIL, 1802.

French Corvette Berceau.

H. OF R.

had then arrived. Notwithstanding this, the former President had directed the purchase, and perhaps very wisely. Here then was an expenditure without any appropriation other than that of the Navy fund. Of consequence, whatever sum was applied to the repairs of the Berceau will be charged to this fund, as well as the sum expended in the purchase.

Gentlemen too will find, notwithstanding all they have said, that no order for repairs has ever been issued; but only an order to inquire into the situation of the vessel, as to arms, provisions, and stores, at the time of the capture, and to replace everything as existing at that time.

The yeas and nays were then taken on postponing the consideration of the resolution to the third Monday in November, and lost—yeas 4, nays 75, as follows:

Mr. GILES' amendment to strike out recurring—

Mr. BAYARD said, I hope the amendment will not prevail. I am surprised to find that, notwithstanding the most unlimited professions of gentlemen to give information, under the most nice and subtle distinctions, they now tell us we are calling for information which we have no right to possess. It has been said over and over again that the acts of this House do not furnish a precedent for such a refusal. Gentlemen in reply have referred to several cases. Among these they have referred to the case of the British Treaty. What was the conduct of the House on that occasion? Did they not enter a resolution calling upon the Executive to give information. It is true the Executive refused to give it. So, on this occasion, let us do our duty, and if the Executive is not possessed of the information we seek, or thinks it improper to give it, he will say so. Gentlemen say they have no doubt but that the conduct of the Executive will, on investigation, appear laudable. If so, why refuse to the Executive the opportunity of exhibiting documents which have convinced the honorable gentleman, and such as will convince the whole American people of its rectitude? For my part, I am not prepared with gentlemen to applaud the conduct of the Executive; respecting the propriety of his conduct, I am neither ready to doubt nor to believe. The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) may be prepared. He may have access to information which I have not. If this information be of the kind he represents, why not furnish it, that the whole American nation may possess the same opportunity of judging that he possesses?

It is said that we have no right to inquire into the motives of the Executive. We do not wish to inquire into his motives; we wish facts. We want to know whether the Executive did or did not determine to deliver up the Berceau at a certain time. Is this a motive? We call it a fact. The truth is, that under this pretext, if at any future time we call for information, gentlemen may charge us with seeking into motives, and thus resist our reasonable request.

This determination to deliver the Berceau does or does not appear on the face of the papers before us. If it does appear, why will gentlemen trouble themselves in resisting a request at least so harmless? But if it does not appear on the face of the papers, is it not proper to have a direct communication from the Executive? This information is most important to us, who wish to know whether the Berceau was repaired as a French or American vessel; that we may know whether the price of those repairs has been taken from a legal fund. If she was repaired as an American vessel, the expenditure was legal; if as a French vessel, it was not legal. Will gentlemen say it is unimportant to determine whether the legal application of money has been observed? This information is also important to determine the propriety of the extent of the repairs made. If the Berceau was repaired as an American vessel, the extensive repairs may have been proper and reasonable; but if she was repaired as a French vessel, they appear to have been wanton and extravagant. To make such repairs we were not bound by treaty. I will agree that we were bound to restore her in the state in which she was brought in, but not in the state in which she was previous to the engagement; because that engagement was a legitimate act, as we were then in a state of war. We were simply bound to place her in the condition she was in when the treaty was formed; and I apprehend that would not have cost $32,000.

Mr. BACON.—Gentlemen are correct in denying the similitude of any precedents to the present resolution. I do not believe that a similar precedent can be found on the journals, or anywhere else, except in those Popish countries where there are inquisitions. Gentlemen disclaim inquiring into the motives of the President. But does not the determination they wish to arrive at the knowledge of, involve motive? And of whom? Of the President. The only object then of this motion is to find out the secret design of the President. For such an inquiry, can you find any precedent extant but in countries where there are established inquisitors? And this is a foreign authority that I should scarcely expect the gentlemen to quote in this House. I repeat it, this resolution can mean nothing else than to ferret out the secret intentions of the President: and gentlemen dare not face these remarks by saying with what intention it is really made.

Mr. GODDARD said he did not know that a free country could furnish a precedent of such a refusal; but he believed that no country could long remain free that did furnish such a precedent.

Gentlemen say much about the secret doings of the President. Mr. G. said he did not before know that there were any such.

Gentlemen say, you may call for all official papers, and you ought to be satisfied with them. But suppose your public officers expend the public money, without keeping records of the expenditure, would it not sound strange that you should be denied the right of calling upon them for other sources of information in their power to furnish? Suppose the President now called upon to say wherefore the Berceau was repaired, would that be improper?

Mr. DANA.—The proposition to amend the resolution offered by my colleague appears to be founded upon misapplication. The plain object of the resolution is to ascertain the fact whether the Berceau was repaired as an American or French vessel. This is the proper and sole object. As to the real intention of the Executive, I should not suppose gentlemen would be afraid to avow it. How can we determine this point, which must depend on the facts for which we ask, without first receiving them from the Executive? In the proceedings on the British Treaty, the case was different. In that case the call was for information respecting the negotiation of a treaty; this call respects the execution of a treaty, which we can know nothing of, but through the Executive. The determination with which we wish to be acquainted must be a Governmental act; as to any secret opinion confined to the President, that could not be contemplated by the resolution. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) asks whether the determination we wish to possess is that of the American or French Government? I will answer him by saying I had not imagined that any gentleman could have supposed that the French Government would have delivered up a vessel itself.

For myself, I think it proper to call for this information, not that I would be very critical with the Government. But here is an expenditure of $32,000, on the face of it questionable. It is proper then to get information that will enable the people to judge for themselves. For my own part, I have had doubts of the propriety of the expenditure, either from the fund for foreign intercourse or from the Navy fund. I do not mean, however, to give this as my prevailing opinion; nor would I wish, in this stage of the debate, to implicate censure upon the Executive. If it shall appear on inquiry, when we have all the information before us, that the Executive has acted right in this transaction, I am one of those who shall deem it my duty to put down all the clamor that has been raised throughout the nation; and even if it shall appear that the President has acted substantially right, though he may have deviated from the strict letter of the law, I would wish to sanction his measures by a new law.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—I rise to advert to the decision of the House in the case of the British Treaty. I did not suppose that that case would have been attempted to have been assimilated to this. The ground on which the resolution then proposed was founded, was, that the House of Representatives had a right to participate in the treaty-making power; and on that ground it was opposed. On that ground too the information asked from the President was refused.

[Mr. G. here quoted the President's remarks in reply to the resolution of the House.]

Is that the case here? Do we claim a right to interfere by giving our assent to, or in executing the treaty with France? No; we only ask for the single fact whether the repairs of the Berceau were or were not made before it was determined to deliver her to the French. We ask this, that if it shall appear there was no existing appropriation, the expenditure may be covered by a new law, as has been the case in all instances where expenses have been incurred without existing appropriations.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. GILES, and carried—yeas 49, nays 27, as follows:

NAYS—James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, John Campbell, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Thomas T. Davis, John Dennis, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, William H. Hill, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Lowndes, Lewis R. Morris, Thomas Morris, Thomas Plater, Nathan Read, John C. Smith, John Stanley, John Stratton, Samuel Tenney, George B. Upham, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, and Lemuel Williams.

Mr. DANA moved to suspend the resolution, by requiring a statement of the sums paid to the officers and men of the Berceau, together with all papers relating thereto.

Mr. GILES.—The gentleman from Connecticut says, the precedent in the case of the British Treaty does not apply, as the resolution then passed related to the negotiation and not to the execution of the treaty; but the fact is, that resolution did

French Corvette Berceau.

relate to the execution of a treaty, as the treaty was already finally negotiated. Mr. G. said, he had introduced this observation to show that there was no analogy whatever between the passage of that resolution, or an agreement to this resolution as submitted by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD.) But that resolution was precisely like this, as proposed to be altered, with one reservation; in the former case it was proposed that the President should withhold all such information as he should think improper to communicate, whereas in the present case there is no such reservation. Yet the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD) as appears from the yeas and nays, was, in the former instance, against the call. The fact is, notwithstanding the remarks of that gentleman, there was nothing in the resolution agreed to by the House, in the case of the British Treaty, that involved the claim of the House to participate in the treaty-making power. We now conform the present resolution to that then offered, except that we do not reserve, as we did then, the right to the President to withhold a part of the papers; that is, we give to gentlemen all and even more, than they then denied us. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) on that occasion made a handsome speech to show that we did not possess a Constitutional right to call for papers; but he now tells you, that you have not only the right to call for papers, but you have the additional right to call on the Executive for his purposes.

Mr. G. begged leave to know whether this change of conduct evidenced that respect for the Executive department which gentlemen had heretofore so often professed? He also begged leave to compare the spirit of those gentlemen, with whom he then acted, with the spirit of other gentlemen now, and to ask whether the spirit then manifested was not a spirit of forbearance, and one which gentlemen, on this occasion, altogether disregarded? Those who then voted for papers, have since uniformly voted for papers, and now vote for them.

The gentleman has spoken of the accommodation of the French officers of the Berceau. The fact is, that the officers and men were, in the first instance, placed upon the same footing; both were allowed two dollars a week. On this sum, it was feared, the officers could not subsist. Application was made to the Executive that the officers taken should receive a larger allowance, on the ground that France should pay the sums allowed. Mr. G. would ask whether there was ground for crimination here? Whether it was improper to respect the law of nations, and to treat the French officers as officers, under similar circumstances, are always treated? And yet this conduct of the Executive, which, while it manifested a respect to the law of nations, also evidenced an equal regard to economy, had excited a great clamor.

Mr. G. concluded by expressing a hope that the gentlemen would get all the information possessed by the Executive, from which they will find that the most scrupulous regard had been paid by the Executive to the laws, and particularly to those that respected the expenditure of public money.

Mr. DANA said he begged to observe that he had not said that any part of the Executive conduct, in this affair, was wrong. If the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia was correct, he would not hesitate to call what he had heard a popular clamor, and would do all in his power to put it down.

Mr. RANDOLPH read a document, in the possession of the House, to show that the information, desired by Mr. DANA, respecting the sums paid to the officers and men of the Berceau, was already before Congress.

Mr. DANA withdrew his motion.

Mr. NICHOLSON renewed it.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he had voted against the call for papers under the British Treaty. He should vote for this call. He had before stated, and he repeated it, that the ground on which that call was made, was, that the House had a right to participate in the treaty-making power.

The volume of the debates, which then took place, will show that both parties considered the call in that light. We then said, if it is your object to impeach Executive officers, or to know how much money has been expended, you have a right to the papers; but when you avow your object to be an interference with the Constitutional powers of other departments, we refuse them; so also said the President. But in this case we only call for papers in relation to the sale, purchase, and repairs of the Berceau. And have we not a right to inquire into the expenditure of public money? No one has ever doubted this right.

Mr. G. said he would, for these reasons, vote for the present call, believing that his vote on this occasion would be perfectly consistent with that under the British Treaty.

Mr. GILES said, he denied that the House of Representatives, in 1796, claimed a participation in the treaty-making power.

They contended for the right, a right which, he trusted, they would never abandon, of obtaining information whenever they were called upon to carry a treaty into operation. The first resolution of the House, adopted on that occasion, expressly disavows the right to participate in the making of treaties. [Mr. G. quoted the Journal to this effect.]

Mr. GRISWOLD said, he was astonished at the gentleman having read a resolution that altogether defeated his own argument.

[Mr. GRISWOLD here read the Journal.]

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and the resolution carried by a unanimous vote.

Ordered, That Mr. GRISWOLD and Mr. GILES be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

WEDNESDAY, April 7.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Thomas K. Jones was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, accompanying his report on the memorial of Fulwar Skipwith, referred to him by order of the House on the nineteenth of January last; which were read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was recommitted, on the fifteenth ultimo, their report on the memorial of Paul Coulon, a French citizen, made a supplementary report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

On motion, it was Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine and report the state of the office of the Clerk of this House.

Ordered, That Mr. CLAY, Mr. HUGER, and Mr. SOUTHARD, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee to whom were referred, on the fifth instant, the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for revising and amending the acts concerning naturalization," reported that the committee had had the said amendments under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their agreement to the same.

NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to enable the people of the Eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes.

Mr. FEARING moved to amend the bill so as to embrace the population of the eastern division as bounded by the articles of the ordinance, the effect of which motion would be to include about thirty thousand inhabitants of that division, that are excluded by the provisions of the bill, and respecting whom it is provided in the bill, that they may hereafter be added by Congress to the new State, or disposed of otherwise, as provided by the fifth article of the compact.

This motion gave rise to a debate of considerable length, in which Messrs. FEARING, BAYARD, GRISWOLD, GODDARD, HENDERSON, and RANDOLPH, supported; and Messrs. GILES, BACON, and R. WILLIAMS, opposed the amendment.

Those who supported the amendment contended that the exclusion of that portion of territory occupied by about three thousand inhabitants was both unconstitutional and inexpedient. On the ground of constitutionality, they contended, that under the articles of the compact, which were to be considered as the constitution of the Territory, Congress had only the right of forming the eastern division into one, two, or three States; and that under this power, no right existed to form one part of the division into a State, and leave the remaining sections in a Territorial condition; that the rights of the whole of the inhabitants of the eastern division were equal, and if one part was, so also must the remaining part be, admitted to the privilege of a State.

On the ground of expediency, it was contended that the situation of the excluded inhabitants would be peculiarly hard; that, if attached to the Indiana Territory, they would be placed two or three hundred miles from it; that they would be furthermore degraded from the second to the first branch of Territorial government, and that they would be deprived, by the reduction of their numbers, from the prospect of being admitted for a great number of years, to State rights.

On the contrary, the opponents of the amendment contended that the provisions of the bill were both Constitutional and expedient; that under the compact the right was given to Congress of admitting the eastern division into the Union, in the form of one, two, or three States; that this right involved a discretion to admit a part of that division at one time, and the remaining part at a subsequent period; that if the whole division were once admitted into the Union, Congress would be prohibited from dividing hereafter, when it was acknowledged such division would be expedient, the said division into two or more States, without the consent of the State now formed.

That, as to considerations of expediency, the hardships likely to be felt by the excluded inhabitants were such as arose, not from the provisions of the bill, but from their local situation; and that it was not true that they would be degraded by annexation to the Indiana Territory, to a lower grade of Territorial character than they at present enjoyed—the grade being the same.

Mr. RANDOLPH supported the amendment on peculiar ground, declaring that if the amendment should not prevail, he would still vote for the admission. He declared himself in favor of the amendment, principally from a desire to avoid the introduction of too many small States into the Union.

The question was then taken on Mr. FEARING's amendment, and lost—yeas 34, nays 38.

Mr. FEARING moved so to amend the bill as to leave to the new State the right of naming itself. Agreed to.

After some discussion of the details of the bill, the Committee rose and reported the bill, with amendments.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

THURSDAY, April 8.

Mr. JOHN TALIAFERRO, Jun., from the committee to whom was referred, on the fifth instant, the petition of sundry citizens of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, with instruction to report thereon by bill or otherwise, presented a bill to incorporate the Directors of the Columbian Library Company; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. DENNIS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the fifth of February last, a motion, in the form of two resolutions of the House, "respecting the adjustment of the existing disputes between the Commissioners of the City of Washington, and other persons who may conceive themselves injured by the several alterations made in the plan of the said city; also, relative to a plan of the said City of Washington, conformably, as nearly as may be, to the original design thereof, with certain exceptions," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

MR. JOHN TALIAFERRO, Jun., from the committee appointed, presented a bill to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing a statement prepared by the Register, of the application of the appropriations made by Congress for clerk-hire, in the several offices of the Treasury Department, specifying the names of the persons, and the salaries allowed to each, for the three last years, in pursuance of a resolution of this House, of the twenty-fifth ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying two statements, marked A and B, relative to expenses incurred by the United States in the exercise of jurisdiction over the territory of Columbia, since the assumption of jurisdiction by Congress, prepared in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the first instant; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed, on the eighth of December last, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the select committee to whom were referred, on the fifth instant, the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for revising and amending the acts concerning naturalization," which lay on the table: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments, with amendments, to the section proposed to be substituted by the Senate in lieu of the first and second sections of the original bill.

MR. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed on the second instant, presented a bill to abolish the Board of Commissioners in the City of Washington, and to make provision for the repayment of loans made by the State of Maryland for the use of the city; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

MR. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide more effectually for the due application of public money, and for the accountability of persons entrusted therewith; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the supplementary report of the Committee of Claims of the seventh instant, to whom was recommitted, on the fifteenth ultimo, their report on the memorial of Paul Coulon, a French citizen; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That there be paid to Paul Coulon, as agent for the captors of the ship Betty Cathcart and brig Aaron, prizes to the French privateer La Bellone, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of six thousand two hundred and forty-one dollars and forty-four cents, being the amount retained by the Treasury Department from the sales of the ship Betty Cathcart, and for duties on the cargo of the brig Aaron.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

NORTHWESTERN TERRITORY.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole to the bill to enable the people of the Eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes, which lay on the table; and the same being severally twice read, were, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

A motion was then made, further to amend the said bill, at the Clerk's table, by striking out, in the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth lines of the second section thereof, the following words: "and on the north, by an east and west line, drawn through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, running east, after intersecting the due north line aforesaid, from the mouth of the Great Miami, until it shall intersect Lake Erie or"—and inserting in lieu thereof, the word "to:"

It passed in the negative—yeas 27, nays 44, as follows:

MR. JOHN C. SMITH moved farther to amend the bill, by striking out the third section thereof, in the words following, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That all male citizens of the United States, who shall have arrived at full age, and resided within the said Territory at least one year previous to the day of election, and shall have paid a territorial or county tax, and all persons having, in other respects, the legal qualifications to vote for Representatives in the General Assembly of the Territory, be, and they are hereby, authorized to choose Representatives to form a Convention, who shall be apportioned amongst the several counties within the Eastern division aforesaid, in a ratio of one Representative to every — inhabitants of each county, according to the enumeration taken under the authority of the United States, as near as may be, that is to say: from the county of Trumbull, — Representatives; from the county of Jefferson — Representatives, — of the — to be elected within what is now known by the county of Belmont, taken from Jefferson and Washington counties; from the county of Washington — Representatives; from the county of Ross — Representatives, — of the — to be elected in what is now known by Fairfield county, taken from Ross and Washington counties; from the county of Adams — Representatives; from the county of Hamilton — Representatives, — of the — to be elected in what is now known by Clermont county, taken entirely from Hamilton county: and the elections for the Representatives aforesaid, shall take place on the second Tuesday of October next, the time fixed by a law of the Territory, entitled "An act to ascertain the number of free male inhabitants of the age of twenty-one, in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, and to regulate the elections of Representatives for the same," for electing Representatives to the General Assembly, and shall be held and conducted in the same manner as is provided by the aforesaid act, except that the qualifications of electors shall be as herein specified."

The motion to strike out was supported by MESSRS. JOHN C. SMITH, GODDARD, FEARING, and HENDERSON, and opposed by MESSRS. GILES, MITCHILL, R. WILLIAMS, ELMER, and HOLLAND, on the ground that the right of the United States to admit necessarily involved the power of prescribing a convention.

The yeas and nays were taken, and it passed in the negative—yeas 26, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—Thomas Boude, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Lowndes, Thomas Morris, Thomas Plater, Nathan Read, William Shepard, John Cotton Smith, John Stratton, Samuel Tenney, Thomas Tillinghast, George B. Upham, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Peleg Wadsworth, Lemuel Williams, and Henry Woods.

NAYS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon, Phaniel Bishop, Richard Brent, William Butler, Samuel J. Cabell, Thomas Claiborne, John Clopton, John Condit, Thomas T. Mr. FEARING said he was of opinion that some provision ought to be made for the inhabitants excluded from the new State, and the continuance of suits from the old to the new Government; for these purposes he moved the recommitment of the bill. Lost.

Mr. DANA proposed so to amend the fourth section, as that a majority of the whole number of delegates elected in the Convention, instead of a majority of those present, should first determine whether it be or be not expedient to form a constitution, &c.

The yeas and nays were called, and the motion carried—yeas 38, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—Thomas Boude, William Brent, John Condit, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Thomas T. Davis, Lucas Elmendorf, Ebenezer Elmer, William Eustis, Abiel Foster, John Fowler, Calvin Goddard, Edwin Gray, Roger Griswold, John A. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

FRIDAY, April 9.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend the Judicial System of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

[The chief alterations made from the old system consist in the holding the Supreme Court only once a year by four justices, and the establishment of six circuits, within each district of which circuit courts are to be holden twice a year, composed of one justice of the Supreme Court and the judge of the district, in which said court is held.]

The bill was read twice, and referred to a select committee.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Theodosius Fowler. The Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

APRIL, 1802.

Northwestern Territory.

H. OF R.

The House then proceeded to consider the said bill, at the Clerk's table: Whereupon, a motion was made, and the question being put, that the farther consideration thereof be postponed until the third Monday in November next, it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time on Mouday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to consider and report what business is necessary to be done by Congress, in their present session, and when it may be expedient to close the same.

The House proceeded to consider the said message: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the same; and that Mr. S. SMITH, Mr. BAYARD, Mr. J. SMITH, (of New York,) Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. GILES, be appointed a committee on the part of this House for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom it was referred to take into their consideration the subject of the public debt, and the provisions requisite for effecting its ultimate redemption, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the same committee, presented a bill making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the whole House last appointed.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented, according to order, a bill for the relief of Paul Coulon; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-day.

NORTHWEST TERRITORY.

An engrossed bill to enable the people of the Eastern Division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and the blanks therein filled up: And, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 47, nays 29, as follows:

NAYS—Thomas Boude, John Campbell, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, John Dennis, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, William Barry Grove, Seth Hastings, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Lowndes, Lewis R. Van Rensselaer, Lemuel Williams, and Henry Woods.

MONDAY, April 12.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Theodosius Fowler was read the third time, and passed.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Paul Coulon, which was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to day.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Lewis Tousard; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole for to-morrow.

Mr. CLAY, from the committee appointed on the seventh instant, to examine and report on the state of the office of the Clerk of this House, made a report: which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for the establishment of certain districts, and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Secretary of State, of the seventh instant, to whom was referred, on the nineteenth of January last, the memorial of Fulwar Skipwith; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported two resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follow:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law, for the payment of four thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, unto Fulwar Skipwith, (which sum was advanced by him to the United States,) with an interest of — per centum, from the first of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five.

Resolved That provision ought to be made by law for compensating the said Fulwar Skipwith, for his services from the first of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, to the first of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, at the rate of — dollars, per annum.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. DAWSON, Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, and Mr. STANTON, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House, then went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee of the twenty-second of January, on the petition of Sarah

H. OF R.

Sick and Disabled Seamen—United States Debt.

APRIL, 1802.

Fletcher and Jane Ingraham, referred to them on the tenth of December last, and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follow:

Resolved, That it is expedient to grant to the widows and children, as the case may be, of the officers, seamen, and marines, who were lost at sea, on board the ship Insurgent and brigantine Pickering, lately in the service of the United States, four months' pay of their respective husbands or fathers.

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law for the payment of five years' half pay to the widows and children, as the case may be, of such officers in the Naval service of the United States as shall be slain in battle, or die, when in the actual line of their duty.

Resolved That the widows and children of those officers who were lost at sea in the ship Insurgent and brigantine Pickering, shall be entitled to this provision.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. GODDARD, and Mr. STANTON, do prepare and bring in the same.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Paul Coulon was read the third time and passed.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the committee appointed the ninth instant, on the part of this House, jointly, with the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, "to consider and report what business is necessary to be done by Congress in their present session, and when it may be expedient to close the same," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of sick and disabled seamen.

Mr. EUSTIS moved to strike out the first section which forms the moneys devoted to the above object into a general fund, to be applied according to the discretion of the President, instead of suffering it to remain, as heretofore, applied to the particular ports, (or those in the vicinity,) from which the moneys are derived.

This motion was supported by Messrs. EUSTIS, MITCHILL, and DANA, and opposed by Messrs. S. SMITH, MILLEDGE, DAVIS, MACON, and HUGER.

The question was then taken on striking out the first section, and lost; when the Committee rose, and reported the bill with amendments.

TUESDAY, April 13.

An engrossed bill to provide for the establishment of certain districts, and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," and for other purposes, was read the third time, and, on a motion made and seconded, ordered to be recommitted to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the eleventh ultimo, a memorial of the Illinois and Ouabache land companies, be discharged from the consideration of the same.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was committed, on the ninth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend the Judicial System of the United States," made a report thereon; which was read, and, together with the bill, ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and two; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the fifth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the better security of public money and property in the hands of public officers and agents," reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee appointed yesterday, presented, according to order, a bill for the relief of Fulwar Skipwith; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

SICK AND DISABLED SEAMEN.

The House took up the bill to amend an act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, as reported by the Committee of the Whole, and agreed to the amendments with other amendments.

Mr. BISHOP moved to add to the first section a provision for applying $20,000 to the erection of a hospital in Massachusetts.

Mr. S. SMITH moved to insert in the room of " $20,000, the sum of $15,000," which he considered as adequate to commencing such building.

Mr. BISHOP agreed to the amendment.

This motion was supported by Messrs. BISHOP, S. SMITH, HUGER, BACON, and EUSTIS, and opposed by Messrs. ELMENDORF, DAVIS, MILLEDGE, and RANDOLPH.

Mr. MILLEDGE moved an amendment, applying $5,000 to the erection of a hospital in Savannah.

The proposition to appropriate $15,000 to the erection of a hospital in Massachusetts, was agreed to—ayes 39, noes 29.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

UNITED STATES DEBT.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill providing for the payment of the whole debt of the United States.

Mr. MOTT moved so to amend the first section that the appropriation of $7,300,000 applied to the annual discharge of the debt until the whole shall be redeemed should be stricken out, and words introduced making such appropriation for two years only.

Mr. MOTT said that his reasons for the motion were that $7,300,000 was so large a proportion of the whole revenue of the United States, that an appropriation of that sum for any great length of time might embarrass the operations of the Government. Though we are now in a state of peace, Debt of the United States.

H. OF R.

we cannot promise ourselves that we shall remain so for ten, fifteen, or twenty years. By the provisions of this bill the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund are to be entrusted with the disposition of this large sum, and not the Legislature. He was against reposing this extensive confidence for so great a length of time. He knew no reason for such a measure but the fear of trusting a subsequent Legislature. He was as much in favor of a speedy extinguishment of the public debt as any man; but he was averse to tying the hands of the Legislature in this way. Of the propriety of continuing this appropriation, the Legislature in existence two years hence, will be better judges than we now are, as they will be better acquainted with the situation of the country than we can possibly be.

If we shall be involved in war, we shall be obliged, under the provisions of this bill, to incur new loans; or we shall be obliged to raise additional taxes, the collection of which being necessarily very slow, will not save us from the necessity of making loans. To refuse to trust a subsequent Legislature must be on the contemplation that such Legislature will not be so righteous or virtuous as ourselves; which opinion Mr. M. said he could not entertain. For these reasons he hoped his amendment would prevail.

MR. RANDOLPH.—I hope the amendment will not be adopted, and that for the plainest reason that can be assigned, that its adoption will be equivalent to the rejection of the bill. The amendment proposes to limit the appropriation to two years; or, in other words, to make no appropriation at all. For, by a reference to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be seen that the necessary reimbursement of the public debt for the ensuing two years requires within about $200,000 of the $7,300,000 proposed to be appropriated by this bill.

The gentleman says, and I agree with him in the opinion, that future Congresses will be as wise as we are, and equally competent to provide for the discharge of the public debt. Those Legislatures may say the same thing of their successors, and in this way provision will never be made. The great question now is, whether Congress will provide for paying the public debt, for which there is now no adequate provision? Whether this bill be passed or not, you must pay above $7,000,000. By passing it, you make no new appropriation; you only provide for paying that which you are already pledged to pay. It is true that you may incur new loans, or you may prolong old ones to pay the instalments becoming due; but I hope the Committee will not agree to do this. I trust that the Committee will be of opinion that this is the time to take efficient measures for the discharge of the whole debt.

The gentleman fears that the Government may be hereafter embarrassed by this large appropriation. On what are his apprehensions founded? Is it apprehended that the revenue beyond the $7,300,000 will not be equal to the current expenditure of the Government? If such are his apprehensions, he ought not to have let go the old taxes which we have recently taken off, and he ought to be ready to lay new ones. But have we not reason to believe that the revenue will be equal to the calls of the Government, when it is recollected that our duties on imports amount to $9,500,000? Instead of devoting to the payment of the debt, the surplus above the expenditures of the Government, it is proposed by this bill to give the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund a definite sum, which shall not be affected by the expenses of the Government. Gentlemen will see, by documents on the table, what these surplusses have been under the old system. It will appear that the expenditure has in many cases exceeded the receipts.

It is certainly true, that occurrences may take place that shall call for resources beyond our total revenue. But does it follow, that Government, under such circumstances, will be hampered by this provision? One million, two hundred thousand dollars only is granted beyond the sum already appropriated, which may be considered as vested in the Sinking Fund. The expedient therefore, of limiting the appropriation does not limit our resources; and a provision is introduced into the bill to derive from the sum of $7,300,000, the expenses incurred under treaties, if it shall be necessary; thus providing for a contingent defalcation of revenue. But if the situation of the country shall be such as to render it necessary to provide for a great defalcation, these provisions will not check us—we must borrow money. What then will be our situation? We shall be paying $1,200,000 with one hand, while we are borrowing a large sum with the other.

The sole effect of the operation effected by this bill, during this and the ensuing year, will be to take a certain portion of the revenue and apply it to the discharge of the debt, leaving the balance to meet the expenses of the Government, instead of first paying the expenses of the Government, and then applying the surplus to the Sinking Fund.

If there shall be a great emergency, will the people have any objection to the imposition of necessary taxes, or to the making loans? When I speak of a great emergency, I allude entirely to war, as no other emergency can happen which will require great expenditures.

Let us take a case which has already occurred. Exclusive of the six per cent. interest which we are bound to pay, we engaged to pay, annually, two per cent. on the principal. Circumstances occurred which called for greater sums than the amount of our revenue. If then the money devoted to this purpose had not been vested in the Sinking Fund, it would have been a resource for navies and armies. We now propose to make the same provision for the deferred and other stock. What would have been the effect upon our stock, if the same provision had been heretofore made, which is now proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey? We might perhaps have had two per cent. instead of eighteen redeemed.

A great effect of this appropriation will be to insure an economical disbursement of the public money, which will be sufficient for every purpose of Government, in case a great emergency does not arise. And should such an emergency arise, can the Committee suppose that a nation which has taken such steps for the establishment of her credit, will be at a loss to borrow money? And money you must borrow, if such an emergency occur; for, in case of a war, the first gun fired will cost you more than $1,200,000, the additional sum appropriated by this bill. It will also be remarked that the sole object of this bill is to provide for the redemption of the public debt, the ensuing years after this and the next year; and if the effects of the peace do not disable us from complying with our engagements in 1802 and 1803, it is clear that we shall be able to apply to the further payment of the debt the same sum thereafter.

H. of R.

Debt of the United States.

I believe the Committee will have little difficulty in agreeing, that if the whole revenue that can be spared shall be applied to the extinguishment of the debt, the situation of the United States will be more advantageous, than if such application had not been made. The national credit must thereby be increased, which will rise in proportion to our ability and disposition to pay. But if we now refuse to make a permanent, irrevocable provision for all the debt, which the first Administration has wisely done in relation to a part, then we may hereafter, at a critical period, be obliged to borrow at an interest, perhaps of ten or twelve per cent.

I regard this bill as involving a principle more important than any which has been adopted by this Government, or which is likely to be adopted, for several years. I regard the motion now made as a death-warrant; as it goes to deprive it of its vital principle—that of guarding the application of the resources of the Government to the diminution of the debt, unless in a great crisis. It is true that in such a case, you cannot touch the revenue which is now pledged; but you can borrow more; and wherein consists the difference between applying your ordinary revenue to the discharge of the debt, and creating by loan an equivalent debt; and the applying the ordinary revenue in the first instance to the current expenses of the Government? The effect is precisely the same.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. MORR, which was lost without a division.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to strike out the fourth section, which authorizes the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, with the approbation of the President, to reloan any of the instalments of the Dutch debt becoming due.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he did not know any necessity for reloaning the foreign debt. The instalment due this year amounts to above $2,000,000. This instalment, we are told by the gentleman from Virginia, has been already remitted. The instalment due the next year amounts to $2,347,000; that due on the ensuing year is short of $2,000,000. Now we have in the Treasury $3,000,000 of specie. Where then can be the difficulty of remitting under these circumstances? The bill purports to be a bill for extinguishing the whole debt, and yet here is a provision to perpetuate it. I hope the section will be stricken out, and that no further authority will be given to extend the debt.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—I believe the gentlemen from Connecticut on reconsidering the reasons which he assigned, will be averse to striking out the section. Let us recur to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. He therein says:

"The inconvenience of paying the large instalments of Dutch debt, which fall due this and the ensuing years, is much increased by the obligation of discharging them abroad, on account both of the injury arising from such considerable portion of the circulating capital of the United States being thus drawn abroad, and of the difficulty and risk which attach to the purchase of so large an amount of remittances. Although those difficulties must be met if they cannot be obviated, it seems proper to adopt every measure which may diminish them. The plan contemplated by the act of the third March, 1795, of converting that debt into a domestic debt, has heretofore been found impracticable, and, from the latest advices, the event of peace absolutely precludes any expectation of its being carried into effect."

The gentleman has offered one of the strongest reasons which could have been assigned, for retaining this provision of the bill, and that is, that the instalment due on the ensuing year exceeds $2,000,000. Wherefore object, instead of making payment of the Dutch debt in the existing instalments, (some of which are extremely burdensome, and others as trivial,) to paying it in equal instalments, and to applying the difference between the amount to be paid, and that actually paid to the extinguishment of the debt at home? By this means the discharge of the debt will be as rapidly going on, and the ultimate period of payment will not be protracted.

It is a fact that the difficulty and danger of payment abroad are much greater than at home, as clearly appears in the case of Fulwar Skipwith, recently before the House. In the transaction to which that case refers, the Secretary of the Treasury encountered such difficulty in obtaining remittances, that he was obliged to contract for the purchase of bullion at a loss of $4,000. This difficulty is at present great, and it is likely to increase. It is so great that the Bank of the United States, though highly disposed to aid the fiscal operations of the Government, and notwithstanding the offer to lodge the money with them six months before the payment is to be made abroad, have formally declared they cannot undertake the agency. Now, after the opinion of the Bank of the United States, (which must be so much better acquainted with the necessary arrangements attending the remittance of money, than any member on this floor,) may I not be permitted to take that opinion, as better authority than the gentleman from Connecticut? Is it not somewhat surprising, that, under such circumstances, the gentleman from Connecticut is opposed to giving to the Government a facility to comply with its engagements, not in the least degree calculated to impair a speedy discharge of the public debt?

APRIL, 1802.

Debt of the United States.

H. OF R.

The gentleman says that in this bill, professing to discharge the whole debt, there is a clause giving perpetuity to it. It is to be presumed that the gentleman has read the bill. If so, I cannot reconcile the avowal of such an opinion with the intelligence and discernment of that gentleman. The gentleman knows that the Dutch debt, consisting of six instalments, is to be paid within six years. He knows, too, that this provision does not delay, but only equalizes them.

MR. S. SMITH.—I am not fully acquainted with the contents of the bill, and when the gentleman from Connecticut was up, I felt disposed to consider this provision for a reloan as unnecessary; but the arguments of the gentleman from Virginia have convinced me that it is necessary, and that the operation may be a good fiscal operation. The fund resulting from the re-exportation of imported articles, will in a great measure cease with the war; and we will of course be thrown for reliance on the exports of our own articles. These for the past year do not amount to more than $33,000,000. From the fund derived from these we will be obliged to pay the value of our imports, and the additional sum for bills of exchange to the amount of these $2,000,000 of Dutch debt. This extraordinary demand for bills of exchange, will probably raise them five per cent. There will, therefore, on the purchase of $2,000,000 in bills, be a charge of $10,000. The like occasion for bills existing for three years will add one-fifteenth part to the whole demand. It may therefore be good policy to vest in the Commissioners, subject to the control of the President, in case the price of bills should be injuriously high, a power to reloan any part of these instalments.

MR. GRISWOLD.—I think I cannot be mistaken in the effect of this provision in perpetuating the debt—a provision that authorizes the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, with the approbation of the President, when instalments become due on the Dutch debt, to reloan them for six years. The Commissioners, and the President may, if they see fit, reloan the whole sum becoming due this year, and so on, and thus perpetuate the debt with new charges; a premium in addition to the ordinary charges. The bill provides that the interest shall not exceed five per cent., and the premium one per cent., so that the amount may be six per cent. interest, which shall continue for six years; and then if you are not ready to pay, I suppose you must go again upon new loans. I am against such a provision, and in favor of that which shall immediately discharge the debt as it falls due.

Nor do I think there will be any inconvenience attending the operation. The Secretary of the Treasury has remitted the whole of the instalment due this year. He has now in the Treasury a specie balance of three millions, with which to pay the two instalments of about two millions each, due for the two ensuing years. Saying there is a difficulty to remit which, with this sum in the Treasury, is, I conceive, saying a very strange thing. I believe the remittance will be perfectly safe and easy, and that it can be better made in peace than in war. The difficulty in the case alluded to, arose altogether from the war. In times of peace there can be no difficulty in remitting. We ought, therefore, to avail ourselves of the present period of peace; we are possessed of ample funds; and though the immediate payment of the debt may subject us to some little inconvenience, I think it is better to submit to that, than to postpone the payment. I know that the millions reloaned might be applied to the reduction of the domestic debt; but I deem it most important to extinguish the foreign debt.

For these reasons, I do say that the tendency of this section is to perpetuate the foreign debt; and though, according to the provisions of this bill, the prolongation can only be for six years, yet at the expiration of that time some new cause may exist for a new loan, and another provision to the like effect be introduced.

MR. RANDOLPH.—With regard to the zeal of the gentleman from Connecticut to extinguish the debt, I suppose it is sufficiently great; but when that gentleman alludes to the whole sum due this year being paid, the Committee will pardon me for considering the zeal and activity of the Secretary of the Treasury as at least equal to the zeal and activity of that gentleman. Now the Secretary of the Treasury, who has demonstrated his zeal by substantial acts, which have produced a benefit to the nation, tells you that it is, in his opinion, necessary to equalize the Dutch debt. The gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH,) whose commercial knowledge no one will deny, tells you that in his opinion, there will be difficulties in obtaining bills of exchange to so large an amount as will be required to meet the existing instalments. The Secretary of the Treasury, though he had engaged all the banks to obtain the best bills, (yet from the recent failures, some will no doubt be bad,) tells you he has experienced great difficulty in making remittance, and infers that there exists no necessity for this provision. He says the large sum of $2,300,000 may be remitted with facility, immediately after the Secretary says it cannot be effected without difficulty; and after the Bank of the United States has determined that the difficulty and danger attending the operation are so great that they will not undertake it; and at the same time that they offer to purchase for the Government all the good bills they can obtain without a commission. Now on which information am I, an ignorant man, unacquainted with mercantile arrangements, to act? that of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has had the experience derived from the purchase of two millions of bills, and of the Bank of the United States; or that of the gentleman from Connecticut, whose talents and knowledge, however, I feel no disposition to depreciate?

Does the gentleman wish the United States to buy good or bad bills? If good, on what basis? Or is his zeal so great that he is willing to remit in specie? I believe, if he stands on this ground, he will find himself in a small minority.

The demand now made by the Secretary of the Treasury shows by his previous conduct that it is not made with the view that is now assigned. The man who, by his indefatigable diligence, has procured the whole remittances of the present year in one third of the time allowed, proves to you that it is no object with him to retard the operations connected with an extinguishment of the present debt. After contemplating the great exertions made by the Secretary, and witnessing the good that has accrued from them, I will not hesitate to give credit to the report of such an officer. That officer might undertake to remit the instalments falling due; he might promise to remit them; but he might, notwithstanding every possible effort, be unable to perform. As therefore he sees that, after all his exertions, difficulties may exist which he cannot surmount, like a good officer, he recommends a legal provision for complying with the engagements of the nation. And this is now to be refused by gentlemen who are not acquainted with the peculiar circumstances that attend the making remittances to Europe. For my part, I know nothing about bills of exchange; but I do know that the Secretary, from the commencement of the session, has regretted the difficulty of purchasing safe bills wherewith to make remittances.

H. OF R.

Debt of the United States.

APRIL, 1802.

"The difficulties and risks," says the Secretary, "attaching to the purchase of remittances, and which can only be obtained at a distance from the Treasury Department, and without any immediate control of any officer of the Government, may not be obviated by any means."

And yet, after this information, gentlemen are prepared to tell the Secretary of the Treasury, who had been two years employed in making these remittances, and who from experience ought to be presumed to be well acquainted with circumstances. We are better acquainted with the duties of your station than you, and we will not grant your request, though you are of opinion that it is required for the preservation of public credit.

Mr. BAYARD.—I do not mean on this occasion to question the eulogium, pronounced by the gentleman from Virginia, on the Secretary of the Treasury, or to say that he is not entitled to our passive confidence; but I mean to say, that according to the provisions of his report, the propriety of this provision cannot be maintained. By his first report, it appears that, in his opinion, it was not necessary to reloan the whole of the Dutch debt. He says "the inconvenience and difficulty of procuring remittances to that amount, and the real injury arising from such heavy disbursements abroad, render an extension of the terms of payment, by partial reloans, a desirable object."

He says "partial reloans"—the bill before us authorizes a reloan of the whole Dutch debt. The Secretary goes on—"All that seems wanted is, that the gross amount of payments, which are to take place during the eight next years, should be more equally apportioned among those years."

Now, according to this report, the bill before us is improper. But, in my opinion, it can be demonstrated that it is good policy as soon as practicable to pay off the whole of this foreign debt. We are told by the Secretary that we have the power to pay it off. We do not know that we shall next year have the power. Before that time we may be involved in war, and then we shall not be able to pay it. Now we have the power. I ask then whether it is not now better to pay it, than to trust to contingencies which may prostrate our public faith? I find that for the last year nearly the same sum was remitted as will be required for the year 1803; and what was the impression then made? I do not know any great inconvenience that was then experienced; nor do I know that bills are now higher than they then were. But, even if there should be a small inconvenience attending the discharge of this debt, I ask whether it would not be proper, notwithstanding, to put our shoulders to the wheel at this favorable period?

It has been properly remarked, by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) that this provision may augment the debt; for we know that loans cannot be made without additional charges. We cannot therefore see from any information before us, that we should be able to make a reloan for a lesser expense than that attending a remittance.

If gentlemen will look at the documents on the table, they will see that the Secretary contemplates the extinguishment in 1809 of certain portions of the debt, in which are included the payment of all the instalments of Dutch debt; on this system any reloan will break in.

Upon the whole, as the inconvenience urged is entirely specious, as it is at best possible, and may probably be altogether avoided, I think it best to run the risk, rather than endanger the early payment of the debt.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—We find by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury an appropriation of $7,300,000, proposed to be annually applied to the discharge of the whole public debt. In the accompanying documents it is stated that one instalment on the Dutch debt of $2,271,692, will be due in 1802; $2,347,038, in 1803; $1,942,028, in 1804; $1,734,119 50, in 1805; and $1,325,019 in 1806.

Instead of paying off these sums as they become due, which, it will be observed, are various in amount, the Secretary has thought that it would be most prudent to equalize the instalments. To effect this object he has requested that authority may be vested in the President to make partial reloans. According to the present terms, the Dutch debt will be entirely paid in 1809; and it is not intended that any of the proposed reloans should retard the extinguishment. I am inclined to think this provision of the bill is not so precise to this effect as it ought to be; as by it the new loans are not necessarily reimbursable till a period beyond 1809. I will therefore move so to amend the bill as to make all the reloans reimbursable before 1809.

[Mr. N. offered a motion to this effect.]

Mr. GRISWOLD.—I do not like that arrangement. The eight per cent. stock is calculated to be paid off in 1809. If you carry forward to that period the final payment of the Dutch debt, you will necessarily prevent the payment of the eight per cent. stock, from the inability of the Government at one time to pay both. It is to be considered that the interest of eight per cent. is war interest, and that it will be the interest of the Government to pay off the principal as soon as possible; and the ability to pay that stock in 1808 and 1809 will arise principally from the smallness of the foreign instalments.

APRIL, 1802.

Debt of the United States.

H. of R.

I am also opposed to procrastinate the payment of the Dutch debt by reloans, as they will probable cost more than any other description of debt, perhaps equal to the eight per cent. stock, from the premium and charges which always attend loans. I am also opposed to this measure from the difficulty of making remittances in time of war.

With respect to the merits of the Secretary of the Treasury in remitting, I do not wish to detract from them; though the operation is as plain as A, B, C. Bills are below par, there is money enough in the Treasury, and all that the Secretary has to do is to direct the cashiers of the banks to buy bills. I have no doubt, the Secretary has acted in this business with propriety, as every Secretary ought to, and would act. I am sensible too that bills may next year be above par. But still, should this be the case, the expense will not equal that of reloans.

As to the conduct of the banks on this occasion, I know not how it is; but I presume it is such as the gentleman from Virginia has stated it. They may not make the remittance without compensation; but I have no doubt but that if a proper premium is offered they will undertake it. They are like merchants, and we must pay for these agencies what other people pay.

MR. RANDOLPH.—The gentleman from Connecticut seems to reason, as if this provision were imperative; whereas it does not declare that the instalments of the Dutch debt shall not be paid in the precise proportion of the existing instalments; it only vests a discretionary power, because those who are well acquainted with the business of remittance, know the difficulty attending it, and wish to meet it by legal provisions.

It is probable that the Secretary will be obliged to buy bills above par on England, and then buy bills below on Holland, thus incurring a double loss. For my part I have no objection to vesting in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund and the President, this discretionary power, because I believe the existing instalments, without a recurrence to reloans, will be paid, if the payment be advantageous to the United States.

The gentleman says, if the Dutch debt is left to 1809, we shall not be able to pay the eight per cent. domestic debt. But, by withholding the payment of the intermediate instalments, you will be in a situation to meet the whole Dutch debt in 1809; and if the price in the market of the eight per cent. will admit it, it may be bought with the millions spared by the postponement of the payment of the Dutch debt.

The remarks of the gentleman respecting bills being below par, and the facility of purchasing them, may apply perhaps to ordinary cases, where only small sums are required; but when a demand for two millions, beyond the current demand, is superadded, will not the necessary effect be to enhance the price of bills? But suppose the individuals from whom bills are generally purchased have no right to draw beyond the ordinary demand for bills, what will be the effect? Is Government to be driven, no matter what length—to put, as the gentlemen say, their shoulders to the wheel? In answer, I will say that the Government have put their shoulders to the wheel, and have manifested in their actions the most unequivocal disposition to pay off the debt; but, notwithstanding this disposition, they are unwilling to put the country to the inconveniences that may arise from the payment of the large instalment due in 1803—they are therefore in favor of equalizing it.

Besides, if every dollar that is saved from the Dutch debt be applied to the payment of bank loans, navy stock, or eight per cents. will there be less debt extinguished? Will not such application of the public moneys promote as highly the public interest; and have gentlemen shown that the ultimate redemption of the debt will be prolonged for a moment?

MR. S. SMITH said this section, and others that follow, were of considerable importance; the effects of which he had but little considered. He therefore wished the Committee might rise, and time be allowed for further consideration until tomorrow. It appeared to him that the provision in the bill would answer one good object at least. Persons who have bills, may hold them up, and the Secretary of the Treasury, having this power, may keep down the price. If the provisions should have no other effect, this may be a very important one.

The Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, April 14.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the better security of public money and property in the hands of public officers and agents," together with the amendments agreed to yesterday, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to amend an act for the relief and protection of disabled seamen, was read the third time, and passed—yeas 36, nays 33.

Previously to the passage, Mr. ELMER spoke at some length against the bill.

MR. ELMENDORF moved the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of making further regulations respecting the marine corps. The object of this motion was to authorize the President to reduce the officers of the corps proportionably with the reduction made of the privates, who had been reduced from one thousand two hundred to four hundred, whereas the number of officers remained forty, though twenty were sufficient.

In reply, it was stated by Mr. S. SMITH, that fifteen vacancies had occurred, which the President had declined filling; that the present number of officers was twenty-five; and when five more vacancies should occur, the relative proportion of officers and privates would be attained; that it was proper to leave the disposition of the corps under the discretion of the President, as in the event, during the recess, of a war with the Emperor of Morocco, which was far from improbable, an augmentation might be expedient.

The motion of reference was lost—yeas 29, nays 43.

UNITED STATES DEBT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States.

Mr. GRISWOLDS motion, to strike out the fourth section, being under consideration—

Mr. RANDOLPH said: I rise to repeat the reasons which I urged yesterday against the prevalence of this motion. I believe that every substantial objection may be avoided by a slight amendment, so that the power given may be to borrow in relation to the instalments now due, and not again to reloan for the new loans that may be made. This will remove all idea respecting the effect of this provision to perpetuate the public debt. The powers of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund enable them now to borrow, provided remittances cannot be made. The power to borrow forms a prominent feature in all your sinking funds. They have also a power to sell, below par, stock created by themselves. It is evident, therefore, that by this provision no new powers are given; but that, on the contrary, old powers are limited and restricted; nor will there be one dollar less applied to the redemption of the public debt under this clause than if it had never existed.

Gentlemen not acquainted with this subject know not the difficulty of making remittances to Holland. To meet these difficulties this section proposes to vest discretionary powers in the Commissioners and the President. If struck out, it must be from diffidence in the persons in whom you have heretofore so liberally confided; and this will be in direct hostility with the principles of the sinking fund, which confer on the board such tremendous powers, even the power of selling half the stock they create below par. Is not, then, the extent of the power given by this section less destructive than that already vested? For there is now a sum of near five millions, which it is in the power of the Commissioners to create, and to sell half of it below par.

It does not belong to me to question the motives of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) in making this motion; but what will be the effect of it should it prevail? The Government will be either entirely unable to make remittances to Holland, or be obliged to remit to Holland, through England, at an expense of at least ten per cent., or to remit the specie. What will be the consequence? Why that same clamor in the nation that some gentlemen would wish now to produce. I hope that the gentleman from Connecticut is not of this description of persons, and that he will not be for precipitating the Government, by their own acts, into a situation which shall hereafter create popular clamor.

I trust that the Committee will consider these circumstances, and perceive that the discretionary powers given by this act to the Commissioners under the direction of the President is a necessary power, and one, by the exercise of which, the public welfare cannot be hazarded. Before the year 1801, the instalments on the Dutch debt were trifling in amount; as they never exceeded annually more than a million. Does the gentleman from Connecticut believe, or is he prepared to acknowledge the former Secretary to be inferior to the present? and what will he say to the conduct of the former Secretary, who was obliged to create stock at a loss of twelve per cent.? If, then, this took place under the former Secretary, when it was not required to remit more than a million, may not the difficulty be greater when the instalments are more than double? Strange to tell, the gentleman from Connecticut has ascribed the difficulty, under the late Secretary, to the existence of war, which was the very reason for facilitating remittance, owing to our extended trade. But when trade shall be restored to its ancient channels, the probability is, that bills to so great an amount on Holland, as will be required, cannot be purchased, and it is probable that a double loss will be incurred by purchasing bills through England.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—I do not perfectly understand the arguments of the gentleman from Virginia. He says that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund have greater powers than are conferred by this law, and that this law is designed to limit them; and yet he says if we do not confer these powers, we shall hazard the public credit. I do not understand how these two arguments can stand together. I believe that this fourth section confers greater powers than the Commissioners now possess. The gentleman says, that under the act of March 3, 1795, powers are given the Commissioners commensurate to the objects of their institution. But the power given to meet the instalments on the Dutch debt was only to borrow when necessary. I have no objection to give this power when the state of the Treasury requires it. I, therefore, do not propose to repeal that act. But that act gives no power to borrow, when the money wanted is in the Treasury; and, for that reason, this section has been introduced. Conceiving, therefore, that this section will extend, instead of limit, the powers of the Commissioners, I object to it.

Again, the gentleman from Virginia says, that by the act of May, 1796, which gave authority to borrow five millions, the Commissioners have more extensive power, and that that power still exists. If it does exist, the section is not calculated to abridge it, for this law expressly continues it. But I think that act does not give the present power to borrow the sum therein authorized. [Here Mr. G. quoted the act.] Now, it appears that the authority to borrow five millions was in order to pay the debt due to the Bank of the United States, branch bank of New York, and the instalment of the Dutch debt due that year. That year is passed; the debts then due are paid, and of course the power is gone with the occasion for which it was created; the law was only passed to enable the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to meet the pressing demands of that year. Those demands have been satisfied, and the power consequently ceases. The power given by the law of 1795 is all that is necessary; and under that power it never was contemplated that the Commissioners should borrow when there was money sufficient in the Treasury. For these reasons I do not think we ought to enlarge the powers of the Commissioners. Nor do I believe that there will be any difficulty in making remittance for 1803. There is no prospect that bills on Europe will be under par; the prospect is that they will rise. In consequence of the great price of our produce, we have had a great influx of cash, by which we have been enabled to pay off a great proportion of debt due in Europe, and there is less amount of debt due now than at any former period since the war. We shall not probably run in debt as formerly, and bills will rise; our credits in Europe will extend, with which the demand for bills will increase; they will of course rise, and in two or three years we shall be obliged to give more for them than now. This, therefore, is the time to make remittance for 1803. Why we should be exposed to the postponement of this payment, when it can now be made on better terms than hereafter, is to me unintelligible. If we do not do this, the effect will be to perpetuate the debt.

Debt of the United States.

H. OF R.

It does not appear to me clear, that under this section, the Commissioners may not reloan after the six years during which the present instalments are due; and, in this way, the debt may be perpetuated to the end of time. I, therefore, am decidedly of opinion, that it is best to go on in the old way, until some embarrassment shall occur, which we shall be in time to provide for at the next session of Congress.

I have no objection to repose, with the gentleman from Virginia, implicit confidence in the Executive. But I never have thought that it was a sufficient argument for the adoption of any measure, to say that it had been recommended by a Secretary of the Treasury. I have always thought that we ought to judge for ourselves; and, so judging, I think we must conclude that this provision is unnecessary.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—I am sorry to be so unintelligible to the gentleman from Connecticut; but when the laws of the United States are so unintelligible to that gentleman—those laws which are doubtless drawn with perspicuity, and some of them drawn by himself—how can an individual member expect to be understood? The gentleman says the Commissioners have no power to borrow money for the payment of the instalments of Dutch debt under the act of May, 1796. Now, I am willing to test everything I have said by the accuracy of the construction which I have put on that law. I wish the Committee to attend to the act, and to see what reliance ought to be placed on the facts or deductions of that gentleman. The act says:

"That it shall be lawful for the Commissioners

'of the Sinking Fund, with the approbation of 'the President of the United States, to borrow, or 'cause to be borrowed, on the credit of the United 'States, any sum not exceeding five millions of 'dollars, to be applied to the payment of the capital or principal, of any parts of the debt of the 'United States now due, or to become due, during 'the course of the present year, to the Bank of 'the United States, or to the Bank of New York,' 'or for any instalments of foreign debt.'" And yet the gentleman gravely says, that this law only applies to one year. Now, let me ask, is the sum due abroad in 1802 an instalment of foreign debt, or is it not? The words "now due, or to become due," clearly refer to this foreign debt, and the term "any instalment," refers to future instalments becoming due.

The gentleman further says that this section gives powers in addition to those already possessed by the Commissioners. It is true that they are in addition, but it is also true that they are in qualification of those powers. If the debt provided for were a domestic debt, there would not be a shadow of difference. This provision will not prevent the Commissioners from buying good bills; but it will provide for the contingency of your having abundance of money here, and but little whereon to draw in Holland. Your engagements must be complied with. Now, is it best that, in order to provide for such an emergency, the Commissioners should have the power granted in this section, which will not prolong the final payment of the debt, or that they should be obliged to exercise the power of creating stock not redeemable till 1819, which will be the case with stock created under the act of May, 1796?

The gentleman further says, that this provision will perpetuate the debt. But a simple amendment to inhibit reloan, additional to those contemplated to be authorized by this bill, will prevent this. But we are charged with the strange and novel doctrine of confidence in the Executive. And what does this charge arise from? An officer, who has remitted two millions nine months before it was due, a gentleman whose fiscal knowledge the gentleman from Connecticut might have availed himself of, is not to be confided in; while the mere ipsi dixit of the gentleman from Connecticut is to be confided in! Upon my soul, while I admire the ingenuity, I cannot admire the modesty of the gentleman!

The gentleman says, it is time enough to meet embarrassments when they occur; but I will tell him it is our business to prevent them from occurring; and, I believe, the gentleman from Connecticut has not given evidences of greater knowledge on this subject than the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Bank of the United States, or the best informed merchants. For my part, I do not pretend to mercantile knowledge. I am ready to grant that the mercantile knowledge of that gentleman is much greater than mine. I do confess, that, on such subjects, I have always relied upon the Secretary of the Treasury, the banks, or the best informed merchants. But, while I allow the superior mercantile information of the gentleman, I doubt the accuracy of the sources from which it is drawn, the more especially as I do not find it supported by the information of mercantile men from the seaports, and from other respectable sources.

H. OF R.

Debt of the United States.

The question was then taken on striking out the fourth section, and lost—ayes 21, noes 41.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved, and Mr. RANDOLPH seconded, an amendment limiting the power of the Commissioners to the reloan of the instalments of Dutch debt becoming due in 1803, 1804, 1805, and 1806.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he offered this amendment to meet the ideas of gentlemen who considered the original provisions of the bill as vesting a power that might be exercised to the prolongation of the ultimate payment of the Dutch debt.

The amendment was agreed to without a division.

The sixth section, being under consideration, is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund be, and they hereby are, empowered, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to employ, if they shall deem it necessary, an agent in Europe, for the purpose of transacting any business relative to the discharge of the Dutch debt, and to the loan authorized by this or any other act, for the purpose of discharging the same; and also to allow him a compensation not exceeding three thousand dollars a year, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. GRISWOLD said he did not see the necessity of an agent in Europe. The business had heretofore been well done by bankers. If an individual be sent, he may not be perfectly responsible in fortune or character. Mr. G. concluded by moving to strike out the sixth section.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—In answer to the gentleman I will read an extract from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. He says: "For this purpose it would be necessary to give an express authority to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund; and, in order to enable them to transact in the most advantageous manner, both that and any other business relative to that debt, it would be eligible to give them a power, if they shall find it necessary, to employ a special agent in Holland. The usefulness of that arrangement had been some years ago suggested by this department; and its necessity is now much increased by the increased extent of the payments and transactions in Holland relative thereto."

By this section no reflection is intended on the agents heretofore employed; their abilities have never been questioned. But it will be recollected that these agencies may be required in England, as the stock is generally lower in the Seven Provinces than in England. I should have expected that the appointment of a responsible agent would have been the last thing objected to. It is not proposed to make him our cashier, but to place him under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to do whatever the interests of the United States require in relation to the debt. This, too, is a power, which is only to be exercised when the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund shall think it necessary. Now, is it not strange to deny a power of appointing an agent at an expense not exceeding three thousand dollars, where you already have given the power of disposing of millions?

Mr. GRISWOLD.—I do not know whether the Commissioners will not have the power of appointing agents without this provision; but I am afraid that it may be intended, in this formal way, to transfer the payment of the debt from the bankers to this agent. I would, therefore, rather leave the business where it now is, to be exercised under the responsibility of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund.

The question was then taken on striking out the sixth section, and lost—ayes 30, noes 38.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—If the object of the fifth section is only to get the bank to remit to Holland, I presume gentlemen will have no objection to strike out the words, "or individuals."

[Those words, in connexion, stand thus: "The Commissioners are empowered to contract, either with the Bank of the United States, or with any other public institution, or with individuals, for the payment in Holland of the whole, or any part of the Dutch debt."]

This power, said Mr. G., is very extensive. Nine millions are due in Holland, for the payment of which the Commissioners may make a contract with an individual, and, if he fail, the public may be obliged to pay the whole over again, and thus endanger the public property. I, therefore, move to strike out the words, "or with individuals."

Mr. RANDOLPH said he did not say that the sole object of the section was to enable the Commissioners to contract with the bank, though he presumed the Commissioners would prefer contracting with the bank. The gentleman surely did not mean it as a serious argument in favor of his motion, that the individual contracted with will run off and endanger the public property; as he knows that, at present, the Commissioners buy bills from individuals, and if they fail, the public loses. It is obvious, therefore, that this section increases the security of the Government.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—I have always thought it a bad mode of paying debts through contractors. I know that Government purchases bills from individuals, but I know that the amounts purchased are small, and, therefore, the loss inconsiderable that arises from the failure of an individual; but if you contract with individuals for the whole, if you lose at all, you will lose to an enormous amount. I believe Government will act right; but several things are said; it is said the French Government would wish to contract for the payment of the Dutch debt, and that we would advance the money to them here. I believe that that would be a very bad bargain.

Mr. BACON thought this power very different from that of buying bills. It must be a very important individual who shall be equal to the payment of this debt, and equal to securing the United States in any contract he may make with them. Mr. B. said that this was his opinion, though he might be mistaken.

APRIL, 1802.

Debt of the United States.

H. of R.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—The gentleman is mistaken. This provision gives no power to the Commissioners to contract with an individual. They may negotiate with a number of individuals, in proportion to the number of whom the security is enhanced.

Mr. BAYARD moved to strike out all that part of the section (including the words to be stricken out by Mr. GRISWOLD) which authorizes the Commissioners to contract for the payment of the Dutch debt. He said he saw neither the necessity or utility of this provision for paying the debt, which must be made with individuals, or with bodies corporate. He wished to know why the Commissioners could not pay it themselves? He wished to know if the provision would have any other effect than to augment the sum paid; in fact to create two debts; for, by incurring the last, you do not expunge the first. By this section there is no limitation. The Commissioners may contract with individuals to pay the whole nine millions.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—I will ask one simple question. At whose risk are the payments now made? By whom are they now paid? It is very easy for one man to pay a debt to his neighbor; but if he has to make payment in Europe or India, it must be by others. There will, of course, be a risk; and even if he insures, he does not insure the solvency of the insurer. Does the gentleman mean to say that the actual payment of the foreign debt is not worth more than the nominal amount of it? If so, why have Congress offered to foreign creditors a transmutation of their demands into a domestic debt, with one-half per cent. increase? The French creditors availed themselves of the offer; but the Dutch creditors would not, and the whole present inconvenience arises from this refusal. You are now obliged to make payment in Holland, and yet the gentleman says such pay is worth nothing. What is this provision but saying that, instead of relying on the individual drawers of bills, we prefer to rely on the banks, or on a number of individuals?

The question was taken on Mr. BAYARD's motion to strike out, and lost—ayes 28, noes 42.

When Mr. GRISWOLD's motion recurred to strike out, "or with individuals;" which was lost.

Mr. BAYARD then moved the following amendment: "Provided the United States shall not pay more than the nominal amount of the debt, and the expenses thereon authorized by this act."

Mr. BAYARD.—My object now is very different from that which I had in the motion I previously made. Under this power the Commissioners may contract to pay twelve or fifteen millions instead of nine millions of dollars. I am not opposed to a liberal confidence in the Executive; but I am more disposed to trust our laws, to rely on ourselves, and we are surely unworthy of legislating when we cease to pursue our own judgments. I have no other view in this motion than to say that my sole object is to prevent the payment of more than the nominal amount of this debt. In this amendment I have designated the expenses authorized by this law beyond the principal and interest. Now, I call upon gentlemen, if there are any proper expenses not designated, to designate them. Let them do this, and then we shall be acting upon ground that we understand. Do gentlemen want greater power than this? As the matter now stands, you may not only pay the principal and interest of the foreign debt, but a profitable job may be made of it. I do not mean to insinuate that any such thing is intended; but I do not see the propriety of giving more power than is necessary. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will prevail, and that we shall not give the unlimited power contained in the bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—I am sorry to be so troublesome to the Committee, but I deem it necessary to defend the bill against the objections of gentlemen who do not seem to understand it. The gentleman asks what risks are to be avoided by this provision? I will answer him; that very risk of making remittances, which has cost so much, and for getting rid of which half of one per cent. has been offered to be sacrificed. If the Commissioners, according to the gentleman from Delaware, wish to make a lucrative job, what have they to do but to give more than the value of bills? Is not the discretion given by the bill necessarily involved in the nature of the institution? They may now sell one-half the stock they issue for one cent in the dollar; and, by collusion, they may buy bad bills. These are the powers they now possess. It is evident, therefore, that the whole objection is futile.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—The object of the amendment is to limit the profit allowed to contractors. I do not see why we ought not to limit it. If the gentleman is disposed to allow a profit, let it be limited, and let them not grasp at too much. I do not believe it will be in the power of the bank, or of individuals, to make remittance better than the Government itself. I aver that this has been done under as good terms by the Government as it can be done by individuals. This has been the case heretofore, and it will undoubtedly continue to be the case.

Mr. BAYARD.—My object simply is to act on this subject as on all others. We are bound to our constituents to know the expenses attending this business before we allow them. Now I call upon gentlemen to say whether they are ready to pay, not only the amount of the debt, but all expenses, no matter however great, which may be incurred? We are told by the gentleman from Virginia, that we have given almost unlimited discretion to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and the inference he draws from this fact is, that we should now take away all limits to discretion. We go on a different principle; we are willing to delegate all necessary powers; the power, for example, of purchasing bills; but we are not willing to convert a debt of nine millions into one of fifteen millions. Are gentlemen, in short, prepared to authorize expenses they know nothing about? This is a new doctrine, and particularly from gentlemen on the other side.

H. OF R.

Debt of the United States.

APRIL, 1802.

The question was then taken on Mr. BAYARD'S amendment, and lost—yeas 23, nays 42.

Mr. B. then moved so to amend the fourth section, by striking out certain words, as to prevent the bill from empowering the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to borrow under the law of May, 1796, under a construction, which he contended the bill gave, that that act was in force. As soon as the year in which that act was passed was over, those debts were paid, and the act ceased; a Legislative construction that that act is still in force, may perhaps justify the Executive in considering it so. Suppose it is in force, there will be nothing in this act to repeal it. If the object is not, by a side-wind, to authorize the borrowing of five millions, under the idea that this act is still in force, gentlemen will have no objection to this amendment. This I affirm can be the only effect of the present provision. If gentlemen have this object let them avow it. I am, indeed, greatly surprised at these provisions in this bill. Its title is very splendid and promising; but when we come to the bill, we find it contains an authority to loan nine millions abroad, and to borrow five millions at home; and in this way gentlemen mean to extinguish the debt. I, therefore, do hope, that if it is not the intention of gentlemen indirectly to revive this loan, authorizing the borrowing of five millions, they will agree to my amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—If the gentleman from Delaware can prove to me that the act of May, 1796, has expired, I should be the first to second his motion. But I am convinced that it has not, and cannot, so long as any instalment of foreign debt remains due. These are the terms of the act, which fix its duration. For my part I should be pleased to have it proved that it is not in force, and that there was no such power vested in the sinking fund, to create stock, as therein authorized, in any circumstances.

When the Committee draughted this bill, it became them to provide, that all the powers already vested in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund should not be invalidated. Suppose, in this bill, such a provision should have been omitted, we would have been then told, that the public faith was endangered; that there was no telling what might happen in two or three years; and that, if this power were taken away, the Commissioners might be disabled from complying with the engagements of the Government with the public creditors. We should have heard of injuries inflicted on public credit, and of violation of the public faith! This provision has in truth no other effect than that of leaving things exactly where they are, and telling the courts that this present act shall not affect a previous law. This act, therefore, really does nothing. It is clear, however, to me, that the provision of the act of May, 1796, is still in force, and that you can only get rid of it in two ways, either by paying off all the instalments of foreign debt, or by the Commissioners' borrowing to the extent of the five millions.

The gentleman says, that while we profess to pay the public debt, we are calling, by side-winds, for the power to borrow five millions. We say no such thing; we only say that the authorities of the sinking fund, heretofore given by law, shall not be affected by this bill. When we want loans, we will call for them directly. We trust that none of the provisions of the act of May, 1796, will be necessary, and that we shall not be obliged to create stock irredeemable till the year 1819, or to sell half the stock created at any market value below par. If the gentleman had examined attentively this proviso, he would have found it to be a thing of course, and copied almost verbatim from former acts.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—It is admitted that no part of this bill goes to repeal the act of May, 1796; that act, therefore, cannot be affected by this. I ask, then, why this section is introduced? Can it be introduced for no other purpose than to give the consent of the Legislature to the existence of that law? Is it proper to give a Legislative sanction to the continuance of the act of May, 1796? The gentleman from Virginia says, he would wish to see this power out of existence. Why, then, not leave it where it is? That the power has expired is evident from the words. They are: "That the Commissioners may borrow any sum not exceeding five millions of dollars, to be applied to the payment of the capital, or principal, of any parts of the debt of the United States, now due, during the course of the present year, to the Bank of the United States, or to the Bank of New York, or for any instalment of foreign debt."

The plain meaning of these words is, that the Commissioners may borrow, for any part of the debt now due, to or become due during the current year, first to the Bank of the United States, secondly to the Bank of New York, and, lastly, for any instalment of foreign debt. This is the plain meaning of the statute, and this must be the construction put upon it, for the authority to borrow is expressly confined to that year. It was not contemplated at the passage of the act that the power should be continued beyond the year. The fact is, we had contracted debts with the banks, and instalments of foreign debt were due; and to save our credit, a loan of five millions was authorized to meet these specific objects. It, therefore, is evident that this provision of the law of May, 1796, has expired, and the effect of the present provision of this law is to revive the power of making a loan of nearly five millions; for, under the act of 1796, the Commissioners only borrowed about eighty thousand dollars. I, therefore, hope the words will be stricken out.

Mr. BAYARD said he would only ask if the act was in force which gave authority to borrow five millions, whether the gentleman could have thought it necessary now to give the power of re-lending the instalments on the Dutch debt here, or in Europe? On this point he thought it was impossible to doubt. He beseeched gentlemen to examine the bill. He did not know who drew the bill. He presumed it was drawn by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; but he was sure that he had introduced into it an idea not intended by him.

APRIL, 1802.

Debt of the United States.

H. OF R.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—The gentleman from Delaware asks, if the law of 1796 is still in force, where is the necessity of the power given in the present act to reloan the instalments of the Dutch debt? I will answer the gentleman in a few words. That power is necessary because the loan authorized by the act of 1796 is not reimburseable till the year 1819, whereas, under this law, the reloan of the Dutch debt are reimburseable within six years.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—If the gentleman from Delaware will look into the act of 1796, he will find that an indefinite power is thereby given to the Commissioners to borrow any sums to meet the instalments of debt become due, provided that no greater interest than six per cent. be allowed.

The question was then taken on Mr. BAYARD's motion, and lost—ayes 28, noes 37.

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill with one amendment, which was immediately agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD renewed his motion, made in Committee of the Whole, viz: to strike out, at the end of the fourth section, the following words:

"Provided always, That the power herein given shall not be construed to repeal, or affect the power given to the Commissioners by an act, entitled 'An act making provision for the payment of certain debts of the United States,' to borrow certain sums, and to sell the shares in the Bank of the United States belonging to the United States, in the manner, on the terms, and for the purposes authorized by the said act."

On which the yeas and nays were—yeas 27 nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—John Bacon, James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, John Campbell, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, Archibald Henderson, William Hoge, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Lowndes, Lewis R. Morris, Thomas Morris, James Mott, Nathan Read, John Cotton Smith, Josiah Smith, Henry Southard, John Stanley, John Stratton, Samuel Tenney, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, and Henry Woods.

NAYS—Willis Alston, John Archer, Theodorus Bailey, Phanuel Bishop, Richard Brent, Robert Brown, William Butler, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Condit, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, William Dickson, Lucas Elmendorf, William Eustis, John Fowler, Edwin Gray, John A. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, John P. Van Ness, Isaac Van Horne, and Robert Williams.

Mr. BAYARD moved to amend the bill by adding to the end of the fourth section the following additional proviso, to wit:

"And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to revive any act, or part of an act, authorizing the loan of money; and heretofore expired."

Mr. RANDOLPH said he had no objection to the amendment; which was carried without a division.

7th CON.—38

Mr. GRISWOLD renewed a motion made by him in the Committee of the Whole, to strike out of the fifth section the following words, that are in italics, viz:

"That, for the purpose of more effectually securing the reimbursement of the Dutch debt, the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund may, and they hereby are empowered, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to contract either with the Bank of the United States, or with any other public institution, or with individuals, for the payment, in Holland, of the whole, or any part of the principal of the said Dutch debt, and of the interest and charges accruing on the same, as the said demands become due, on such terms as the said Commissioners shall think most advantageous to the United States; or"

Mr. G. called the yeas and nays, which were—yeas 26, nays 48, as follows:

NAYS—Willis Alston, John Archer, Theodorus Bailey, Robert Brown, William Butler, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Condit, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, William Dickson, Lucas Elmendorf, William Eustis, John Fowler, John A. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, John P. Van Ness, Isaac Van Horne, and Robert Williams.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to amend the fourth section by inserting the words following, in brackets:

"Be it enacted, That the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund be, and they hereby are, empowered, with the approbation of the President of the United States, [in case the advance upon exchange between the United States and Holland shall exceed five per cent.; and in case difficulty shall occur in making remittance,] as any instalments, or parts of the principal of the said Dutch debt become due, to borrow on the credit of the United States, either in America or abroad, either by a reloan or prolongation of the loan heretofore obtained, or by new loan, the sums requisite for the payment of the said instalments, or parts of principal."

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to amend the foregoing amendment, by striking out the word "and," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "or."

Mr. GRISWOLD said the word "or" was a small word, but in this case it was a very important one, as it entirely defeated the object of his amendment. He must, therefore, request the yeas and nays on inserting it; which were accordingly taken as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon,

MR. BAYARD moved to amend the amendment. The word "difficulty" was so indefinite as to mean anything. He, therefore, moved to introduce, after the word "difficulty," the following words, "such as shall render it impracticable to make remittances of any instalments becoming due on the 'Dutch debt.'" Motion lost.

MR. NICHOLSON.—I voted against the motion of the gentleman from Delaware, because I considered it too vague to have any good effect; but as I am disposed to accommodate him in the adoption of his idea, I move further to amend the said amendment, as now amended, by striking out therefrom the words "difficulty shall occur in making remittances," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words "such difficulties shall occur in 'making remittances, as in the opinion of the Commissioners, shall render the purchase of bills 'inexpedient.'" Carried without a division.

MR. GRISWOLD.—Can the question be divided on the amendment as amended? If so, I call for a division at the word "or."

MR. ELMENDORF.—I take it a gentleman cannot divide his own motion.

The SPEAKER decided that the question was divisible; whereupon the question was taken by yeas and nays, on the call of MR. GRISWOLD, on the first member of the amendment, as follows—"In case the advance upon exchange between the United States and Holland, shall exceed five per cent., or"—and lost, as follows:

NAYS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, Robert Brown, William Butler, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Condit, Richard Cutts, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, William Dickson, Lucas Elmendorf, Ebenezer Elmer, John Fowler, Edwin Gray, John A. Hanna, Joseph Heister, Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, Isaac Van Horne, and Robert Williams.—49.

MR. BAYARD.—The question is now on the second member of the amendment.

MR. RANDOLPH.—It falls of course with the failure of the first member.

MR. BAYARD.—I move to strike out the word "or."

MR. SPEAKER.—The word "or" was put in by a vote of the House; it is, therefore, not in order to strike it out.

MR. BAYARD.—I move, then, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, (MR. NICHOLSON), as a distinct motion.

MR. RANDOLPH considered the whole decided on, as the Chair had already determined.

MR. SPEAKER.—The motion of the gentleman from Delaware is not in order.

MR. BAYARD.—I have another amendment to offer. The sixth section provides for employing an agent abroad, whom it contemplates to give three thousand dollars a year. I can only consider this provision as intended to create an office, which some one is to fill, and to receive three thousand dollars a year. It is the doctrine of the day to reduce Executive patronage. We ought not, therefore, to knock down one office, and immediately establish another. We have lately put down one office at the Hague, which cost the nation four thousand five hundred dollars a year. The people were congratulated upon the saving. Circulars were written by honorable gentlemen, informing their constituents of it as a great thing; and now we impose upon those gentlemen the necessity of writing other circulars to state that another office is created with a salary of three thousand dollars. It is surely improper to give gentlemen this trouble. Is there any difference between an agent and a diplomatic character? I do not know but that the object may be to have a political agent for the Government to correspond with. If we had no occasion for a Minister, we can have no occasion for an agent. All the business required by this act can be done through a mercantile house, which must at all events be employed by the agent.

There are other parts of the bill from which I find, that though we are saving by parsimony in one hand, we are disbursing with prodigality in the other. One of the provisions of the bill allows one quarter per cent. for borrowing two millions, which commission will amount to six thousand dollars. With respect, however, to this section, I consider it as disbursing the public money unnecessarily. I therefore move to strike out the sixth section, which is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund be, and they hereby are, empowered, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to employ, if they shall deem it necessary, an agent in Europe, for the purpose of transacting any business relative to the discharge of the Dutch debt, and to the loan authorized by this or any other act, for the purpose of discharging the same; and also to allow him a compensation not exceeding three thousand dollars a year, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. BAYARD called the yeas and nays on striking out, which were—yeas 18, nays 43, as follows:

Mr. BAYARD moved to amend the fifth section, by striking out the word "fourth" and inserting the word eighth. Mr. B. said this was the commission allowed the agent of the commissioners for purchasing bills, &c. One fourth per cent. commission would on two millions amount to five thousand dollars. One eighth per cent. would amount to two thousand five hundred dollars, which he deemed a competent sum.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—The gentleman from Delaware is indeed grown extremely saving of the public money of late days! We are told that the amount of commissions on the purchase of two millions three hundred thousand dollars will be five thousand dollars. Let it, however, be remarked, that this great sum is to be purchased not by one individual, but by a great many, scattered all over the United States. It is true that the Bank of the United States has offered its services gratis. But it has appeared to me that the commission allowed in the bill is a small charge in the case of a provision like this, and that the individual who is entrusted with such a power ought to receive at least one-fourth per cent. Yet the gentleman inveighs against this as a vast extension of Executive patronage, and this under an Administration by whom hundreds of officers have been abolished. He says two mighty ones are created! I make no doubt but that such a system of patronage will rouse the indignation of the whole American people until it shall equal that of the gentleman from Delaware!

Mr. BAYARD.—This step, if taken, will be progressive. Two offices are now created. This is the time to complain. I understand that more offices are to be made under the Judiciary system. I am very happy at the compliment of the gentleman from Virginia. If those who have been heretofore against expense are now prodigal of the public money, it is necessary to have some men who are economical of it. I do not know that the putting down one office is a reason for putting up other officers. This motion, however, is not for abolishing any office, but for giving two thousand five hundred dollars, which I think a liberal compensation, as the agent can purchase bills through the post office, as the purchase is confined to mercantile towns.

The question was then taken on Mr. BAYARD's motion, and lost—yeas 19.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THURSDAY, April 15.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the committee appointed on the twelfth instant, presented a bill for the relief of the widows and orphans of certain persons who have died, or may hereafter die, in the naval service of the United States; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. BACON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the sixth instant, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a communication from the Comptroller of the Treasury, and sundry documents relating to the claim of Comfort Sands and others, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved into a Committee of the Whole on an engrossed bill to provide for the establishment of certain districts; and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," and for other purposes; and, after some spent therein, the Committee rose and reported an amendment to the sixth section thereof; which was twice read, and, on the question being put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said amendment be presently engrossed, and, together with the bill, read the third time to-day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen,'" with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the last mentioned bill: Whereupon, Ordered, That the said amendments, together with the bill, be committed to Mr. DAVIS, Mr. DENNIS, and Mr. ALSTON.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill to abolish the Board of Commissioners in the City of Washington, and to make provision for the repayment of loans made by the State of Maryland, for the use of the city; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time.

An engrossed bill to provide for the establishment of certain districts, and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Lewis Toudard; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported an amendment thereto; which was twice read and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

An engrossed bill to regulate and fix the compensation of the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, was read the third time and passed.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish the Board of Commissioners of the City of Washington and to provide for the payment of several loans to Maryland. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

An engrossed bill to provide for the establishment of certain districts, &c., was read the third time, and passed.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to fix the compensation of the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The several blanks were filled, on the motion of Mr. DAVENPORT, with the following sums: an annual allowance of two thousand dollars to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives; to the principal clerk of each House, one thousand three hundred dollars; to the engrossing clerk of each House, one thousand dollars; to the Sergeant-at-Arms of each House, eight hundred dollars; to the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives; five hundred dollars, with a per diem allowance during the session of two dollars; and to the Assistant Doorkeeper of each House four hundred and fifty dollars, with a per diem allowance during the session of two dollars.

The Committee rose, and the House took up the report, agreed to it, and ordered the bill to a third reading—afterwards read a third time, and passed.

FULWAR SKIPWITH.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Fulwar Skipwith.

That part of the bill which allows compensation for stolen ingots was agreed to without a division.

The second section allows an annual compensation for consular services.

Mr. DAWSON moved to fill the blank with three thousand dollars.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. T. MORRIS, STANLEY, and BAYARD.

A motion was made to strike out the section, which prevailed—yeas 35, nays 18.

The Committee reported, the House immediately took up the report, and agreed to it, by yeas and nays—yeas 43, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—John Archer, James A. Bayard, Phanuel Bishop, Thomas Boude, William Butler, John Campbell, Thomas Claiborne, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, John Dennis, Ebenezer Elmer, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, John A. Thompson, Abram Trigg, and Isaac Van Horne.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment agreed to, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

UNITED STATES DEBT.

The bill for the redemption of the whole of the public debt was read the third time; when, on the question of passage,

Mr. DANA said that he should trouble the House with but a very few remarks. He considered this bill, so far as it was meant to be an efficient provision for the payment of the public debt, as unnecessary, as the provisions of former laws were completely adequate. When Government has once contracted a debt, and appropriated money to its discharge, there is wanted no special subsequent authority to recognise the full force of the obligation. But he should have no objection to add promise to promise, if the new promise were not connected with a power to make new loans and new foreign connexions and to create new foreign claims. He considered the provisions of the bill to be such as may eventually increase the debt, and lessen the responsibility of the public officers. It was on these grounds principally that he deemed it improper and unnecessary to pass the bill.

The question on the passage of the bill was then taken by yeas and nays, and stood—yeas 55, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, Phanuel Bishop, Robert Brown, William Butler, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Condit, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, Wil-

Mr. T. MORRIS moved to amend the title of the bill, by so altering it as to read, "An act making certain provisions in relation to the public debt."

Mr. DENNIS moved, and Mr. MORRIS agreed to, the addition of the following words, "and authorizing a reloan of parts thereof."

Mr. BAYARD supported, and Mr. VAN NESS, opposed the motion; when the question was taken by yeas and nays, at the call of Mr. T. MORRIS, on the joint amendment, and lost—yeas 26, nays 49, as follows:

On the question, that the title be, "An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States," it was resolved in the affirmative.

FRIDAY, April 16.

An engrossed bill to abolish the Board of Commissioners in the City of Washington, and to make provision for the repayment of loans made by the State of Maryland for the use of the city, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Fulwar Skipwith was read the third time and passed.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred, during the present session, the memorials and petitions of sundry calico printers in the city of Philadelphia and elsewhere, in the State of Pennsylvania; of sundry citizens of the States of New Jersey and Delaware; of sundry cordwainers of the States of Massachusetts and Delaware; of Samuel Corp; of sundry merchants of Richmond and Manchester, in Virginia; of sundry shoemakers of the town of Lynn, in Massachusetts, and of Thomas Stagg, jr., and Thomas Snell; and to whom it was referred by a resolution of the House, on the eighteenth of February last, "to inquire and report on the expediency of erecting a port of entry at the town of Beaufort, at present within the district of Newbern, in the State of North Carolina," made a report thereon; which was read: Whereupon, Ordered, That the consideration of the said memorials and petitions, and resolution of the House, be postponed until the third Monday in November next.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I now transmit the papers desired in your resolution of the sixth instant. Those respecting the Berceau will sufficiently explain themselves. The officer charged with her repairs states, in his letter, received August 27, 1801, that he had been led by circumstances, which he explains, to go considerably beyond his orders. In questions between nations who have no common umpire but reason, something must often be yielded of mutual opinion, to enable them to meet in a common point.

The allowance which has been proposed to the officers of that vessel being represented as too small for their daily necessities, and still more so as the means of paying, before their departure, debts contracted with our citizens for subsistence, it was requested on their behalf that the daily pay of each might be the measure of their allowance.

This being solicited, and reimbursment assumed by the agent of their nation, I deemed that the indulgence would have a propitious effect in the moment of returning friendship. The sum of eight hundred and seventy dollars and eighty-three cents was accordingly furnished them for the five months of past captivity, and a proportional allowance authorized until their embarkation.

TH. JEFFERSON.

APRIL 15, 1802.

The said Message was read, and together with the documents transmitted therewith, referred to Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. CAMPBELL, and Mr. HANNA; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

LEWIS TOUSARD.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Lewis Tousard was read the third time: Whereupon, a motion was made to amend the bill, by adding to the end thereof the following proviso, to wit:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to sanction the conduct of any person who has made advances of money not authorized by law."

And, the question being taken thereupon, it was unanimously resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said amendment be presently engrossed, and, together with the bill, be read the third time.

The said amendment being brought in engrossed, the bill, as amended, was read the third time, and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 63, nays 12, as follows:

COMFORT SANDS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee to whom were referred a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, and sundry documents relative to the claim of Comfort Sands and others; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the first and second resolutions, and their disagreement to the third and fourth resolutions contained in the report of the select committee; which were delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same were read, as follows:

1st. "Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to authorize the Attorney General of the United States to agree with such person or persons, or with the legal representative or representatives of such person or persons, as are interested in an award or report of Isaac Roosevelt and others, referees between the United States and Comfort Sands and others, on the twenty-fifth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, on a statement of a case which shall try and determine the validity of said award or report, before the circuit court of the United States, for such circuit as the Attorney General, and the persons interested as aforesaid, may agree to."

2d. "Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to authorize the Attorney General of the United States, in case the said award or report shall be adjudged to be binding on the United States, to agree on an issue or issues, either in law or in fact, which shall try the question whether William Duer and Daniel Parker, or either of them, were co-partners with the said Comfort Sands and others, in the contracts on which the said award or report was made; and, if so, whether all, or what part of the sums which are due from them, or either of them, to the United States, ought to be deducted from the sum awarded or reported, as aforesaid, under the proviso in the act of Congress passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, entitled "An act for the relief of Comfort Sands and others."

3d. "Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, to authorize the Attorney General of the United States, in case a decision shall be made against the validity of said award or report, to agree on the appointment, by the said court, of referees to decide conclusively (subject only to legal exceptions to be made before said court) on the merits of the original claim of said Comfort Sands and others, on which said award or report was founded.

4th. "Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for the payment of any sum or sums which may be found due from the United States pursuant to these resolutions, and such proceedings as may hereafter be had conformably thereto."

The House then proceeded to consider the said report at the Clerk's table: Whereupon, the first resolution contained in the report of the select committee, to which the Committee of the whole House reported their agreement, being again read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House—yeas 43, nays 36, as follow:

The second resolution contained in the report of the select committee, to which the Committee of the whole House also reported their agreement, being again read, was amended at the Clerk's table, and, on the question put thereupon, as amended, agreed to by the House as follows:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to authorize the Attorney General of the United States, in case said award or report shall be judged to be binding on the United States, to agree on an issue or issues, either in law, or in fact, which shall try the question whether William Duer or Daniel Parker, or either of them, were co-partners with the said Comfort Sands, and others, in the contracts on which the said award or report was made.

The third and fourth resolutions in the report of the select committee, to which the Committee of the whole House reported their disagreement, being again read, the question was severally taken thereupon, that the House do concur with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the same, and resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the first and second resolutions; and that Mr. BACON, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. GODDARD, do prepare and bring in the same.

SATURDAY, April 17.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented, a bill to amend "An act to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imposts and tonnage," and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

[The bill among other provisions directs that hereafter the clear annual receipts of a collector shall not exceed 5,000, of a naval officer 3,500, and of a surveyor 3,000 dollars.]

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the widows and orphans of certain persons who may have died, or may hereafter die, in the Naval service of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

A motion was then made, and the question being put, to amend the said bill at the Clerk's table, by striking out the word, "seamen and marines," in the fifth line of the first section thereof, it passed in the negative—yeas 21, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, Theodorus Bailey, Matthew Clay, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, John Dennis, Abiel Foster, William Helms, George Jackson, Thomas Moore, Thomas Morris, Israel Smith, John Smith, of New York, Samuel Smith, David Thomas, Thomas Tillinghast, Philip R. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Isaac Van Horne, and Peleg Wadsworth.

NAYS—John Archer, John Bacon, Phanuel Bishop, Walter Bowie, Robert Brown, William Butler, Thomas Claiborne, John Condit, John Dawson, Ebenezer Elmer, William Eustis, Calvin Goddard, John A. Hanna, Seth Hastings, Daniel Heister, Joseph Heister, Archibald Henderson, James Holland, David Holmes, Benjamin Huger, Michael Leib, Thomas Lowndes, Samuel L. Mitchell, James Mott, Thomas Newton, jr., Thomas Plater, John Randolph, Nathan Read, William Shepard, John Smilie, John Cotton Smith, Josiah Smith, Henry Southard, Richard Stanford, John Stanley, Joseph Stanton jr., John Stewart, John Stratton, John Taliaferro, jr., Samuel Tenney, George B. Upham, John P. Van Ness, Killian K. Van Renselaer, Lemuel Williams, and Henry Woods.

The said bill was then amended at the Clerk's table, and, together with the amendments agreed to, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to day.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the Naval service for the year 1802.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to fill up the several blanks in the bills with specified sums, which were all agreed to, the total of which amounts to nine hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. DANA moved to insert three hundred and five thousand dollars, for the purpose of timber, &c., for the seventy-fours, the sum in the first estimate in the Secretary of the Navy, instead of one hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars, in the last estimate.

Motion lost—yeas 14.

Mr. DANA moved to insert one hundred thousand dollars, for Navy docks, &c., the sum in the first estimate of the Secretary, instead of fifty thousand dollars, in the last estimate.

Motion lost—yeas 17.

Mr. EUSTIS moved to add a new section to the bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to carry the excess of any specific appropriation beyond the sum expended to the deficiency arising under any other specific appropriation of the bill.

MESSRS. RANDOLPH, MACON, and BACON, opposed; and Messrs. EUSTIS and S. SMITH supported the motion, which was lost.

The Committee rose, when

Mr. HUGER moved to disagree to the report of the committee for filling the blank for contingent expenses of the navy with fifty thousand dollars, with the view of filling it up with one hundred thousand dollars.

It is not my intention, said Mr. H., to go into an argument. The arguments assigned in Committee by two gentlemen, were sufficient to show the impropriety of cutting down so low the contingent fund. This is an extraordinary change in the opinion of the Secretary. I conceive that he had as great a regard to economy in the commencement of the session as he can have now. I cannot, therefore, understand with what view this change has taken place. We have seen, by his estimate offered in the preceding part of the session, that less was required than had been expended the preceding year; afterwards he offers another estimate that required $200,000, less than the first; and now a still smaller sum is required. I have great confidence in our officers generally, and in the Secretary of the Navy in particular; but I am inclined to believe, in this business, he has not been left to his own mind. I was originally a friend to a Navy, and I think this is the time to cherish it. I have, notwithstanding, no objection to economical arrangements in the Army. I have accordingly voted for reducing the Army. That establishment you can repair in a short time. But not so with respect to the Navy, for the establishment of which you must prepare for years beforehand.

It seems, however, that $200,000 must be saved, and that this department must be pared down, to the extreme injury of the country. We have heard from gentlemen, that two public vessels, now requiring repairs, will consume the whole of this $50,000. If this be the case, is it right to make our appropriation so low as to provide for no other contingency? Is this right? Will gentlemen suffer our public vessels to rot for want of repairs? I do verily believe this will be the effect of this step. Is this the liberal support which ought to be given to a Navy? Suppose one of your national vessels meet a Tripolitan, must she not repair?

It is true, that we are obliged to keep up the establishment to satisfy the public sentiment; but we are at the same time doing that which will shake the Navy. I believe the first estimate proper, as it was made before the rage for economy was declared in this House. This is the most pitiful of all pitiful economies! If we are not to have a Navy, let us, in God's name, put it fairly and decidedly down.

Mr. S. SMITH.—If the gentleman's motion does not prevail, I will move an addition to the bill which will overcome his objection, and which, I hope, will meet the unanimous approbation of the House, viz: that any excess on the items for which appropriations are made beyond the actual expenditures, shall be applied to the repairing vessels injured in actual service.

Mr. HUGER.—I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman. The effect of it will be, in order to meet one object, to starve several others. I wish the whole former estimate of the Secretary incorporated in this bill. I wish the live-oak timber to be procured now, for, unless it is, it will soon be cut down, as the land on which it grows is very valuable for rearing the article of cotton. No part of the appropriations are too great. I am for vesting a liberal discretion in the Secretary of the Navy and the President, and on their responsibility; and I think that a specific sum sufficiently great should be appropriated.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—This is one of those questions on which I did not expect to see any, or if any, so much warmth as has been manifested by my friend from South Carolina. I believe it would have been as well for the gentleman to have discussed the Army question, or any other question, in its proper place, and to have confined his remarks to the question now before the House.

He tells you that if a specific appropriation is necessary in one case it is necessary in all; and yet, in the next breath he tells you, that the contingencies for repairs are indeterminable; and yet he says it is as necessary to specify this appropriation, as it is to specify those for pay, for provisions, or for any other objects. I do not understand this.

Suppose every public vessel stranded, what becomes of the Navy, even with the appropriation of $100,000 for repairs? The truth is, that the Secretary has made his estimates upon ordinary circumstances, and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland will enable the Secretary to provide for any casualty, while it will not enable him to travel out of the sum appropriated; but simply to apply a certain sum, originally contemplated for one object, to another.

This is a very different result from that stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, who, I had flattered myself, would have had more respect for the House than to assert, as a matter of fact, that which is not fact. I assert that the effect of the bill will not be to starve the Navy. I state, what cannot be denied, that the head of that department, who is a warm friend of the Navy, has offered us an estimate of the sums required for the present year, which we are now about to adopt. The gentleman should be cautious and not speak in this way of our making pitiful attempts to reduce the Navy by indirect means. I do hope he will in future be more cautious, and speak in a style more becoming this House and himself.

The truth is, when we were for reducing the Army, we disbanded it by an open resolution; and we will do the same thing with respect to the Navy, when we think it proper to reduce it. For my part I am willing to support a Navy, so far as it is required by the welfare of the country. I am now for complying with the estimates of the departments; and when I am for doing this, am I to be told that I am for destroying, by pitiful means, that which the people love? I do not understand this language. I will only say that, in voting appropriations, I will vote what I think enough. If the Executive requires more than is necessary, I will vote less than they require. I believe, however, there is no danger of any Executive demanding too little; and I have no idea of forcing upon them money they do not want.

If the gentleman from South Carolina will act from his own motives, without criminating ours, the public business will go on better than it has hitherto done.

It remains with the gentleman to prove that $50,000 is not sufficient, as well as to prove that his sum is sufficient. Until this shall be proved, I hope the present sum will be retained; and, if deemed important, that the ideas of the gentleman from Maryland will be adopted.

Mr. HUGER.—I certainly feel a great personal respect for the members of this House? But when we are arguing on political points, we must speak of the effects of particular measures, if not of the motives of those who urge them. I must express my surprise at the mode now recommended by the gentleman from Virginia, in wishing to confine this discussion to a particular point, as I believe no gentleman on this floor has more frequently employed his fertile imagination, in similar circumstances, in casting reflections upon others; in branding others with the charge of ragamuffins, &c. It is not, however, extraordinary that, when he is in and I out, he should be offended at the remarks made by me.

Naval Appropriations.

H. OF R.

The gentleman has mistaken me on the score of specific appropriations. I say let us make a specific appropriation, and make our officers responsible for a deviation from it; whereas he is for making specific appropriations, and for suffering the excess of all to be applied to the deficiency of one. I believe all the items are small enough, and that the effect will be to starve the Navy.

With respect to men in general, I believe that every Secretary of the Navy, or of any other department, will retrench the sums he may think necessary, if those around him say he must reduce them.

With respect to the Army, I repeat it, I am not tenacious. I voted lately in favor of reducing it, and it may, perhaps, be right to reduce it still lower. We have only reduced it by one thousand men less than we had when a bloody war raged in Europe. This is a mighty saving! a wonderful evidence of economy!

When I recollect that gentlemen on the other side are not friendly to a Navy; when I recollect to have heard a respectable gentleman from Virginia say he was not friendly to a Navy, though he was willing to give way to public opinion, I am justified in saying that I was afraid that the intention of gentlemen was to starve the Navy.

MR. DANA.—I understand the object of the motion is to appropriate $103,000 instead of $50,000, the sum at present in the bill. This is warranted by the estimate of the Secretary of the Navy. At the commencement of the session, when he could have no particular views impressed upon him, he had estimated $103,000 as necessary for the contingent expenses of his department. I ask if that sum is less necessary now than it was then? Then Congress had not given power to the President to equip thirteen national vessels for the protection of our merchant vessels in the Mediterranean and the adjoining seas. We have had, it is true, a subsequent estimate of $50,000; but has any gentleman explained the grounds of this change? If we are to repose confidence in the gentleman from Maryland, (MR. S. SMITH,) that the Emperor of Morocco is dissatisfied, shall we not probably have occasion for the employment of more ships in the Mediterranean, and will not the expense of their repairs be increased?

The least number of frigates we shall require will be four. Now, when we consider the disasters to which all vessels are subject, is it possible that $50,000 will make them good, particularly when we consider their remote situation from this country? The gentleman from Virginia gives no reason for this change of estimate, but he charges my friend from South Carolina (MR. HUGER) with putting his opinion in opposition to that of the head of the department. If he had done so, had he not a right to do it? But he stands on higher ground. The Secretary says precisely what my friend says.

I make no doubt the gentlemen are for appropriating what they consider necessary; but some gentlemen may think no appropriation necessary. The contingent fund should be less circum-scribed than any other article; for when the squadron is employed in a distant service, and when your agent draws bills for necessary repairs, will you dishonor them? Shall they be protested? And will you suffer your credit to sink below that of a merchant?

This bill proceeds on the idea of economy; but it is an economy only on paper. I consider it as a waste of public money; for if it is necessary to protect commerce, we must have a Navy, and if we have a Navy, we must pay for it.

I will explain my ideas with respect to specific and general appropriations. With regard to the Navy and Army, no man can predict the occurrence of calamities, when either is in actual service, whether we shall have a battle, and what shall be the event of it. And though it be admitted that there may be some estimate of the cost of a given force, yet when this expense is applied to particular objects, it is difficult to ascertain the precise sum required for each; the true way, therefore, is, in a state of war, to give a general sum, and suffer the specific appropriations made by Congress to designate the general ideas of the Government. But then it is necessary to have a contingent fund for each article. Now, I would prefer a specific sum for a general contingent fund, to one for each specific article.

I object, however, to this item, inasmuch as it is not enough to cover the objects contemplated. Four frigates will be the smallest possible number required—more may be wanted, if danger is apprehended from Algiers and Morocco. I rest, therefore, upon the belief that the Secretary of the Navy, when unbiassed by the opinions of others, stated this sum of $103,000 as necessary.

The yeas and nays were then taken on agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole, to insert $50,000, which was carried—yeas 39, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—John Archer, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, Walter Bowie, Robert Brown, William Butler, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Condit, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, William Dickson, Ebenezer Elmer, Edwin Gray, John A. MR. HUGER moved to strike out $195,000, appropriated for the purchase of timber. &c., with the view of inserting a larger sum, originally proposed by the Secretary of the Navy.

The question was taken on agreeing to the report to insert $195,000, and carried—yeas 40.

The next appropriation applied $50,000 to navy docks.

Mr. HUGER and Mr. DANA objected to this sum, and proposed the application of $100,000.

The report of the Committee to insert $50,000 was carried without a division.

Mr. S. SMITH moved a new section authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, with the approbation of the President, to apply any excess of the appropriation, beyond the expenditure of the specific sums appropriated, to the repair of vessels in actual service, if the exigency of the service shall require it; except the sums appropriated for purchase, &c., of timber for seventy-fours and for the improvement of navy yards and docks. The motion was lost.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading on Monday.

MONDAY, April 19.

An engrossed bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and two, was read the third time, and passed.

NAVY PENSIONS.

An engrossed bill for the relief of widows and orphans of certain persons who have died, or may hereafter die, in the Naval service of the United States, was read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 34, nays 29 as follows:

COMPENSATION OF COLLECTORS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the act fixing the compensation of officers employed in the collection of duties on imposts and tonnage.

This bill allows certain compensations to collectors of ports, provided the clear annual receipt does not exceed $5,000. A motion was made to strike out $5,000, for the purpose of introducing $4,000.

It was contended that this latter sum was sufficient compensation to any collector; that it greatly exceeded most of the compensations allowed to the Federal officers; and that as money was appreciating, it became necessary to reduce the salaries of officers generally.

In reply, it was observed that very few collectors would receive so large a sum as $5,000—none other than those of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and perhaps Charleston; that the responsibility attached to these officers was greater than that attached to any other, as in some instances two millions of dollars passed through their hands; that the temptation to violate duty was proportionably great; and that, from these considerations, it became the Government to afford them a liberal compensation; and that the sum was considerably below that heretofore allowed.

The question was taken on striking out $5,000, and lost—yeas 26.

Mr. STANLEY moved to strike out that part of the bill which deducted from the compensations made to the collectors of Newbern and Edenton, the sum of $250, heretofore allowed beyond their fees.

For this motion he assigned several reasons: among which were the inadequacy of the compensations, viz: about $1,600 to the duties performed, which were, notwithstanding the small amount of duties, very burdensome, owing to the smallness of the cargoes imported, and theirs being greatly inferior to the compensations allowed to the collectors of Wilmington and Petersburg.

Mr. S. SMITH informed the Committee that the principle on which the several compensations had been graduated was, that when the gross emoluments exceed $2,000, the salary heretofore allowed by law, in addition to the emoluments, should be withdrawn. This was the fact in relation to the ports of Newbern and Edenton; and as the duties in each of these ports did not exceed $45,000, the compensation seemed adequate; he was, however, far from being tenacious, and would have little objection to a vote of the House which should increase it. Motion lost—yeas 25.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment.

Mr. SOUTHARD renewed the motion to strike out $5,000, for the purpose of inserting $4,000, (the same motion made in Committee,) and assigned substantially the same reasons above stated.

MESSRS. STANLEY, BACON, and SMILIE, delivered a few observations for, and Mr. HUGER against, the motion, which was taken by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. SOUTHARD, and lost—yeas 31, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—John Bacon, Phaniel Bishop, Robert Brown, William Butler, Mathew Clay, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, Lucas Elmendorf, Ebenezer Elmer, John Fowler, John A. Mr. GODDARD moved an amendment providing that no collector should be allowed a greater sum for clerk hire than the amount of his own emoluments. Lost—yeas 28.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the Judicial system of the United States.

The first section being under consideration, as follows:

"That, from and after the passing of this act, the Supreme Court of the United States shall be holden by the justices thereof, or any four of them, at the City of Washington, and shall have one session in each and every year, to commence on the first Monday of February, annually, and that, if four of the said justices shall not attend within ten days after the time hereby appointed for the commencement of the said session, the business of the said court shall be continued over till the next stated session thereof: Provided always, That any one or more of the said justices attending as aforesaid, shall have power to make all necessary orders touching any suit, action, writ of error, process, pleadings, or proceedings, returned to the said court or depending therein, preparatory to the hearing, trial, or decision of such action, suit, appeal, writ of error, process, pleadings, or proceedings."

Mr. BAYARD moved to strike out "one session," and insert "two sessions."

Mr. B. said, he did not know any necessity why the Supreme Court should not be allowed to sit but once a year. We know that, by the system of 1789, there were two sessions; and that, under every modification of that system there have been two sessions. We know that this court has original jurisdiction in many cases, and that this arrangement will subject suitors to much delay. He knew not from what analogy this system is derived. He knew that the inevitable delays of law are sufficient of themselves, and he should think that system improper which multiplies the delays and vexations to which every system is inevitably subject. It will be recollected that it is impossible to bring a suit to trial the first term. He observed, by this bill, that a certain mongrel court is contemplated, to consist of one justice, vested with power to take preliminary steps without authority to take final ones. When the justices of the Supreme Court had to perform more laborious duties than they will have to perform under this system, they sat twice a year. They then went from one end of the Union to the other; whereas they are now to be confined to two States. He knew not why suitors are now to be deprived of the advantages they then possessed. He therefore hoped the provisions of the former system would be agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—I hope the amendment will not prevail. When the gentleman observed that inconveniences would exist under the provisions of this bill, he ought to have pointed them out. For my part I see none. In last June term, there were only eight cases before the Supreme Court. Now, if it is necessary to call the justices of the Supreme Court together twice a year, from all parts of the Union, to try eight cases, I confess I am at a loss to assign the reason for the necessity. Suppose the number of cases should double, for it is probable they will vary from a larger to a lesser number? Suppose, then, they should enlarge to double the number, will it not be infinitely more to the ease of the judges to stay four weeks, once a year, than to stay two weeks twice a year? Nor do I know that any delay will happen in the administration of justice. For one judge is to remain here in the recess to receive pleas, grant rules, &c., and, if any original actions are commenced, they are to take test from the first of August, equally with the first of February, according to the time of the year when they are brought. The pleadings may be filed, and all the preliminary steps taken in August, as well as in February. All the necessary orders may be given, as well in the recess as during the sittings of the court. It is barely possible, in some cases, that a delay of six months may happen, and that is all; though I do not know that ever that will occur.

Mr. BAYARD.—I thought I had pointed out an inconvenience, the greatest that can attend the administration of justice; I mean a delay attending the trial of causes; equal nearly to a denial of justice. A cause can rarely be brought on the first term, and then there will be no possibility of a trial for a year, whereas if there are two terms, it may be decided upon in six months. The bill says there is no difference between six and twelve months' delay. What temptation does this present to counsel? It is known that appeals are frequently made for the purpose of delay; and if the artifice, delay, can be accomplished for a term, they will gain an entire year. Is this no advantage to a man who has the money of another in his hands, which he does not want to pay?

What is the answer of the gentleman from Maryland? The convenience of the judges will be promoted by this arrangement! This is a laudable spirit, and I am glad to see it come from gentlemen on the other side of the House. But, in my opinion, the justices ought to regard the convenience of the community; and the single question is, whether he will consult the convenience of the justices, or that of the community? I would wish to consult both; but when it interferes, the convenience of the judges must give way to that of the community.

The gentleman from Maryland has mentioned the paucity of causes before the Supreme Court. But I do not know that a paucity of causes at the end of a term is an evidence of a little business. I do know, from attending the court, that business was left undone at one term that required one week, and at the last term that required two weeks to complete. Besides, the causes decided, though few, are of vast importance. One cause was determined the last term to the amount of $180,000. The delay of such a cause might ruin one man, or make the fortune of another.

I do not know that this amendment will interfere with the other provisions of the bill, and I can therefore see no reason against adopting it.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—I said there was a possibility of a delay of six months being incurred by this bill. But I do not consider it as so great a hardship as the gentleman does. I do not know the regulations in the Supreme Court for the continuance of causes. But I know that, in Maryland, a cause on appeal may rest for two years. Nor do I think it correct to hurry on a suitor to trial the first term. Besides, in the Supreme Court, under the provisions of this bill, there will be no necessity imposed on the suitor to attend at the August term, the counsel can make the necessary arrangements. I do not speak with absolute certainty when I say that there has been no original cause brought in the Supreme Court. In the State courts few causes are tried the first year; one year, therefore, can be considered as but a small delay; and, in a case where $180,000 is depending, I will ask if the court would order a party unprepared, to go to trial the first term?

Mr. GRISWOLD.—We probably judge of the reasonableness or unreasonableness of delay by the practice of the States from which we severally come. In the State I come from, it has been thought unnecessary to allow one term for delay in the case of writs of error. Because the errors being of record, the defendant always knows the reason on which the appeal is founded. The same principle applies to the courts of the United States. The arrangements of the bill generally produce a postponement of twelve, and at any rate, of six months. In some cases this will be a great hardship, and in others it may ruin the parties. I therefore think it important that the Supreme Court should sit twice a year. On appeals there can be no necessity for delay, as no new facts are to be tried, and all that is required is a decision on points of law.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, he did not pretend to know the course of proceeding in the courts of Connecticut; but in no court, with whose proceedings he was acquainted, did he know the reasons of error assigned on the record.

Mr. DENNIS.—It appears to me, from the provisions of the bill, the Supreme Court may in future be more properly called a court of injustice than a court of justice. I have always thought the delays in the courts of Maryland a great grievance, where, in the case of a simple undisputed bond, a delay may take place of four years. I feel, therefore, no desire to accommodate the system of the United States to that of Maryland; but rather to conform the system of Maryland to that of the United States. I know that the disposition of the defendant is of itself sufficient to produce delay, without any legal aid. I will challenge my colleague, or any other man, to show me a court of appeal that sits but once a year. In such courts it had been usual to assign errors the first time, and try the next. Gentlemen should recollect that, in this District, an appeal lies in all cases above one hundred dollars. The delay in the Supreme Court will certainly encourage appeals, which may be excellent for the counsellors, however unjust or oppressive to the community.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—I will only say, that if it has heretofore been the practice of the Supreme Court to assign errors the first term, this bill does not abridge that power. They may be stated the first term, and the only delay that can occur will be for one year instead of six months.

Mr. ELMENDORF.—It appears to me that the arguments of gentlemen do not apply to the Supreme Court. It is not pretended that this court is calculated for the trial of original causes, but barely for the correction of errors. And, it seems to me, that more delay will be effected by having two terms a year than by having one; for the number of causes actually tried will depend much more on the length than the frequency of terms. If there shall be but one sitting a year the justices will consider themselves under an obligation to try all the causes before them. It will also be recollected that delays in this court, under its present organization, are only to be affected by rules of court and not by our laws.

I wish to know, whether the causes that are likely to arise will not come up from every part of the Union; not merely from Maryland, as might be inferred from the remarks of one gentleman? I would ask, if this be the case, whether the greatest of all possible inconveniences will not result from the frequency of terms? When the counsel are obliged to come on two or three times a year instead of once, will not the expense to the suitor be greatly increased?

It is decidedly my opinion that the expediting of business will principally depend upon the length of the term and the urgency with which the justices push forward the trial of causes.

In the State of New York, the court of last resort sits but once a year; and no inconvenience has been experienced. They sit during the session of the Legislature, and no cause is ever postponed without a sufficient cause for the delay. If, then, we consider that by this bill the inconvenience of a frequent attendance at court is removed, and that the certainty of a trial, perhaps at the first term, is insured, in my opinion we must conclude that this plan is better calculated to expedite business, and to accomplish the due administration of justice, than the having more frequent sessions, sessions which will be shorter, and in which business cannot be so well done.

Mr. HENDERSON.—Whatever reasons may have influenced gentlemen in bringing forward this bill, I did not expect to hear assigned among them that the frequency of terms is calculated to delay the administration of justice. If this amendment is not acceded to, the inevitable effect will be that hereafter the docket will be crowded, however it may have been heretofore. It will be recollected that the court is bound to exercise a legal discretion, and whenever a party desires a postponement, the court must decide according to this discretion; and I beg to know whether there will not exist the same reasons for delay when there is but one term a year, that exist when there are two? Must not the court be governed by the same rules in both cases? If so, the chance of getting a cause tried is not in proportion to the paucity of terms.

The gentleman from New York thinks the paucity of terms will prevent delay. But, how can this be? May not suitors in all cases, for sums above $20,000, appeal; and may they not continue their suits from term to term? So also as to writs of error which may be brought as to facts as well as law; this will operate as a complete superseas. It seems to me wrong to institute courts for the administration of justice, and only give the citizen an access to them once a year. And if but one term a year, why not, on the same principle, have only one term in two or three years? The same arguments urged in favor of the former might, with equal force, be applied to the latter. He therefore hoped such inconclusive arguments would not prevail.

Mr. ELMENDORF.—My ideas on this subject may, perhaps, differ from those of other gentlemen, from the different practices that prevail in different States. It is a fact that, in the State of New York, an appeal cannot be made barely for the purpose of delay. There a writ of error cannot be obtained unless two counsellors, after examination of the record, declare that, in their opinion, there is a material error. And if you make provision, by law, that no removal shall, on the allegation of error, for the mere purpose of delay, take place, will not the court be bound by it? This is the only argument I have heard on the other side, and I have answered it by stating the practice in the State of New York.

Mr. T. MORRIS said that, when his colleague had stated that the Court of Appeals in New York sits but once a year, and that no inconvenience had been experienced, he ought to have added that the court sits as a branch of the Legislature about three months. It follows that inconvenience may not occur there, though it should elsewhere. Having heard no reason for this innovation, he should vote for the amendment.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS.—In addition to the reasons already assigned, I will add that this amendment, if adopted, will derange the whole system. It is possible that, on this plan, there may be delay. I will add that this amendment, if adopted will derange the whole system. It is possible that, on this plan, there may be delays, as it is impossible to organize any system without delay. But I believe that, in legislating, we ought to regard the interests of the whole people. I believe that the causes in the Supreme Court, compared with those in the circuit courts, are very few. If, therefore, this plan insures the holding two circuit courts annually, we ought of preference to suffer a slight inconvenience to exist in the Supreme Court. As to delay, it is not, in general, to be ascribed to the badness of the laws, but to the ingenuity of counsel. There are now but eight causes on the docket of the Supreme Court. Gentlemen say they will increase. If they do, we will have no objection to give that court two sessions. But I have a different opinion. I believe this system will have a different effect, and that it will not increase the present monstrous mass of business! It often happens that reasons for postponement arise from the parties not having time to bring forward their evidence. This cannot occur when the terms are at the distance of a year from each other.

Mr. BAYARD replied to Mr. WILLIAMS, recapitulated his preceding remarks, and concluded by observing that as the old system which gave two sessions to the Supreme Court, had not been complained of either by lawyer or suitors, it appeared to him that the present object was to make Federal justice so inconvenient that suitors would be obliged to abandon the courts of the United States. He asked, if the effect would not be to deteriorate the system, so as to make it odious to the people?

Mr. DANA delivered his sentiments in favor of the amendment.

Mr. HOLLAND.—Gentlemen say, a delay of justice will be a denial of it, and immediately afterward add, that the demands for which suits are instituted in the Supreme Court, are very large. I take it for granted that where the demand is great, the delay should be proportionably long. On this principle we have practised in North Carolina. The great distance, too, of most of the citizens from the seat of Government, is an argument for the paucity of the terms, from the great trouble imposed upon the counsel and suitors. The gentleman from Delaware had lately told us that the convenience of the judges was to be consulted; but now he says, their convenience is not to be regarded. So that, let us form the bill as we please, gentlemen will not be satisfied with it in any shape. I therefore consider the motion made as barely intended to defeat the whole bill.

Mr. ELMENDORF observed that the term of the Supreme Court was so fixed as to occur during the session of Congress. He observed that a system of justice ought to be so constructed as to be convenient to the United States; and so that the assistance of counsel could be obtained at the cheapest rate, and who were acquainted with the parties. This will be the case under the new system. This argument in favor of it is invincible; it has not been answered. There are gentlemen of the law from most of the States, who are members of Congress, which will greatly contribute to the convenience of suitors in the most remote States, and particularly as the presence of suitors is not necessary in the decision of questions of law on appeals.

As to the opposition made to this bill, do not gentlemen see who oppose it? They are those who reside in or near this place—gentlemen of the bar, who will monopolize the whole business of the courts, and who naturally think the more the terms the better for them.

Mr. SMILIE believed gentlemen forgot that the session was drawing near to a close. He hoped the question would be taken without further debate.

The question was then taken on Mr. BAYARD's amendment, and lost—ayes 26.

Mr. BAYARD moved to strike out the third section, which directs that all suits returnable or continued in the Supreme Court from December term to June term, shall be continued over to August term.

He considered this provision as predicated on injustice. It operated to continue the suits for more than a year. This is the effect of this mighty potchery of legislation! Where suitors are entitled to trial in six months, they are denied even a hearing for fourteen months. He believed this was unprecedented in this or any other country. Will gentlemen say why these causes cannot be decided in June? As the justices expected to meet, as the suitors expected to have their causes tried in June next, if hereafter we are to have only one session, why interpose by a new repealing law, to affect a law which is not at present to be repealed till the first of July?

The question was then taken on Mr. BAYARD's motion to strike out, and lost—ayes 23.

TUESDAY, April 20.

Mr. BACON, from the committee appointed, on the sixteenth instant, presented a bill relating to the claim of Comfort Sands and others; which was read the first time: Whereupon, a motion was made, and the question being put, that all further proceeding in the said bill be postponed until the third Monday in November next, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The object of the enclosed letter, from the Director of the Mint, at Philadelphia, being within Legislative competence only, I transmit it to both Houses of Congress.

TH. JEFFERSON.

APRIL 20, 1802.

The said Message, and letter therewith transmitted, were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed, on the second instant, the bill to repeal so much of the acts, the one entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States;" the other an act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," as relate to the establishment of the Mint.

Another Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I transmit you a report from the Secretary of State, with the information desired by the House of Representatives, of the eighth of January, relative to certain spoliations, and other proceedings therein referred to.

TH. JEFFERSON.

APRIL 20, 1802.

The said Message was read, and, together with the papers referred to therein, ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS, from the committee to whom was committed, on the fifteenth instant, the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen,'" reported that the committee had had the said amendments under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their agreement to the same.

An engrossed bill amending an act fixing the compensations of officers employed in the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, was read the third time, and on the question, shall the bill pass? Mr. STANLEY, considering the compensation of $5,000 too high for any collector, and the compensations in other respects as unequal, moved the recommitment of the bill. Motion lost—ayes 21.

The bill then passed without a division.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the Judicial system of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS moved to amend the fourth section, by constituting an additional circuit, to be called the seventh circuit, composed of the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, his object being that the circuit court therein should be composed of the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee. Motion carried—ayes 40.

Other amendments were made affecting the details of the bill.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, April 21.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen,'" to which the select committee, to whom they were referred, reported their agreement on the twentieth instant: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth concur with the committee in their agreement to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House, to whom was referred, on the fifth instant, a motion, in the form of a resolution of the House, "respecting the registry of ships or vessels, two-thirds of which shall have been, or may be rebuilt within the United States, of American materials, and belonging wholly to a citizen or citizens of the United States," be discharged therefrom; and that the further consideration of the said motion be postponed until the third Monday in November next.

Mr. BAYARD moved the taking up for consideration, a motion made yesterday by him for the adjournment of the two Houses on Monday next. The question was put on taking it up, and lost—ayes 33, noes 39.

Mr. VAN NESS moved the order of the day, on the going into the Committee of the Whole, on a resolution some time since laid by him on the table, respecting the registering of vessels, &c.

Messrs. HUGER and GRISWOLD opposed the taking up this resolution, from the lateness of the session, and moved a postponement of it to the fourth Monday in November. Postponement carried—ayes 51.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House then took up the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, reported yesterday, to the bill "to amend the judicial system of the United States."

The first amendment was as follows: "And so much of the act entitled 'An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States,' passed September 24, 1789, as provides for the holding a session of the Supreme Court on the first Monday of August annually, is hereby repealed."

On agreeing to this amendment,

Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays. He said it was not his intention to consume the time of the House, by repeating the arguments which had been made, without being answered in the Committee of the Whole. He would barely observe that the giving to the Supreme Court one session instead of two, was in a great measure a denial of justice to suitors, and would operate with peculiar injustice on the present suitors.

Mr. MORT declared himself against the amendment, inasmuch as it betrayed great inconsistency in the acts of the Legislature. He believed the law lately passed, respecting the Judiciary system established last session, was right. That law restored the system of 1789, under which two sessions of the Supreme Court were annually held. The repeal, not operating till the first day of July, did not affect the ensuing session in June. If the repealing law was right, we must now be wrong. For this reason, and for others, Mr. M. declared himself against the amendment.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the amendment, and carried—yeas 44, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon,

Theodorus Bailey, Phaniel Bishop, Robert Brown, William Butler, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Richard Cutts, William Dickson, Lucas El-mendorf, Ebenezer Elmer, Wm. Eustis, John Fowler, Edwin Gray, John A. Hanna, Daniel Heister, Joseph Heister, William Helms, James Holland, George Jackson, Michael Leib, Samuel L. Mitchell, Anthony New, Joseph H. Nicholson, John Smilie, Israel Smith, John Smith, of New York, John Smith, of Virginia, Samuel Smith, Henry Southard, Richard Stanford, Joseph Stanton, jr., John Stewart, John Taliaferro, jr., David Thomas, Philip R. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, John P. Van Ness, and Robert Williams.

NAYS—James A. Bayard, John Campbell, Manasseh Cutler, John Davenport, Thomas T. Davis, John Dennis, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, Archibald Henderson, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Lowndes, Lewis R. Morris, Thomas Morris, James Mott, Thomas Plater, Nathan Read, William Shepard, Josiah Smith, John Stanley, John Stratton, Benjamin Tallmadge, Samuel Tenney, Thomas Tillinghast, George B. Upham, Peleg Wadsworth, Lemuel Williams, and Henry Woods.

The second amendment established an additional circuit, to be called the seventh circuit, consisting of Kentucky and Tennessee.

Mr. ALSTON said he should be impelled to vote against this amendment, unless it should be shown that it would not materially interfere with the subsequent details of the bill, which, he was at present inclined to believe would be the case.

Mr. DAVIS said it was far from his intention unnecessarily to consume the time of the House. He begged, however, that the arguments which he had yesterday urged in committee would be attended to by gentlemen. He begged gentlemen to respect the rights of Kentucky and Tennessee, which were equal to those of the other States, all of whom, excepting Maine, were allowed the benefit of circuit courts. The only object of the amendment was to unite the labors of the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee, without incurring the least additional expense. He defied gentlemen to assign any reasons against extending this benefit to Kentucky and Tennessee. Gentlemen may assign certain motives, but they cannot assign arguments for the refusal.

Mr. FOWLER said he had never heard of the existence of any complaints respecting the system, as it would stand, without the amendment of his colleague. He believed it was perfectly satisfactory. As to the motives to which his colleague alluded, he knew of none himself, other than those which were connected with the general good. If his colleague knew of any other, he supposed he would name them.

Mr. THOMPSON stated the contents of a letter received by him from Judge Innes, stating the small number of suits depending in the district of Tennessee, and stating the great distance which the judges would have to travel in case of a circuit being established, from which Mr. T. inferred the uselessness of such a court.

Mr. DAVIS replied, and observed, that he knew that a majority, whether right or wrong, will decide as they please; as to the motives to which he had alluded, gentlemen could be at no loss to understand him; he believed that another session of Congress would unfold those motives.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and lost—ayes 34, noes 42.

Mr. BAYARD moved to recommit to a select committee the sixth section, which is as follows:

"That when the judges of any circuit court upon the final hearing of a cause, or of a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, shall be divided in opinion, the Supreme Court upon being notified by the circuit court thereof, shall, at their session to be held next thereafter, assign one other of the justices of the Supreme Court whose duty it shall be to attend accordingly; and upon a second hearing of the said cause the judgment or decree shall be entered up in conformity to the opinion of the court, to be composed of the justice so assigned for the division thereof, and of the judges of the said circuit court: Provided, nevertheless, That all questions arising in criminal cases and submitted to the court, shall, in case the court shall be divided in opinion, be considered as adjudged in favor of the prisoner; and if the court shall be divided upon the final judgment or sentence, judgment shall be entered up in favor of the prisoner, and he or she forthwith discharged."

Mr. BAYARD stated several points wherein he conceived the section defective; others were stated by Mr. GRISWOLD.

The recommitment was urged by Messrs. BAYARD, GRISWOLD, R. WILLIAMS, and NICHOLSON; and opposed by Messrs. ELMENDORF, S. SMITH, and SMILIE.

The recommitment was carried—ayes 45; and a committee immediately appointed, consisting of Messrs. BAYARD, NICHOLSON, and R. WILLIAMS.

At the close of the sitting, Mr. BAYARD reported the following substitute for the sixth section:

"That whenever any question shall occur before a circuit court, upon which the opinions of the judges shall be opposed, the point upon which the disagreement shall happen, shall, during the same term, upon the request of either party, or their counsel, be stated under the direction of the judges, and certified under the seal of the court, to the Supreme Court, at their next session to be held thereafter; and shall, by the said court, be finally decided. And the decision of the Supreme Court, and their order in the premises, shall be remitted to the circuit court, and be there entered of record, and shall have effect according to the nature of the said judgment and order: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the cause from proceeding, if, in the opinion of the court, further proceedings can be had without prejudice to the merits: And provided also, That imprisonment shall not be allowed nor punishments in any case be inflicted, where the judges of the said court are divided in opinion upon the question touching the said imprisonment or punishment."

Consideration postponed till to-morrow.

POST OFFICE BILL.

The House took up the amendments of the Senate to the Post Office bill.

Among these amendments was one instructing the Postmaster General to establish, if necessary, at the public expense, a line of stages for the carrying of the mail. On this amendment an interesting expression of opinion took place on the propriety and policy of extending the accommodations of the Post Office Department.

Mr. ALSTON moved to qualify the amendment by a restriction, that the measures contemplated in the amendment should be authorized only so far as the funds of the Post Office Department would admit. Motion lost.

Mr. S. SMITH and Mr. HUGER supported the amendment.

Mr. GRISWOLD and Mr. EUSTIS opposed the amendment on the ground of the expense that would arise to the public, and from the present season being premature.

Mr. MILLEDGE contested the remark of Mr. GRISWOLD in relation to expense. To gain information, Mr. M. moved to refer the amendments of the Senate, undecided upon, to a select committee.

Mr. ELMENDORF spoke for, and Mr. HOLLAND against the commitment. Motion to commit lost—ayes 18.

Messrs. HOLLAND, ELMER, and ELMENDORF, spoke against, and Mr. MILLEDGE for agreeing to the amendment, which, on the question being taken, was lost—ayes 20.

Mr. HUGER moved an amendment, authorizing the Postmaster General to allow hereafter one-third more for the conveyance of the mail in close carriages, than is now allowed for the conveyance in chairs, or on horses.

Mr. SHEPARD spoke for, and Mr. HOLLAND against this motion. Lost—ayes 27, noes 34.

THURSDAY, April 22.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed on the fifth of February last, to whom were referred the memorials and petitions of sundry citizens of the United States, and resident merchants therein, praying relief in the case of depredations committed on their vessels and cargoes, while in pursuit of lawful commerce, by the cruisers of the French Republic, during the late European war, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

The House took up the amendment, reported yesterday, to the Judiciary bill, which recommended the striking out the sixth section, and substituting a section prescribing that wherever the two judges of the circuit court are divided in opinion, a certificate of the case shall be sent up to the Supreme Court, who shall decide, subject to certain qualifications.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to divide the question, and to take the vote in the first instance on striking out the section. The striking out carried.

Mr. HENDERSON opposed the amendment on the ground of the delay to which it would give rise. Every question of evidence on which there shall be a division will arrest the proceedings of the court. Are gentlemen willing to give to the people of America a bill, purporting to amend the old system, which will in reality be a snare to suitors? As much as I should lament the necessity of one judge deciding, I would prefer that plan to placing the citizen in the situation proposed by this amendment. I believe the system would be the better by giving all circuit duties to one judge, of the Supreme Court, though that too would be, in my opinion highly defective.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—The select committee were unanimous in recommending to the House this amendment. It occurred to them that some inconveniences would arise from it; but no substitute offered itself to their minds, from which greater difficulties would not flow. From their knowledge of the administration of justice, they believed that very little inconvenience would arise. In the course of the last eight years, but one instance was recollected, though the circuit courts were often held by two justices, in which there was a division, which rendered it necessary to carry a cause to the Supreme Court. I have now to regret that the gentlemen from Connecticut and North Carolina, (Messrs. GRISWOLD and HENDERSON,) instead of illuminating our minds, should employ their understandings in opposing the report. I have heard no substitute proposed, excepting the decision by a single judge, which I should not myself consider as an amendment of the amendment, as I have ever understood that in a multitude of counsellors there is wisdom.

The gentleman supposes the amendment will arrest the proceedings of the court in every case of disputed evidence. I am of a different opinion. In the case alluded to, the witness will be allowed to give his evidence, if the court is divided, and the circumstance of a division of the judges will be sent up in the nature of a bill of exceptions to the Supreme Court, who must decide on it. This will not arrest progress in the trial below. In a question of such intricacy, as shall divide the court, will it be a denial of justice to delay the final decision till the Supreme Court shall settle it? Not to do this, might be unjust and iniquitous; and to vest a final decision in the justice of the Supreme Court would be to declare the district judge a mere cypher, and unworthy of confidence. Where is the benefit of a Court of Appeals if an appeal be not allowed in cases of such importance? Inconveniences certainly will happen, but they result from the nature of law, which you cannot make to suit every man's case. You must, therefore, submit to them.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—No case can be brought to the Supreme Court by writ of error under $2,000; nor any to the circuit from the district courts less than $500. Under this provision, sums under $500 may be sent to the Supreme Court; whereby suitors in remote quarters will incur expenses beyond the sum litigated. This will be a mere mockery of justice, and will drive every suitor from your courts. If that be the object of gentlemen, no better mode of accomplishing it can be devised, for no prudent man will run the hazard of going half a dozen times to the seat of Government. I believe with the gentleman from Maryland in the idea that courts are not often divided. I know that they are not often divided on a final question; but there is scarcely a litigated case in which the courts do not concur on collateral points.

As to the admission of a witness, the fact is, if the court differs, there is no admission. This must be the case in States where there is no casting vote. In Connecticut there is a casting vote. The cause, therefore, cannot go on. There will be a delay of ultimate decision until the opinion of the Supreme Court is known.

The gentleman from Maryland says we only find fault with the report without proposing anything amendatory of it. Why, I can propose the re-enactment of the law of the last session just repealed. I believe with him there is safety in a multiplicity of counsellors. He ought to have recollected the motion before he voted for the repeal. Let him, therefore, give force to that law. But I am prepared to propose another plan, that the circuit court consist of one judge. Not that I like this plan, on the contrary, I may almost say I abhor it; but, of the two alternatives, this is the best.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS.—It is not to be expected that gentlemen on the other side will agree to this law. I presume it is not their wish to have any of the responsibility attending it. Nor is it my wish that they should. My colleague has said, he would rather strike out the whole section than agree to this amendment. What would be the effect? By this amendment there may be a decision, though there should be some delay. By striking out the section, there would be no decision at all. Under the old law, if division occurred, the case was decided at the next term by the new judge, there being an interchange of judges. The gentleman might, therefore, on the principle on which he now judges, as well object to the delay occasioned by the postponement. I have, however, no partiality to this amendment. I should have no objection to let all preliminary questions fall, if the court is divided, and to allow an appeal only on the ultimate question. In North Carolina there are but two judges. This has been the practice there, without any inconvenience being experienced.

Mr. HENDERSON.—I believe this bill is composed of such heterogeneous elements that it is impossible for any ingenuity to make anything out of it. But, as it must pass, it is our duty to render it as unexceptionable as possible; and what interest can we have in an imperfect system?

My objection has been attempted to be answered. One of the cases which I put, related to the competency of witnesses. The gentleman from Maryland says, every man is a competent witness until proved not to be so. Now, I ask, if a witness is stated to be interested, and the court is divided, how can the cause go on until a decision is made by the Supreme Court? The gentleman alluded to a bill of exceptions; but that is never offered till the decision of the cause. What exception, moreover, can be taken where there is no decision? Every man, acquainted with legal proceedings, knows such language is unintelligible. In the case of a bond, the whole jot depends upon knowing it; and yet the gentleman says the cause may go on!

I did not say it was better to have no section than this. I said it would be better to retain the section stricken out than this. I hope, therefore, the House will recommit the bill, that we may give the people at least a substance of justice, if nothing else. I fully agree with my friend from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) that gentlemen by this time see the propriety of keeping the late system, rather than adopt this heterogeneous mongrel system. I do not believe that the ingenuity of man can rear on this basis a tolerable system. I would prefer trusting to a single judge, to the holding out false colors, and promising justice and yet denying it. For, I repeat it, under this plan it will be impossible to try causes, which, if once hung up, will be for life.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the report of the select committee, and carried—ayes 39, noes 27.

Mr. LEIB moved to add to the bill the following new section:

"That, from and after the passing of this act, no special juries shall be returned by the clerks of any of the said circuit courts; but that, in all cases, in which it was the duty of the said clerks to return special juries before the passing of this act, it shall be the duty of the marshal for the district where such circuit court may be held, to return special juries in the same manner and form, as, by the laws of the respective States, the said clerks were required to return the same."

Mr. DENNIS said, he understood the object of the gentleman was, to prevent the packing of juries. He wished to know whether this effect was likely to follow from transferring the duty from an officer who holds his appointment during good behaviour, and who, he believed, was dependent upon no one, to an officer who was the mere creature of Executive power?

Mr. LEIB.—My object is to prevent the packing of juries, which has heretofore been exercised by the clerks. I hold an opinion contrary to that of the gentleman from Maryland. I consider the marshal as a responsible officer, amenable to the President; whereas the clerk is the mere creature of, and dependant on, the court. I, therefore, think a more impartial selection of juries will be obtained by confiding this duty to the marshal than the court.

Mr. MILLEDGE was opposed to the motion.

Mr. GILES hoped the amendment would obtain, the effect of which was simply to transfer to the marshal the duty of selecting special jurors, in those States where this is not already the case. It is easy to see that, if the judges should possess a bias towards particular individuals, no mode could be readier to give efficacy to that bias than by declaring the cause should be tried by a special jury, and make their clerk designate them. He would ask, if, under these circumstances, the clerk would not be most likely, of all other individuals, to summon a jury favorable to the views of the court. We have been informed that there have been inconveniences of this kind experienced, in cases where there have been biasses of courts to particular descriptions of citizens. Mr. G. said, he had no doubt of the existence of such impressions.

The first time he heard of this right, possessed by the clerks, he thought it the most extraordinary he had ever heard of. He believed the amendment offered would remedy the present evil, existing in some of the States, without any inconvenience to any other State.

Mr. DAVIS.—The power of selection must reside somewhere. The officer called upon to perform this duty ought to have some knowledge of men. The sphere of acquaintance enjoyed by the clerk, from the nature of his ordinary duties, is limited, whereas the marshal necessarily becomes acquainted with all the prominent characters in his district. For this reason, I think, the duty will be best confided to the marshal.

Mr. DENNIS.—The reasoning of the gentlemen from Virginia and Pennsylvania is founded in mistake. They have taken that for granted which remains to be proved. If the clerks were the creatures of the courts, and removable at their pleasure, there would be some force in their remarks. But that remains to be proved. The courts have the power of appointing, but not of removing; for I take it for granted that the officers appointed by the courts are only removable for misconduct.

It appears to me, since we have heard so much about Executive patronage, that no possible case can be conceived of, where there can be greater danger than in giving the right of selecting jurors to the marshals, who are the mere creatures of the President. We are told, there is no danger from this source, except in cases of a political complexion. But there is no medium through which political prejudices will operate more effectually than through the marshals.

Mr. BAYARD said, he did not feel a strong spirit of hostility to the amendment, because, as it was expressed, he deemed it an extremely harmless thing, which tended only to expose the House to ridicule. It provided for jurors being returned by marshals in cases where the clerks of the court had heretofore returned them. Now, sir, no such cases exist; clerks never do nor never did return jurors.

Mr. B. was, however, opposed to the principle, which, he supposed, it was intended to carry into execution. The object of the amendment, it would be perceived, was to prevent special juries. He deemed it very important to retain the power of summoning special juries in certain cases. In questions of great importance, which often arise in courts, and which involve great principles of law as well as intricate questions of fact, special juries are important. However competent ordinary juries may be to decide causes generally, yet when great commercial questions are involved in such decision, it must be very proper to have the power of summoning a jury of merchants to decide. The same remark is applicable to other professions and business in life. Men whose time has been devoted to particular pursuits, ought to be called on to decide in questions which regard their particular business. Clerks of the courts he considered as the proper persons to select such jurors. They are responsible officers, appointed by the court, dependant on their good behaviour; and who is most competent to decide what is the nature of a cause, the court or the marshal? Marshals are the mere creatures of the Executive, proceeding from the nostrils of your President. Their political existence can be extinguished in a moment.

I am at no loss to see the object of this motion. Notwithstanding the declarations of gentlemen against Executive influence, we have for one year past seen a succession of acts tending to the principle from which they had been before diverging. They are now for making the selection of juries dependent upon a marshal, who is dependant upon the President, as they find that power not in the hands of men so dependant upon them as a marshal. And, from this perishable motive, they are for establishing a precedent so dangerous to the administration of justice.

Mr. GILES.—I did not intend to have risen in this debate, as my indisposition is such as almost to make silence necessary. But the charge of fostering Executive patronage has been so often made that I will trouble the House with a few ideas; and I beg gentlemen to review the measures of the session, and say whether those measures are in the least at variance with the professions under which those now in power came into place, and whether those who have heretofore been the strenuous friends of Executive patronage, have not tried to divest the President of every power constitutionally delegated to him? What has been done this session? The internal revenues have been abolished. I beg gentlemen to look at the volume laid before us, and to see how many offices have been taken from Executive patronage. I have not counted the number, but I observe them in large columns. These have been destroyed at a single blow. Those heretofore, when out of power, against Executive patronage, say to the President, we repeat to you now what we heretofore have told you, and we have therefore taken from you the appointment of more than four hundred officers.

I ask, how many new offices have been created, or transferred to the President? I know of none, unless the Commissioners of Bankruptcy, who, according to this act, are to be appointed in the first instance by the President.

Four or five hundred old officers have been dismissed, no new ones have been created; and yet we are told that we are in favor of swelling Executive patronage. Again, I find several foreign Ministers dismissed, and still we are told that we are favorites of Executive patronage. I deny the point; I deny that we have ever voted for an office that was not necessary. I say, on the other hand, that the number of officers we found in existence has been much lessened, and may be lessened still more.

I must observe, that the gentleman from Delaware has come nearer the true point than the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. DENNIS,) who said, if the clerks are the creatures of the court, there would be some force in objecting to their having the selection of jurors. The gentleman from Delaware says, the court itself has this right. But how long have we heard this doctrine? For my part, when I heard the gentleman make the declaration, that the courts had this power, I thought it most singular. But grant that the courts have this power, what does it amount to? If chosen by the courts, will jurors be independent? In the existence of political divisions, are courts impartial? I say, that it is within my own knowledge, that jurors have been selected with a view to particular ends.

It is true that they are not now so selected. No, sir; for, if the marshal is on one side, the court is on the other, and is a check on his partiality? The court has the power of directing the jury; and, if they see fit, of granting a new trial. And, permit me to say, nothing can be so dangerous as to unite the power of selecting jurors, and of deciding the cause.

We are told there may be commercial cases which require a select jury. In such cases, why may not the marshal make the selection?

But suppose a political case should occur. This is the most likely, when it does occur, to be productive of mischief; and, I believe, if we have had mechanical and commercial, we have also political juries.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) says, he is not at a loss to understand this question. No doubt, he is not at a loss. He understands all questions. And I wish that that gentleman, as well as every other gentleman, should understand it. I say it is improper that judges should empanel the jury. If there are such marked political divisions, as I fear there are, it is most dangerous to unite the power of empanelling, with that of deciding. If you do this, you give the principle, so long contended for, not that of the independence, but the supremacy of the judges. For, during the whole of this session, gentlemen have been using improper names. No man values more highly than I do the independence of the judges; but the question is a question of supremacy; they are to be made supreme! They are to control all your laws! You have given them a great variety of powers, and now they are to have the power of empanelling juries.

I beg leave to observe that this amendment will not have the smallest operation on Virginia, where the marshal summons all juries; but if there be a part of the United States where this evil exists, it ought to be remedied. Not that I am in favor of any bias whatever in the designation of jurors. I wish there was none; I am sorry that our judges are politicians; and so long as the courts are political, it seems to me necessary, in order to meet them, that there should be political juries. The courts can almost do anything; they decide the evidence received, they charge the jury, and may grant new trials. It is, therefore, improper that the clerk should empanel the jury.

The gentleman from Delaware says, there may be a change of men hereafter. That, to me, is altogether immaterial, as I am for acting on general principles, which shall equally apply to all men.

Mr. BAYARD said, he should have no objection to vote for the amendment, if he did not consider it, not only harmless, but absurd. He did not see how political questions had anything to do with struck juries. Such questions arise only on criminal prosecutions; and in those, struck juries are never used; they are summoned in civil actions only. But he considered the amendment as a mere bagatelle, it was only a grasp at all power to be placed in the hands of the Executive. As to Executive patronage, the repeal of the internal taxes proved that those who voted for the repeal were for reducing Executive patronage; it proves, also, that those who voted against it were not unwilling to give to the Executive a legitimate exercise of patronage where it was necessary for the public good. But he had seen instances, in cases not calculated to alarm the public mind, where a strong disposition had been shown to extend Executive patronage.

The question was then taken on Mr. LEIB'S motion, and carried—ayes 41, noes 32.

Mr. DENNIS moved to strike out the fifteenth section, which is in the following words:

"And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, from time to time, as many general Commissioners of Bankruptcy in each district of the United States, as he may deem necessary; and upon petition to the judge of a district court, for a commission of bankruptcy, he shall proceed in, and by an act, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' and appoint, not exceeding three of the said general Commissioners of the particular bankrupt petitioned against; and the said Commissioners, together with the clerk, shall each be allowed, as a full compensation for their services, when sitting and acting under their commissions, at the rate of six dollars per day, for every day which they may be employed in the same business, to be apportioned among the several causes on which they may act on the same day, and to be paid out of the respective bankrupts' estates: Provided, That the Commissioners, who may have been, or may be, appointed in any district, before notice shall be given of the appointment of Commissioners for such district, by the President, in pursuance of this act; and who shall not then have contemplated their business, shall be authorized to proceed and finish the same, upon the terms of their original appointment."

Mr. DENNIS called for the yeas and nays. This section says nothing less than that the courts are not to be trusted; and if this power be vested in the President, I can see no reason why the appointment of Commissioners on a petition in chancery may not also be vested in him. Gentlemen have said much about abridging Executive patronage. Permit me to say that this section vests in the President the power of appointing every man, woman, and child in the United States, a Commissioner of bankruptcy. But my great objection, is the inconvenience that will attend this mode of appointment. The President must either appoint a vast number of Commissioners, or the inconvenience will be very great. In my opinion, it is improper to appoint general Commissioners; they ought to be appointed in each special case.

Mr. S. SMITH.—The House well know that I have always been an advocate for the bankrupt system; I am still an advocate of it; I am a friend to it; and it is because I am a friend to it, that I shall vote against striking out this section. I believe the mode pointed out in this section will be most agreeable to merchants, who are most interested in it. It will be recollected that, at present, the Commissioners are appointed by the district judge, to whom appeals are to be had, when the Commissioners shall be considered as acting wrong. The Commissioners, therefore, will be extremely cautious how they offend the district judge, and be apt to be too much biased by him. At present, the commission is not general, but formed for every special case. With respect to the Commissioners of Maryland, I have never heard any complaints. They are men of respectability. But I wish this commission to be perfectly independent. This new course will make them more independent. The President will first name the Commissioners, from whom the judge will have an opportunity of selecting fit characters for each case; and I am convinced that this will be the most satisfactory. As to Executive patronage, I can say, with the gentleman from Delaware, I can see no patronage created in this measure. With regard to appointments, they are constitutionally vested in the President, who will, in general, discharge the duty well, though he may be sometimes mistaken.

Mr. GILES said, though in favor of the section, he was not very tenacious of it; but he believed the appointment to office ought to be where the Constitution had placed it, in the hands of the President. The judges have proper subjects on which to exercise their powers; and a preclusion from all other unnecessary objects will best insure their independence. These officers are considered as important and responsible. He did not see any part of the Constitution that gave the judge the power of appointing them.

Mr. GILES said, his indifference to this subject arose from another reason. He believed the bankrupt law the worst act that Congress had ever passed. He was, however, perfectly willing that experience should test it. He had, since its passage, heard of no new proselytes to it, while he had heard of many complaints against it. He believed that, at the next session, the force of public opinion would repeal it; and that this effect would be principally produced by the very persons for whose benefit it was formed.

Mr. BAYARD said, he had not the smallest doubt of the sincerity of the gentleman from Virginia, when he tells us the courts of law are the worst possible depositories of appointments. Nor was he at any loss to know to what to ascribe this opinion. He says the President is the natural officer to make appointments. He had no doubt that gentleman now thinks so, as well as other gentlemen, who, until lately, thought very differently.

Mr. B. said, he could convince the gentleman there was no repugnance to the Constitution in vesting this power in the judges. He then read the 2d section of article 2d of the Constitution:

APRIL, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

"Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

After hearing this section of the Constitution, the gentleman will not say it is more natural to give this power to the President than to the judges. It is a paltry affair. The power to appoint in these cases cannot create a patronage very useful to the President. From all experience, under a system of bankrupt laws, the power now to be given to the President, ought to belong to the judges. In England, the King cannot appoint a Commissioner. The power is appurtenant to the court; and the experience of this country has shown no inconvenience from the power vested in the Chancellor. But why, sir, on a bill professing to amend the Judiciary system, are we led into a discussion of the bankrupt act? Why are we told the law is to be repealed? And why is this section, not relating to the subject of the bill, introduced into it? It is the expectation of taking a miserable power from the courts to vest in your President. Has there been any complaints, remonstrances, or petitions, against abuses of the power in the judges? I have heard of none. Why, then, transfer the power from a department possessing no power, to one already possessing exorbitant powers? Gentlemen will find themselves infinitely mistaken in giving this power to the President; it will not extend his influence so far as his disappointment. When gentlemen recollect seriously the duties of the Commissioners, they must be convinced of the difficulty of the President's filling these appointments. The ordinary characters, fit to fill these offices, and willing to fill them, are infinitely below the knowledge of the President. He must rely on the advice of others. By what light will he be instructed as to the number necessary? In Delaware, there has not been occasion for a single Commissioner of Bankruptcy; in Pennsylvania, only in Philadelphia; but they may be wanted in the other parts of the State; and the nomination must be dispersed over the country. If you are jealous of the judges, how do you operate on them? You take not their power; for, after all, the President does not make them Commissioners, but only qualifies them to serve when selected by the judge; the men thus preferred to the others, are so far obliged by the preference; and if the influence of the judge is feared, here is still a field to exercise it. Your Presidents may fall on men the first victims of the law. The intimate connexion of merchants is so intricate, that no previous appointment can be made, without the hazard of making men judges in their own cause. Upon the whole, I perceive much injury which may result from this innovation, without any benefit. The compensation, by the present section, of twenty-four dollars per day, for three Commissioners and clerk, will eat up every fragment of the bankrupt's estate, for whom nothing will escape, but a miserable remnant.

Mr. BACON.—I am apprehensive that the determining who are to perform these duties does not depend on a long chain of reasoning. It appears to me that there is a strong impropriety in vesting the same men with the power of appointing and ascertaining the compensation of the person appointed. This is nearly the same as fixing his own compensation; for he has only to appoint his own friend, and then determine his compensation. This is too great a temptation for human nature; and, with me, weighs more than the long train of logical reasoning which we have just heard. I am, therefore, against striking out the section.

Mr. GODDARD said that, if he was fully satisfied that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) was correct in his opinion of the bankrupt law, and he was not perfectly satisfied that he might not be correct, he should not feel such strong objections to the provisions of the section. But, being willing to give the system a fair experiment, he could not consent to adopt the section; because he believed it calculated to render the law much more inconvenient to the citizens, and to render it odious. The President, by this section, is authorized to appoint, in each State, as many Commissioners of Bankruptcy as he might think proper. This provision might not be productive of any considerable inconveniences to the few large cities; and if bankruptcies could be confined to these cities, he should feel indifferent about this provision. But, in the State which he had the honor to represent, there were no very large trading towns, but many smaller ones, and persons who might be liable to bankruptcy were scattered over all parts of the State. The consequence of this provision would be, that the President must either appoint a host of Commissioners in all parts of the State, or rather capacitate a vast number of persons by commission, under him, to be appointed Commissioners by the judges; or the citizens from the extreme parts of the State, in case no greater number than was originally contemplated, (not less than three nor more than twelve,) must travel to one central spot to have this business done, in case of bankruptcies; either of which would be very inconvenient and oppressive. Besides, those named Commissioners by the President, in the State of Connecticut, will be incapacitated, under the laws of that State, from being members of the State Legislature.

Mr. ELMENDORF.—From representations made to me, I confess I am extremely tenacious of this section. It has been shown, by the gentleman from Delaware, that there are but three modes of appointment; first, by the President; second, by the courts; third, by the heads of departments. When these offices are created, they become the subjects of Legislative discretion. The practice has been, not as stated by gentlemen for the court to appoint for each particular case, but to appoint a general board. From this practice, inconveniences have arisen too intolerable to be borne. Improper persons have been appointed, and enormous emoluments allowed; and the whole fragments of the bankrupt's estate have been destroyed. The provisions of the law have been so tortured, that the Commissioners have received, under the sanction of the court, six dollars a day for every case of bankruptcy before them. It will be found that the son of a judge has even been appointed. Shall we, then continue this power in the hands of the courts? No; we have tried them abundantly. We ought not, therefore, to shrink from imposing this duty upon the President, which the good of the country requires to be vested in him. I am not a friend to the bankrupt act, not because I am inimical to a proper system of bankruptcy, but because the evils, under the present system, exceed the benefit which it confers. Under this system, from the practice in New York, it would seem that it was not so much for the benefit of the real bankrupt, as for those who can afford to pay well, or can give security for those who wish to become bankrupts.

I will ask, if the provision of this bill will not be a check on the present abuses, by limiting the total daily compensation to six dollars. I would rather limit the allowance to four dollars a day; but I believe ten times six much greater than six. I believe that appointments in the State of New York are considered as more beneficial than any that can be conferred; and, if they are so emolumentary, I fully agree with the gentleman from Virginia, that they ought not to be made the instruments of court patronage. Not that I am for giving improper appointments to the President; on the contrary, I wish less power of this kind had been reposed in him; but, in this respect, I am constrained to obey the Constitution.

Mr. MORRIS spoke against the section. When the question was taken by yeas and nays, on striking out the 15th section, and lost. Yeas 35, nays 36, as follows:

Mr. BAYARD moved to amend the sixth section by adding to the eleventh line, the words, "and which at the end of the said session shall remain undetermined," and called for the yeas and nays; which were taken, without debate—yeas 32, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, James A. Bayard, John

Campbell, Manasseh Cutler, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, Thomas T. Davis, John Dennis, William Dickson, Ebenezer Elmer, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Edwin Gray, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, Archibald Henderson, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Lowndes, Lewis R. Thompson, Abram Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, and Isaac Van Horne.

Mr. BAYARD offered a new section, to this effect: "That this act shall not go into operation, or take effect, until the first day of July next;" and required the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYARD.—The system lately repealed will not go out of operation until the first of July; otherwise there will be contrarious systems in force at the same time. It is difficult to say what would be the effect of a collision of the two systems. I would wish gentlemen to say, whether the present circuit courts are, or are not, to have a Spring session. This bill creates new circuit courts, to take effect immediately. I am not prepared to say whether the old circuit courts will remain in force after the passing of this act. I am very much inclined to think that the effect of this law may be, to suspend the circuit courts now sitting, and the effect may be to annihilate judgments now given. I would, therefore, wish gentlemen to be explicit.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—The objection, taken by the gentleman, is fully provided against by the fourth section; wherein it is declared, that none of the circuit courts, created by this bill, shall be held until after the first day of July next. There can, therefore, be no kind of contradiction between this and the repealing law. But I believe the effect of the amendment will be, to give the Supreme Court a June session, which is not intended by the bill.

Mr. BAYARD.—The gentleman from Maryland has not answered my objection. His design is, that the present circuit courts shall hold a Spring session. But this will not be the effect of the bill. The basis of the power of the old judges is derived from the old division of the United States into circuits; now, if this basis is changed by a new division, how can the same judges be circuit judges? The effect will be, to have two circuit courts. As legislators, ought we to suffer any doubt to remain on a subject, when we can remove it by a single section? Is it not a matter of serious consideration to the judges and suitors, whether the judgments rendered in these courts are nullities? And what objection is there to the section now offered? Why, that it gives a session to the Supreme Court in June. But is this a source of alarm? Are the justices of the Supreme Court objects of terror to gentlemen? Was not this session contemplated and expected? The effect of the present bill will be, to have no court for fourteen months. Is this Constitutional? Are the judges to consume their salaries without having anything to do? I call upon gentlemen to consider the alarming principle contained in this bill. They are about to pronounce that the Supreme Court, a court formed under the Constitution, shall not sit for fourteen months, instead of sitting in six months. Are gentlemen afraid of the judges? Are they afraid that they will pronounce the repealing law void? If gentlemen think they have no such power, they will conclude that any interposition of the judges will be rejected by the good sense of the people; and if they have such a power, are they prepared, on a mere political pretence, to deprive them of it? Sir, as far as regards myself, I have not the smallest knowledge that any such interposition will take place. It is not probable that, at present, any one judge knows the opinion of another. My own opinion is, that it is scarcely probable they will interpose. I do not see how that question can come before them. It is ten to one that they will not act upon it.

APRIL, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. OF R.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—I have no hesitation to declare, that I am not afraid of the exercise of any Constitutional authority of the judges. Such authority can be exercised as well in February as in June. They will have the same opportunity of acting in February as in June. As far as regards myself, I care not whether they pronounce the repealing law unconstitutional or not, though I should regret such an act, as I wish harmony to prevail between all the departments of the Government. My being, therefore, in favor of postponing the session until February, does not arise from any design which I entertain, to prevent the exercise of power by the judges. But we have as good a right to suppose gentlemen on the other side are as anxious for a session in June, that this power may be exercised, as they have to suppose we wish to avoid it, to prevent the exercise.

As to the proposition of one annual session, instead of two, that has been already discussed and decided upon. But, if gentlemen merely wish to save the present circuit courts until the first of July, though I think that is already provided for by the bill, I shall have no objection to an amendment to that effect.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—The fourth section either puts down the present circuit courts, or it establishes two sets of circuit courts. It is, therefore, reasonable and proper to agree to the amendment, that this effect may be prevented. And I cannot believe that this House is afraid of having a session of the Supreme Court in June. I know that it has been said, out of doors, that this is the great object of the bill. I know there have been slanders of this kind; but they are too disgraceful to ascribe to this body. The slander cannot, ought not to be admitted. I, therefore, hope that gentlemen will agree to have a session in June next. For my part, I have strong reasons for wishing a session in June. I believe the repealing act is a usurpation of power by the Legislature; and, whenever I see a usurpation, I think the speedier it is checked the better. I have, therefore, no hesitation to say, I wish an early sitting of the Supreme Court. To their judgments I submit, and I trust every member in the community will also submit.

Mr. BACON.—I apprehend the gentleman need not labor very hard to dispel the fears entertained of a sitting of the Supreme Court. I apprehend there is no cause of fear. Nor do I see the necessity of the amendment, to save the Constitution; because, if the repealing act be unconstitutional, it is no law, and not in the way of their meeting. If it is so considered by the judges, they will meet together, of course. I, therefore, think that even the gentleman from Connecticut can have no very alarming apprehensions on this score.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on Mr. BAYARD's motion, and lost—yeas 27, nays 46, as follows:

The bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BAYARD moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session of Congress, by adjourning their respective Houses on Monday, the twenty-sixth instant.

The taking up the motion was supported by Messrs. BAYARD and S. SMITH, and opposed by Mr. ELMENDORF.

Mr. D. HEISTER moved the previous question.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved an adjournment.

Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays on the question of adjournment; which were taken, and the adjournment lost—yeas 29, nays 41, as follows:

NAYS—John Archer, James A. Bayard, Robert Brown, William Butler, Matthew Clay, John Condit, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Dawson, John Dennis, William Eustis, Abiel Foster, John Fowler, William B. Giles, Calvin Goddard, Edwin Gray, Roger Griswold, John A. Hanna, Seth Hastings, Daniel Heister, Joseph Heister, Archibald Henderson, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Lowndes, John Milledge, Samuel L. Mitchell, Lewis R. Morris, Thomas Morris, Thomas Plater, Nathan Read, John Smilie, Samuel Smith, Samuel Tenney, John Taliaferro, jr., Benjamin Tallmadge, David Thomas, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, George B. Upham, Isaac Van Horne, and Lemuel Williams.

The House then proceeded to consider the motion of Mr. BAYARD, for authorizing an adjournment of the two Houses on the twenty-sixth instant.

Mr. GILES moved to postpone the consideration of the motion till Monday next.

Mr. S. SMITH hoped the motion of Mr. BAYARD would be agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays on Mr. GILES's motion.

Mr. GILES said he would much rather withdraw his motion, than consume the time taken in calling the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYARD then called for the yeas and nays on his own motion; which was carried—yeas 53, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, James A. Bayard, Phanuel Bishop, Robert Brown, William Butler, John Campbell, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Manasseh Cutler, Richard Cutts, Samuel W. Dana, John Dennis, Lucas Elmendorf, Ebenezer Elmer, William Eustis, Abiel Foster, William B. Giles, Calvin Goddard, Edwin Gray, Roger Griswold, John A. NAYS—John Archer, Walter Bowie, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, William Dickson, John Fowler, David Holmes, Israel Smith, John Smith, of New York, John Smith, of Virginia, John Taliaferro, jr., Abram Trigg and Philip Van Cortlandt.

And then the House adjourned until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, April 23.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and two; and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

Mr. GRISWOLD made the following motion:

Resolved That the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, respecting the French corvette Berceau, be instructed to inquire whether any further appropriations are necessary to cover the expense which has arisen for the purchase and repairing that vessel for the French Government, and for advancing to her officers their monthly pay.

Mr. S. SMITH moved to amend the motion by striking out the words "for repairing for French Government."

Mr. GRISWOLD opposed the amendment.

Mr. GILES hoped the gentleman from Maryland would withdraw his amendment, and that the motion would be agreed to.

Mr. S. SMITH withdrew his motion, in order to save time.

The motion was then agreed to without a division.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

The bill to amend the Judicial System of the United States was read a third time.

When Mr. R. WILLIAMS moved to recommit the bill, for the purpose of striking out the 15th section, which gives the nomination of Commissioners of Bankruptcy to the President.

Question on recommitment carried—yeas 37, nays 33.

The House went immediately into Committee of the Whole, Mr. S. SMITH in the Chair, on this section.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS moved to strike it out.

Mr. BAYARD.—I am decidedly opposed to the passage of the law. Its defects are as numerous as its provisions; and it introduces not a single improvement into the system it is designed to amend. I mean not to trouble the House with an extended or detailed view of the subject. Considering the value of our time, from the small portion which remains before the session will terminate, by the resolution we have passed, I shall content myself with pointing out some objections to the bill; which, according to the opinion I entertain, furnish sufficient ground to induce gentlemen to refuse to it their assent.

The ninth section, which happens at present to be under my eye, contains a provision, not simply absurd, but extremely mischievous. I should have moved to recommit the section, could I have flattered myself with the most distant prospect that any motion I made, supported by any reason which could be advanced upon this subject, would have been adopted by a majority of the House.

But, sir, having failed in many amendments,

APRIL, 1802.

Judiciary System.

H. or R.

recommended by a very plain strong sense, I was unwilling to waste time in a vain effort, which would have been resisted, without the trouble of attending to its object.

The section to which I refer, provides, that all causes and process, either of a civil or criminal nature, which shall be depending or returnable in any of the circuit or district courts of the United States, on the first of July next, shall be continued, and transferred, and returnable to the circuit and district courts established by this act.

Causes depending in, or process returnable to, any district court in the United States, are transferred to the circuit and district courts established by the act. By the act there is a circuit court instituted in each district, but no new district court is established, except in the district of North Carolina and Tennessee.

One of two things must, therefore, follow; either, that all causes in the district courts of the other districts must be transferred to the district courts of North Carolina and Tennessee, or be carried into the circuit courts, which the act establishes in the several districts. However absurd this operation may be, yet, as the power of the Legislature to produce it cannot be denied, the express and unequivocal words of the law must take effect.

It is not the design, I presume, to abolish the district courts; and though they are suffered to exist, they are capriciously stripped of all their business which cumulated upon the circuit court. I ask, if gentlemen can give a different construction to this section, if they can deny the operation I attribute to it, and if there be a single member who will undertake its defence?

In looking, Mr. Speaker, through the bill before us, I discover but one defect of the ancient system which it attempts to correct. That is the rotary constitution of the court, in relation to the judges who composed it. The act confines particular judges of the Supreme Court, to several circuits which it creates. This provision designs that the circuit courts shall always be composed of the same judges. This might have been considered as a useful improvement, if pains had not been afterwards taken to render it abortive. The law has not named, though it has contrived to designate, personally, the judges of the Supreme Court, at present assigned to hold the courts in the several circuits. But, as successive vacancies happen on the bench of the Supreme Court, the judges are, by allotment, to be assigned anew to their different circuits.

This provision reproduces the very evil, and the only one which the bill professes to correct in the old system.

As there are six judges, and, generally, advanced in life, vacancies from death or resignation must occur in very short periods. Upon each vacancy, every judge ceases to be attached to a particular circuit, and must wait for a new allotment to know the circuit to which he is to belong. The judges had formerly the power of assigning themselves to particular circuits, and the only change which is introduced, is, that an assignment of the judges once made, it cannot be varied until a vacancy on the bench occurs. This, however, must happen so frequently as to expose the circuit court to the same oscillations, in the administration of justice, as were experienced and complained of under the old system.

I would beg, also, that gentlemen would give us some information upon a point of great importance, and of great doubt, which arises out of the arrangements upon this subject. After a vacancy occurs upon the bench of the Supreme Court, what is the situation of the circuit courts, before a new allotment is made by the judges of the Supreme Court?

Upon every new appointment, the allotment is to be made; and, until it is made, the power of the judges, in their ancient circuits, would seem to be suspended. The allotment can only be made at a session of the Supreme Court; and, as the court has but one annual session in the month of February, if a vacancy should happen, and an appointment be made in the month of March or of April, the circuit courts would be suspended for more than a year, and the whole business of the courts destroyed by discontinuance. Is it possible that gentlemen can give their assent to a bill pregnant with such mischief and injustice? Can they suppose that this thin veil, this gauzy covering, will conceal from the eyes of the world the latent design of destroying the Judiciary power of the United States, by rendering it incapable of attaining justice, and productive only of vexation and expense?

The fourth section of the bill contains a provision which certainly transcends the power of Congress, great as it has appeared during the existing session. It enacts, that the court, in the fifth circuit, shall be holden by the present Chief Justice and the judge of the district in which the court shall be holden. The law has no limitation, and is designed as a permanent system. It supposes, therefore, that the present Chief Justice associated with the district judge, is for ever to compose the circuit court of the fifth circuit. This, sir, might have been an oversight in draughting the bill, but what will it be when, with our eyes open, we adopt it in the law. Will the public be satisfied with laughing at the absurdity, without suspecting the integrity of the motive which induced the House to assent to it?

I will not fatigue you, Mr. Speaker, with the useless labor of attending to a critical examination of the incongruities and absurdities which abound in the bill; but I call, and I have a right to call upon the friends of it to come forward, and point out a single particular in which it corrects a defect in the old system.

Do gentlemen suppose that the people of this country have no understanding? Do they imagine that they will always remain the dupes of empty words, that they will look no farther than the title of a law, and continue to repose an implicit faith, after finding themselves repeatedly deceived? You call this a "bill to amend the Judicial system of the United States;" but amendment is not the effect, and nothing is more remote from the design of it.

Having enumerated the defects of the ancient system upon a former occasion, I will not now repeat them; but I affirm, and if I am wrong, the advocates of the bill will expose the error, that not one of those defects is removed by the present law.

There is one view of this subject which requires that information should be given, not to the House simply, but immediately to the nation. Is it the design of gentlemen, by this bill, to destroy the power of the present judges of the circuit courts during the short period of their political existence, allowed by the repealing act which was lately passed? This law is to take immediate effect. It breaks down all the circuits formed by the act of 1801, and throws the districts into new circuits.

The present judges were appointed and commissioned for certain circuits. A judge, commissioned for the first circuit, could exercise no authority in the second. The new arrangement, abolishing the old circuits, how are the judges to determine the boundaries of their power?

I shall be allowed to exemplify my view, by stating the case relative to the State to which I belong. Under the law of 1801, Delaware was a member of the third circuit; by the present bill she is comprehended in the fourth; the question, therefore, is, whether a commission to hold a court in the third circuit, will authorize a judge to hold one in the fourth? Is the point exempt from all doubt? And are we excusable in leaving a doubt upon a point of such consequence and responsibility?

While we are passing this law, the courts are in session; the judges, obedient to the obligations of duty, are exercising the solemn functions of their office; and, while they are occupied as they believe, in administering justice, if we abolish their legitimate authority, we render them, their officers, and suitors, trespassers, and might expose them even to the accusation of murder.

Will not gentlemen avow their intentions on this point, and, by a few plain words, enable the judges distinctly to perceive the path which they are to pursue?

But, sir, when I look to the object of this bill, I become sensible how idle it is for me to ask for anything, however moderate and reasonable it may be. To accomplish that object, every objection will be trodden under foot.

This act is not designed to amend the Judicial system; that is but pretence. If amendment had been in view, gentlemen would have contrived a better plan than the present bill proposes, which I panegyricize, by calling a miserable piece of patchwork. No, sir; the design of this bill, is to prevent the usual session of the Supreme Court in next June.

It is to prevent that court from expressing their opinion upon the validity of the act lately passed, which abolished the offices of the judges of the circuit courts, until the act has gone into full execution, and the excitement of the public mind is abated. I know not that the subject would be brought before the judges, or that they would officially take it up; but it is the fear of their solemn opinion, and a knowledge of the just reverence which the people of this country entertain for judicial decision, which has given birth to the present expedient. Could a less motive induce gentlemen to agree to suspend the sessions of the Supreme Court for fourteen months? The last session was in December; the judges are forbidden to assemble again, until fourteen months from that time have expired. Could a more dangerous precedent than this be established? May it not lead to the virtual abolition of a court, the existence of which is required by the Constitution? If the functions of the court can be extended by law for fourteen months, what time will arrest us before we arrive at ten or twenty years? This objection to the bill alone would be fatal, in my mind. We have offered an amendment upon this point, enabling the judges of the Supreme Court to meet in June. We have begged gentlemen to accede to this amendment, if for no other reason than to banish the aspirations as to the object of the bill, but though we are told they are indifferent as to the opinion of the Supreme Court upon the validity of their late act, yet we find the bill tenaciously adhered to; and that, with all its imperfections about it, it is to be converted into a law. The majority, sir, must have their will; but I am deceived, if their triumph is of long duration. The people of America can be governed but a short time by empty words and hollow pretences.

The motion was further supported by Messrs. R. WILLIAMS, DAVIS, T. MORRIS, GODDARD, NICHOLSON, and HASTINGS, and opposed by Messrs. ELMENDORF and BACON.

When the motion to strike out was agreed to—yeas 44, nays 25.

The Committee rose, and reported their disagreement to the 15th section.

Report confirmed in the House.

The question was then put on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays, which were taken, and stood—yeas 46, nays 30, as follows:

THE MINT.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill for repealing the several acts establishing the Mint.

Mr. GILES observed, that when he had laid certain resolutions on the table respecting the subject, it was said the House had not sufficient information on which to act. To obtain this information he had suffered them to lay. The information is now received. He believed that information would satisfy the House of the little utility of the Mint. He believed that from the effects of a peace in Europe, we should have silver enough, and that we really had copper enough to serve for several years. There was another circumstance, which made it necessary for the House to act on the subject this session. After the third of March, the establishment will have to be moved to this place. There was also another reason for acting. The Director states the implemments to be considerably out of order. Rather than incur the expense of these repairs, he thought it best for the United States to disembarass themselves of this expense, and save an annual sum of $20,000. This would also afford a relief to the revenue after repealing the internal taxes.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment.

The report of the Committee was immediately taken up.

Mr. S. SMITH.—When this subject was formerly before the House, I said that the gentleman from Virginia was warranted in saying, that the gold coin of the United States was finer than some other in circulation; for the Director of the Mint, in his report for 1800, stated the American gold to be $27 42 on 1,000 pennyweights, finer than the Spanish doubloon; that the same report stated the expense of the Mint Establishment at $20,986—the gain on copper for the same year $5,050—leaving the real cost of the Mint for that year $15,936—the whole copper coin for 1800 being only $29,279; from which it will appear that each cent (as was understood) would cost the United States half a dollar; this, however, was on the presumption that little gold or silver would, in future, be offered for coinage. In answer, a gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) said, that I was mistaken if I meant to say that each cent had cost the United States half a dollar; that if I had said each dollar's worth of cents had cost half a dollar I should have been more correct. In answer I said that every gentleman must have seen from the statement I gave in figures of the quantity coined, and the cost of the Mint Establishment for a year, that I meant to say that each dollar's worth of cents had cost half a dollar, and that if I had said otherwise, it ought to have been considered as a "lapsus linguæ," and not as an attempt to mislead.

I have considered it proper, in justice to myself, to repeat what I had said on a former occasion on the same subject, because the reporter of that debate had been extremely inaccurate, owing perhaps to his not being accustomed to the taking of debates.* It will be remembered that a similar mistake to that made by me had been made the same day by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD,) and from Virginia, (Mr. GILES.) Indeed, it was not easy to avoid such mistakes in the warmth of debate.

I have now before me the last report of the Director of the Mint, by which I am confirmed in my former opinion, the expense of the establishment has exceeded even my expectations as to the cents. Again I repeat what I formerly said, that the Secretary of the Treasury may be empowered to contract with the bank, or with individuals of the United States, who shall be obliged to stamp the cents within the United States, for the quantity required annually. I observe that the Director imports from England the planchettes, or pieces the size of the cent, and stamps them at the Mint; the same may be done by the banks or individuals without any cost or charge on the Government; and we may put down an establishment that has cost the United States $30,000 per annum.

Mr. DANA.—The gentleman from Maryland, I presume, has reference to me. I have a tolerable recollection of what passed on that occasion, though not a complete one, and I conceive the statement of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) to be perfectly correct. It will be recollected that after the same mistake had been made by my colleague, and other gentlemen, that I rose and said I was perfectly satisfied that when the gentleman from Maryland said that each cent had cost the United States half a dollar, it was a mistake, and made without any intention whatever of misleading the judgment of the House.

As some observations have been made on the coinage of the precious metals as symbols of royalty, and as an idea has been thrown out that the copper coinage ought to be effected in foreign countries, I will refer to the report of the then Secretary of State, to show the ideas which he entertained on the subject. [Mr. D. here quoted this document.] I consider this as a complete answer to the coins being made in a foreign country.

But my great objection is, that the bill destroys the whole establishment; and that it does this in so instantaneous a manner that it is scarcely possible to sell to the least advantage the implemments of the institution; and because the copper coinage is rather a source of profit than loss, as Government may give this description of coins a value far beyond the current price of the metal. I am not tenacious of the whole establishment; but I should wish to see some provision, at least for a copper coinage, made before the whole establishment is broken down. As to the law for fixing the Mint at Philadelphia expiring next session, that can be very easily obviated. To do this it will be only necessary to continue in force the act lately passed for keeping the Mint at Philadelphia.

Mr. GILES said, that all gentlemen united in opinion that this establishment could only be maintained by a heavy charge to the Government. And if we turn to the report of the Director, we shall find that he himself supposes the gold and silver coinage not now necessary. This is the most expensive part of the system. We must, then, if we keep up the institution, expend annually $20,000, and find that after the expenditure there is very little to be done.

As to the expense of the copper coinage, as stated by the gentleman, it is a mere estimate; whereas the fact is that about $30,000 a year have been expended for ten years; why continue this expense? To coin bullion, when we have no bullion to coin?

The gentleman from Connecticut has read an extract from the report of the Secretary of State, (the now President,) and he infers an opinion of that character, that coining precious metals is an act of national sovereignty. I suppose not to do it is also an act of sovereignty. The truth is, the sovereignty consists merely in the power to do or not to do it. I suppose gentlemen are for laying out $30,000 annually, barely to show that such a power exists. I believe there is another act of dignified national sovereignty—the act of passing wholesome laws; national sovereignty in this case does not consist in making the impression of our laws ourselves, but in having the power to direct it to be done. It would be extraordinary if, in this case as the other, we were to lay out $30,000 to show that we possess this attribute of national sovereignty. As to the expending thousands of dollars, every body knows we do that every day on a liberal scale. That, therefore, is no argument with me.

As to the copper coins, I am told there is no deficiency of them. They are, I believe, of very little consequence where I live, for the people will not take them. But I believe there is a sufficient quantity for the country. But if not, this bill does not preclude the obtaining more. I have no objection to making a contract with the bank to supply us with cents, and I believe it may be done in this way without costing us a dollar. The gentleman from Connecticut states the profit that may be derived from depreciating the coin. This, it is true, has often been tried, but it has generally failed. It certainly could not be far extended; for it would soon be discovered to be a mere cheat.

As far as the institution has heretofore gone, out of $30,000 annually expended, about $5,000 has been saved by the copper coin. I believe that profit would induce the bank to undertake the coinage. At present the copper coin is impressed on metal of the same size that is imported here; and the only thing done here is to make the impression. This the bank can do as well as the Government.

Mr. G. said he believed the idea of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) correct, that our gold coin was so pure that it had tempted workers in the metal to transmute it, and he believed this effect would continue so long as the present law existed. The effect will be, that the Mint will be refining the precious metals barely for the benefit of workers in those metals. This, he believed, was the reason why we had so little coin made from the precious metals; and the consequence will be that in a short time we shall have very little of them. For these reasons he believed the establishment useless, and that the single question was, whether we would abolish an useless establishment, or keep it up at an annual expense of $30,000? If, however, it was the wish of the House to retain it, he would acquiesce, though he thought it best to act up to the principles on which they had started.

Mr. DANA disclaimed all thoughts of adulterating the precious metals. His remarks had applied exclusively to the copper coinage.

Mr. EUSTIS said it appeared to him that in this establishment much money was paid for but little service rendered. But as this bill had been suffered to lie for a long time, he had entertained the belief that the gentleman who had introduced it had contemplated the retaining some of the offices, while the expenses were reduced. Mr. E. conceived this would be the best policy, as there were men employed in the institution who could not learn in a day or year what it was necessary for them to know. If such men shall hereafter be wanted, they cannot be easily got. It appeared to him that every establishment is responsible for the coin that bears its own stamp. Now, suppose coin is imported, who is to determine its purity? We must have some responsible officer to examine it. It had always appeared to him very desirable to have a coin between the amount of bank notes and copper coin. Such a result certainly should not cost $30,000; he supposed it might be reduced to $10,000. He believed the time would come when we will have a gold and silver coinage—not from a sentiment of national pride, but from its utility. At present bank paper is very useful; but the time may come when it shall be thought proper to substitute coin for it. The idea of importing copper coin had never been agreeable to him. He believed it absolutely necessary to have an assay-master. He would, therefore, rather that the bill should not pass, if not amended; though he wished a reduction of the establishment.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—I do not think the gentleman correct in the view he has taken. I believe the expenses hereafter will be much lower than they have been heretofore, from the cost of the implementations. But gentlemen ought to take into view the benefit to the nation derived from this establishment. If bullion be not coined here, it must be sent to Europe, and all the charges of transportation and insurance will be so much expense to us. If gentlemen will attend to the sum coined last year, they will find that the whole expense of the establishment is saved to the nation. If the coins are too fine they may be reduced; for there is no necessity of having them finer than the coins of England, with whom we have principal intercourse.

The Mint.

With regard to the expenses of coinage, I differ from the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH,) who supposes every dollar of cents cost half a dollar. On the other hand, I believe there is a profit. I have, indeed, no doubt of it. I believe Government is a gainer from that coinage. I know Government can render itself a gainer, as the value of the cent, when coined, is much greater than before; for, with regard to the base metals, it is proper for Government to impress what value it pleases, as they are confined to our own internal commerce. Of course we may subject the copper coinage to such regulations as not to be productive of expense.

It is well known that the amount of the copper coinage is small. If the establishment is destroyed, it will be lessened, and this will be attended with infinite embarrassment to a certain description of citizens. Is it not then essential, at any rate, to pass this bill with some reservations? The great expense is an objection to the establishment. But let us wait, at least for one year, to find whether this expense will not be greatly reduced by peace; and let us postpone the bill to next session.

Mr. G. concluded by offering a motion to this effect.

Mr. GILES.—I think the House prepared to act at this time. Yet, though I shall vote against the postponement, I shall be perfectly satisfied with it, if acceptable to the House. Nor do I object to a regulation to save the copper coinage. I rather believe this will be the better plan; though I believe this cannot be done this session, as it will require a greater knowledge of the necessary offices for it than we can possess.

I differ with gentlemen as to expense. I wish we could obtain a reimbursement of the expense already incurred. I do not like these ideal gains; nor do I believe that bullion has ever been remitted to Europe to be coined, and returned in the shape of English guineas. If remitted, I believe it has been done to pay our debts. I believe the value of the coin is altogether ideal. It is not the shape, but the intrinsic value by which it is estimated. I therefore consider the expense of coinage as so much loss, and infer that we ought to dispense with the establishment.

It is optional in the House to postpone the bill to the next session, or make provision now for a copper coinage. I am perfectly willing to give some officer the power of contracting for a copper coinage. This is the only thing we can now do.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that he was against the postponement. He wished the subject decided on during the present session. On examining the last report of the Director of the Mint, he found that the whole quantity of gold, silver, and copper, coined from the commencement of the Mint, until February last, amounted, agreeably to the report, only to $3,045,000. The coinage of which had actually cost the United States $296,957, being nearly ten per cent. on the whole amount coined. If the motion to postpone should not succeed, I will move to recommit to a select committee, in order to bring in a section to provide for the coinage of cents and half cents by contract.

Mr. ELMENDORF said, he rose to state the result of his inquiries. On making inquiry of the Secretary of the Treasury, it was stated that Government had a great quantity of copper on hand, which it was found very difficult to dispose of. He gave this information to show that no inconvenience would result from having no new copper coinage during this and the ensuing year. The report states that the expense of importing cents is not more than £20 per ton. This is so much less expensive than to impress the coins ourselves, that I should prefer importing them.

The question of postponement to the next session was then taken, and lost—yeas 32, nays 37.

Mr. S. SMITH then moved a recommitment of the bill to a select committee. Carried—yeas 49.

SATURDAY, April 24.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads," and desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendments; to which conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part.

The House proceeded to consider so much of the message from the Senate, of this day, as relates to the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads." Whereupon

Resolved, That this House doth insist on their disagreement to such of the said amendments as have been disagreed to by this House, and insisted on by the Senate, to the said bill.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the conference desired by the Senate on the subject-matter of the said amendments; and that Mr. ELMENDORF, Mr. SOUTHARD, and Mr. JOHN TALIAFERRO, jr. be appointed managers at the same, on the part of this House.

The select committee, appointed yesterday, made a report to amend the bill respecting the Mint, by providing that the Secretary, of the Treasury, under the direction of the President, be authorized to contract with the Bank of the United States, or with individuals, for the coinage of cents and half cents, provided the amount coined shall not exceed twenty tons annually, and that no expense shall be incurred by the United States; and by further providing, that all the implements and personal effects of the Mint should be retained.

Mr. L. R. MORRIS moved to postpone the consideration of the report till the third Monday in November. Lost—yeas 19.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved a postponement until Monday next. Lost—yeas 23.

The report of the select committee was agreed to with an amendment authorizing the sale of the horses employed in the Mint.

So amended the bill was ordered to a third reading on Monday.

CIVIL LIST.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the Civil List.

The several blanks were filled up, and some amendments made; when Mr. NICHOLSON moved a new section, making appropriation of — dollars to the Attorney General, and other agents for services rendered under the British Treaty.

Mr. BAYARD opposed the appropriation as illegal. He stated that as the board of Commissioners, under the article of the treaty to which the appropriation referred, had ceased to sit, and the services of the Attorney General and the agents ceased, in his opinion no allowance should be made.

Mr. NICHOLSON stated that, under similar circumstances, the late Attorney General had received the additional compensation.

Mr. BACON opposed the resolution, on the same ground with Mr. BAYARD; when the question was taken, and the motion lost without a division.

The Committee rose and reported the bill, which the House immediately took up.

All the amendments were agreed to without a division, excepting one appropriating 15 per cent. in addition to the permanent allowance made to clerks in the respective departments.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to disagree to this appropriation, on the ground that the expense of living had decreased, and the duties of the clerks declined.

Mr. NICHOLSON contested both points. He did not think the expenses of living had diminished since the last year, when the same allowance was made; and if the duties to be performed in some departments had diminished, which he did not allow, they had certainly increased in other departments, viz. the Treasury and Post Office departments.

Mr. GRISWOLD's motion was lost—yeas 21, nays 32.

A bill making appropriation for the military service for the year 1802, was read a third time and passed.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved, that the estimate of the Clerk, of the contingent expenses of this House for the present session, be printed.

Mr. S. SMITH moved, that there be added thereto the estimate for the year 1798.

The amendment, and the original motion, were carried.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House took up the bill making appropriations for the military service for the year 1802, in which several amendments were made by general consent.

One of the items of appropriation unites the contingent expenses of the War Department, estimated at $16,000, and the expenses of what has heretofore been denominated the Quartermaster General's department, estimated at $48,000 in the sum of $64,000.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to divide the item appropriating forty-eight thousand dollars for the department of the quartermaster general, and for contingencies.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he could not agree to the motion. The Secretary of War was a responsible officer, while the quartermaster general was not. He, therefore, wished to place the disbursement under the direction of the Secretary. There had been, to his knowledge, great abuses heretofore in the quartermaster's department. The Secretary is at present not responsible for the quartermaster general, and before his accounts are settled years may elapse. The present mode of appropriation was not unusual. It was so made in 1797. What has hitherto been the usage? To consider the whole appropriation as a general fund from which money might be drawn as the Secretary of War pleases. The law has heretofore lumped in gross the whole sum allowed for military service. But this bill adopts a new plan. It specifies particularly the several payments to be made. But in the quartermaster's department, where it is absolutely necessary to allow some discretion, it has been thought best to blend these two items to make the Secretary responsible. This has been done to prevent abuses.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—The ideas of the gentleman from Maryland furnish a conclusive argument for the separation of these items. For, if blended, the whole sum may be taken for the quartermaster's department. Nor do we by this bill limit disbursements by the quartermaster general; for, under all expenditures, the warrants must be signed by the Secretary of War. This, therefore, does not place the quartermaster general's department more under the control of the Secretary of War, than it was placed before. Now, if we add sixteen thousand, which may go to the quartermaster's department, we extend the power of abuse. I therefore think that on the plan we are pursuing, we ought to make a separation of this appropriation into two items; then the sixteen thousand dollars will be under the direct control of the Secretary, and the remainder under the control of the quartermaster general.

I know the former course was different. Sums appropriated were considered as grants of money to the department, to be applied to military services under law. This course is now complained of. I confess I do not feel great confidence in the course now pursued. But I am willing to try it, and to allow that if it succeeds, it will be a very fortunate and desirable thing. It is for this reason that I wish to pursue all through the plan according to the report of the Secretary.

Mr. S. SMITH.—It will be remembered that we have now no such thing as a quartermaster's department. It follows that the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) would fill up the blank with what does not exist. If he will examine the report of the Secretary of War, he will find an appropriation desired for what has heretofore been called the quartermaster general's department. But the gentleman is very candid. He says that he does not like this specific appropriation, and yet he is for carrying it so far as to render it impossible for the department to move!

APRIL, 1802.

Military Appropriations.

H. OF R.

It is, however, but fair, that when a new experiment is made, it should be tried in conformity to the ideas of its friends; it is not fair that those inimical to it, should oppose it with hostile ideas. The gentleman says, it will be a good thing if it succeeds. Let him, then, suffer it to be tried. If he permits its friends to go on their own way, then if it fails to succeed, he may say: I warned you against it, and the blame is altogether yours. Not so, if the mode is altered by him; for he will himself then be responsible.

In the year 1801, a law passed appropriating the gross sum of $2,093,000. [Mr. S. here quoted the law.] The sums thereafter specified were never considered as a restraint on the department. There was no contingent expense; that was included in the sweeping clause, under which the whole sum appropriated might have been applied to contingencies.

For myself, I would just as lief have the old as the new system. I have great confidence in the heads of departments. I should have been well pleased that each head of department should have returned an account specifying the amount expended on each item, that we might be enabled to see where the sum appropriated was exceeded. But I found that the President had recommended specific appropriations. I found a majority of this House for it. I therefore acquiesced. I hope, therefore, the motion will not succeed; but that we shall give those who approve the new mode a fair chance for trying it.

Mr. DANA supposed, though there might be a change of names, there could not be an army without something like a quartermaster general's department. At the opening of Congress we received from the President a commendation of specific appropriations. It is well known that there has been a question for some time as to the most expedient mode of making appropriations. For himself, Mr. D. believed the only proper way was for the Army or Navy to receive a general sum, which shall be limited by law, as to pay, provisions, and other ascertained compensations. Latitude will forever be involved in the quartermaster's department, in the contingencies, and for ordnance, &c. These are the only cases where the laws admit a discretion. In the instance before the House, two of these are combined, and, so far as they go, they completely overthrow the idea of specific appropriations. Mr. D. said he was in favor of this, though he believed it against the President's recommendation, and in the very face of specific appropriations. He was, therefore, against the amendment of his colleague.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) says these two items ought not to be involved, because it is in direct opposition to the recommendation of the President, and to our plan. I do not think so. He says there are three objects that necessarily involve great discretion, which are blended in the bill, and that it is proper to blend them. Why, if the gentleman had looked at the bill he would have found the very reverse. For the article of subsistence there is a distinct appropriation amounting to $201,000. This is a sum on which the quartermaster general, if there were one, is not any longer permitted to exercise a discretion; for he cannot now go beyond this expense, if he wished. This, too, is specifically in conformity to the advice of the President. An important limitation is here made, where the quartermaster general used to exercise an unlimited discretion. For the Treasury books will show that the quartermaster general stands charged with the enormous sum of eight hundred thousand dollars. Hereafter the quartermaster general cannot avail himself of this latitude. For this purpose we want specific appropriations; but when we specify we ought to take care that we do not go too far. Though the President has recommended our making appropriations more specific than they have heretofore been, he did not affirm to what length, in his opinion, the specification should extend. But he had seen that great abuses had taken place, and therefore he recommended measures to correct them.

According to the former mode the appropriations were made as general as could be, so that the officers of the War Department could incur nearly such expenses as they please. Not so under this bill. But it ought to be remembered that there may be expenses under the article of contingencies that may exceed sixteen thousand dollars. So in the department of the quartermaster general, they may exceed forty-eight thousand dollars. It is impossible rigidly to assign the limits of those expenditures. It has, therefore, been thought better to blend them together, and make the Secretary responsible. Whether we can make the former Secretary responsible for the quartermaster general I do not know; perhaps we cannot. The quartermaster stands charged with eight hundred thousand dollars; he has sold property to the amount of three hundred thousand dollars, and though written to, his accounts cannot be got. To remedy these evils we now make specific appropriations.

Mr. EUSTIS said he thought the blending or separation of these items amounted to the same thing. If you appropriate forty-eight thousand dollars to what has heretofore been denominated the quartermaster's department, you allow the Secretary to expend that sum at the different posts.

The question was then taken on Mr. GRISWOLD's motion to separate the items, and lost—ayes 17.

When the bill was ordered to a third reading.

MONDAY, April 26.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand eight hundred and two, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to repeal so much of the acts, the one entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," the other an act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," as relate to the establishment of a Mint, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House then proceeded to consider the said amendments of the Senate: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the time therein mentioned, and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints;' and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be read the third time to-morrow.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they had passed the bill for abolishing the Board of Commissioners of the City of Washington, with certain amendments.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to make report and return to this House, in the first week of the next session of Congress, of the abstracts and lists of the valuation of lands and houses made in the several States, pursuant to the act "to provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and the enumeration of slaves within the United States;" and that he cause two hundred copies of the said report and return to be previously printed, and transmitted, for the use of Congress, at the time aforesaid.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, in relation to the settlement of limits &c with the State of Georgia. The Message, and papers transmitted therewith, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHN TALIAFERRO, junior, from the Committee appointed, presented a bill additional to and amendatory of, an act, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the widows and orphans of certain persons who have died, or may hereafter die, in the Naval service of the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House took up the amendments of the Senate to the bill abolishing the Board of Commissioners of the City of Washington, &c.

One of these amendments contained a number of distinct sections for establishing a company for cutting a canal to unite the main Potomac with the Eastern Branch thereof. Committed.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House, that they had agreed to all the amendments made by the House to the bill "to amend the Judicial system of the United States," excepting one, viz: that which struck out the section that transferred the nomination of commissioners of bankruptcy from the district judges to the President, on which they insist.

Mr. GILES moved that the House should recede from the amendment.

This motion was supported by Messrs. TALIAFERRO, ELMENDORF, HOLLAND, S. SMITH, and MITCHILL, and opposed by Messrs. BAYARD, GRISWOLD, GODDARD, and MOTT.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 45, nays 27, as follows.

quarters of one per centum on the assessment valuation of such property :”

It was unanimously resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said amendment be present-ly engrossed, and, together with the bill, be read the third time. The said amendment being brought in engrossed, the bill, as amended, was read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled “An act supplementary to an act, entitled ‘An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies during the times therein mentioned,’ and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints,” was read the third time; and on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the Convention with Great Britain. The Message was read, and, together with the Convention transmitted therewith, ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee appointed the seventh of January last, on the memorial of Evan Thomas and others, and to whom was referred, on the twenty-seventh of the same month, a Message from the President of the United States relative to trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, reported a bill to revive and continue in force an act, entitled “An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes;” which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled “An act for the relief of the widows and orphans of certain persons who have died, or may hereafter die, in the Naval service of the United States:” Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

An engrossed bill to revive, and continue in force, “An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,” was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled “An act to extend, and continue in force, the provisions of an act, entitled ‘An act giving a right of pre-emption to certain persons who have contracted with John Cleves Symmes, or his associates, for lands lying between the Miami rivers, in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and for other purposes;” to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee appointed on so much of the President’s Message as relates to naval sites, &c., made a further report. The report concludes as follows:

“The committee find that, prior to the fourth of March 1801, the sum of one hundred and ninety-nine thousand and thirty dollars, and ninety-two cents, have been expended in purchasing navy yards and making improvements upon them, without any law authorizing the purchase, or any appropriation of money, either for purchase or improvements.”

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill respecting the District of Columbia.

[This bill vests certain chancery powers in the courts of the District—alters the periods of holding the courts viz: for Washington county to be held in July and December; for Alexandria county in June and November; directs that no person shall be held to bail unless resident for two months in the Territory—directs that no execution on the person of the debtor shall be issued for judgments under twenty dollars, but that all such process shall hereafter go against the effects of the debtor, executed by the constable, under reduced fees; gives to the Corporation of Georgetown the power of taxing town lots for specified purposes; repeals so much of acts of 1801, as provide for the compensation of jurors and witnesses, with other provisions.]

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to strike out the fourth section, which directs that no person shall be held to bail unless resident for two months in the Territory.

This motion was supported by Messrs. GRISWOLD, HENDERSON, BAYARD, and NICHOLAS; and opposed by Mr. TALIAFERRO. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to strike out the section, which saves the person from arrest for debts under twenty dollars.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to recommit it. The motion was carried, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 28.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing his report on the memorial of Ferdinand Mullenheim, referred to him, by order of the House, on the fifteenth ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHN TALIAFERRO, junior, from the committee to whom was yesterday recommitment the bill additional to, and amendatory of an act entitled “An act concerning the District of Columbia,” as amended by the Committee of the Whole House, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled “An act to repeal, in part, the act, entitled ‘An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes,’ with two amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendments of the Senate, to add nine new sections to the end of the bill, entitled "An act to abolish the Board of Commissioners in the City of Washington, and to make provision for the repayment of loans made by the State of Maryland, for the use of the city;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the same, with several amendments; which were read, and partly considered.

Ordered, That the farther consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole House be postponed until to-morrow.

An engrossed bill additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia," was read the third time and passed.

A petition of Thomas Cooper, of the county of Northumberland, in the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House and read, setting forth that, in the month of April, eighteen hundred, he was tried and condemned at Philadelphia, before Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, judges of the circuit court of the United States there sitting, for having written and published a libel upon the political character and conduct of John Adams, the then President of the United States; and was thereupon adjudged to pay a fine of four hundred dollars, and to suffer an imprisonment of six months; which punishment he accordingly underwent; that he apprehends the said trial, condemnation, and punishment, were unjust: first, because the law, commonly called the Sedition law, under which he was indicted, was passed in direct opposition to the letter and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States; and secondly, because the said judges did not only take for granted the constitutionality of the said law, but did unjustly and improperly refuse to grant him a subpœna ad testificandum, directed to the said John Adams; and therefore praying such redress as the wisdom of Congress shall deign to bestow.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to reject the prayer of the petition.

Mr. GILES moved to postpone the consideration of the petition till the third Monday in November.

On this motion a debate ensued, in which Mr. GILES and Mr. RANDOLPH supported, and Mr. GRISWOLD and Mr. BAYARD opposed the motion.

The question on postponement was carried, by a large majority.

THURSDAY, April 29.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed on the fourteenth of December last, to inquire and report whether moneys drawn from the Treasury have been faithfully applied to the objects for which they were appropriated, and whether the same have been accounted for, and to report, likewise, whether any further arrangements are necessary to promote economy, enforce adherence to legislative restrictions, and secure the accountability of persons entrusted with the public money, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, entitled "An act to extend and continue in force the provisions of an act, entitled 'An act giving a right of pre-emption to certain persons who have contracted with John Cleves Symmes, or his associates, for lands lying between the Miami rivers, in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and for other purposes;' and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill stated in the foregoing message: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to all the said amendments.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to establish the compensations of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill last mentioned, and, the same being read, were agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making an appropriation for carrying into effect the Convention between the United States and the King of Great Britain; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House this day.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally read and agreed to.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time this day.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to abolish the Board of Commissioners in the City of Washington, and to make provision for the repayment of loans made by the State of Maryland for the use of the city;" and the same being read were agreed to.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill.

On motion, it was Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-sixth of February last, a letter from William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Indiana Territory, enclosing certain resolutions of the grand jury of the county of Knox, in the said Territory, asserting the rightful claim of that Territory to the Island of Michilimackinac, and its dependencies, as an integral part of the said Territory, in opposition to the claim of the Government of the Northwestern Territory, to the same, be discharged from further proceeding thereon.

Mr. JOHN TALIAFERRO, Jr., from the Committee appointed to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary in the existing laws and government of the Territory of Columbia, and to whom were also referred sundry memorials and petitions of the inhabitants of the said Territory, made a report thereon: Whereupon, Ordered, That the Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the said petitions and memorials.

An engrossed bill making an appropriation for carrying into effect the Convention between the United States and the King of Great Britain was read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the eighteenth of January last, the petition of John Cleves Symmes, be discharged from further proceedings thereon.

FRIDAY, April 30.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and two, with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill last mentioned, and, the same being read, were agreed to.

Resolved, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on Saturday, the first of May.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend and continue in force the provisions of the act, entitled 'An act giving a right of pre-emption to certain persons who have contracted with John Cleves Symmes, or his associates, for lands lying between the Miami rivers, in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and for other purposes.'"

The said bill was then read the third time, and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to establish a post office at or near the Capitol, on or before the next session of Congress.

Mr. ELMENDORF, from the committee to whom was committed the bill from the Senate to empower John James Dufour, and his associates, to purchase certain lands, reported that the committee had had the same under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

The said bill was then read the third time, and, on the question that it do now pass, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill to provide more effectually for the due application of public money, and for the accountability of persons entrusted therewith, be postponed until the third Monday in November next.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred, on the nineteenth of January, the petition of Memucan Hunt and others, addressed to the General Assembly of North Carolina, and, also, sundry resolutions of the said Assembly, relative to a claim for the value of certain lands in the State of Tennessee, be postponed until the third Monday in November next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, of the eighth of March last, on the memorial of Henry Messonier; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That there be paid to Henry Messonier, from any money in the Treasury, not heretofore appropriated by law, the sum of six hundred and fifty-five dollars and ninety cents, being the amount of duties paid by him on fourteen hogsheads of coffee, imported in the ship Pacareau, Captain Latour, and entered at the port of Baltimore, on the eighteenth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, which sum had also been paid, on the same fourteen hogsheads of coffee, by Champaign and Deyme.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and two, with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and the same being read, were agreed to.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill for the relief of Henry Messonier; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time this day.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Henry Messonier was read the third time, and its further consideration postponed until the third Monday in November next.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to procure a clock for the use of the House of Representatives, and cause it to be placed in some convenient part of the Representatives' Chamber.

SATURDAY May 1.

Ordered, That there be a call of the House on Monday next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House, of the thirteenth ultimo," authorizing an adjournment of the two Houses of Congress," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment of the Senate, and the same being read, was agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to an amendment and modification of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads," agreeably to a report thereon, made this day to the Senate, by the conferees appointed on their part.

The House proceeded to consider the message of the Senate of this day, and the report of the joint committee of conference, transmitted therewith, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act further to alter and establish certain post roads." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth concur with the Senate in their agreement to the amendment and modification of the said amendments, as proposed by the Joint Committee of Conference thereon.

DISBURSEMENT OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—Notwithstanding the late period of the session, I feel it my duty to call the attention of the House to a subject of some importance, and which has not, during the session, met with any particular consideration. That subject is, the report of the select committee, who were appointed to investigate, "whether moneys drawn from the Treasury have been applied to the objects for which they were appropriated."

I should consider myself inexcusable for introducing this subject at the present time, when the session is to continue only one day longer, and the usual hour of adjournment has nearly arrived, if it had been possible to have called it up at an earlier hour; but it is well known that, although the committee were appointed at a very early period of the session, they made their report only the day before yesterday, and it has appeared on our tables in a situation to be examined for the first time this morning.

It may, perhaps, be inquired that, being a member of the committee, if it was my intention to bring the report under discussion, it would not have been my duty to have submitted some motion to the House as soon as the report was first read at the Clerk's table; but if it had been possible for me to have submitted a motion, it is obvious from the length of the report, and the detail which it contains, that it would have been impossible for gentlemen to have understood the subject without having the report in some shape before them. But the fact really is, that, although a member of the committee, I have known little more about the report than any other member of the House.

The course which this subject took in the committee, it may be necessary, in a very concise manner, to explain. The whole committee attended the investigations at the Executive offices, but the minority had no knowledge of the intentions of the majority; and, for one, I declare that, although I attended the committee very regularly in their public investigations, yet I did not receive the smallest hint of the intentions of the majority—what report they intended to make, or whether any, during the present session, until two days before the report was made to the House; on which day the committee were called together an hour before the meeting of the House, to agree upon a report. When we met, the report was presented to us, already drawn up in its present shape, and we were requested to hear it read, to make our objections or give our approbation. This was certainly an unusual and a very short mode of making a report, upon a subject which had been deemed sufficiently important to engage the attention of the committee for nearly five months. We accordingly had the report read, and although it was impossible, from this hasty examination, to go into much detail, yet a single reading was sufficient to enable us to discover that the report was excessively erroneous. Some of the errors were mentioned, and, for reasons which I will not take up the time of the House at this time to detail, the subject was postponed until the next morning, although the majority had designed to make their report on that day. In the mean time, the minority requested copies of the report, that they might deliberately examine every part of it, and compare it with their recollection of facts. These copies it was agreed should be furnished, but, in consequence, I presume, of the length of the report, they were not procured, and the minority had no opportunity of examining the report with any attention. When the committee met the next morning, the subject was again postponed, in consequence of a discussion upon one detached part of the report, and the report was not of course delivered to the House until the morning following, when it appeared in its original form; I mean in every essential point. I have mentioned these circumstances because I think it important that they should be known, and because I believe they will satisfy the House that it has not been in the power of the minority of the committee to enter into a discussion of the report, until they obtained, in common with the other members of the House, the printed copies this morning.

I will likewise add a further fact, whilst I am explaining the proceedings of the committee. It is: that three members of the seven who composed the committee, were decidedly opposed to the report in all its partial parts; and the report must be considered as the act of a bare majority. The House will be satisfied, I trust, by the reasons which I have stated, that it has not been my fault that the motion which I am now about to submit has been delayed to this late hour.

My motion is, that the report be recommitted to a select committee, for the purpose of correcting the many errors which it contains; and I must be indulged in stating, as concisely as possible, some of the reasons on which I ground this motion.

The report is evidently calculated to impress the public mind with unfavorable sentiments respecting the conduct of the late Administration, and particularly the conduct of several individuals who have been, and still are, held in high estimation by a numerous class of well-informed and virtuous citizens. This impression ought not to be made, because the real facts, which exist in relation to every transaction to which the report alludes, can warrant no such impression.

The report, I shall attempt to show, is excessively erroneous, both in the facts and the inferences which it states. I wish not, however, to be understood, by any remarks which I may make, to implicate the committee; I have nothing to do with the motives which regulated their conduct; I presume they were virtuous, and that when they calmly examine their own proceedings, they will readily consent to correct their errors.

It will be impossible at this time, to go as fully into an examination of the report as I could wish, and I shall be compelled, from the peculiar situation of the House, to confine my remarks to those parts which are the most prominent.

The first object which has received the animadversion of the committee, is the expense of removing the Executive officers and their clerks from Philadelphia to the seat of Government. This expense, which amounted to $32,872 34, the committee say, "was drawn from the Treasury and expended without any legal authority." This is a strong expression, and ought to be very clearly supported, to justify the committee in uttering it. Let us, however, examine the authority under which the money was drawn from the Treasury, in consequence of a decision of the accounting officers of that department, and it will not be doubted but that the law has made it the duty of those officers to decide this very question; nor will it be contended that the decisions of the accounting officers, fairly and honestly made, are not a sufficient justification for the payment of all public accounts. How, then, can the committee say that these moneys were paid without any legal authority, when it is certain that these accounts of expense were regularly presented and allowed by the tribunals who were authorized and directed by law to decide upon them? I should ask the committee, under what other authority than the decisions of the accounting officers, can money, in strictness, ever be legally paid at the Treasury? It is not, certainly, in the power of the House of Representatives to audit the public accounts, or to reverse the decisions of the accounting officers, much less are a committee of the House clothed with any such powers. If the committee, instead of deciding over the head of the regular tribunals, had told us the whole truth upon this point—if they had explained the power of the Treasury Department, and stated the fact, that this department had regularly admitted and paid the accounts, it is certain that the opinion which they have reported would have appeared without any foundation; and although it might remain a speculative question with individuals, and some might be of opinion that the decision of the Treasury was right, and others might believe it to be wrong, yet all parties would concur in the opinion that the decision was conclusive, and the money paid in consequence of it, was paid under a legal authority.

If, however, we indulge ourselves in revising the Treasury decision upon this question, I am inclined to believe that we shall find it correct. The law of 1790, which fixes the permanent seat of Government, provides, "that the offices attached to the seat of Government shall be removed to the District of Columbia on the first day of December, 1800, by their respective holders," and declared that the necessary expense of such removal should be defrayed out of the duties on imports and tonnage. By this law, the holders of the offices were directed to remove them, and the question is, how and to what extent was the removal to be made? It will be admitted, I presume, that the offices were to be removed in an efficient manner, that is to say, in such a form as to enable the Executive departments to perform their duties without delay at Washington. The officers, in removing their offices, were certainly obliged to remove themselves, for they held the offices in their own persons, and the operation could not be performed without their personal removal. Nor could the offices be removed in such a form as to perform their duties at the seat of Government without carrying along with them the clerks; the clerks were attached to the offices, and without them, the offices could not be said to be efficiently removed. It would then, I think, result from this view of the subject, that the direction of the statute to remove the offices, necessarily gave an authority to remove every individual connected with the offices, and whose services were necessary for transacting the public business. And if the individuals were to be removed, I should presume that no doubt could exist but that they must and ought to be removed in such a manner as to render their situation comfortable in this place—I mean with their families and furniture; and whether they transported a trunk too much or not, would be an inquiry too contemptible to occupy the attention of the House.

What induces me to think still more favorably of the decision of the Treasury, is the strong equity on which the decision rests. It is, at this time, well understood, and, indeed, settled, by the act of the present session, that the allowances to the Executive officers and clerks was fixed upon the principle of their remaining permanently at one place, and nothing has been, or now is, included in the regular compensation of those officers for the extra expense of travelling on public business from one place to another; such extra expense must, in the nature of things, be compensated by extra allowances; and, although it is true, as the committee say, that the officers and clerks were at this time receiving their pay from the Government, yet they were only receiving the usual compensation, which was not higher than the same grades of officers receive at this time. Can it, then, be doubted, when the Government required these officers to incur the extraordinary expense of removing one hundred and fifty miles, with their families, that the extra expense should be discharged by Government, whether that expense consisted of losses, resulting from the removal, or charges of travelling? Finding, then, the legal decision and the equity of the case so strongly against the committee, I think myself warranted in saying that this part of the report is erroneous.

It is further to be remarked, that the committee have not explicitly declared by whom these payments were made, but the report is so expressed as to leave no doubt that the committee intended it should be understood that the payments were all made under the former Administration, whereas the fact I believe to have been that, although a greater proportion of them were made under the former Administration, yet that some payments were since made; and if my information is correct, and I trust it will be found so, for it is derived from the most authentic source, one advance was made by the present Secretary of the Treasury by a warrant on the Treasury, even before the account of the individual was settled or allowed. This circumstance is important, inasmuch as it furnishes a recent precedent to justify the former decision, and will induce the committee to examine their proceedings with more caution, when they find that, in condemning the former Administration, they are at the same time implicating their friends; for it will not be contended, I presume, that if, as the committee say, no authority existed for this expenditure, the precedent of the former Administration could justify the advance made by the present Secretary.

The next important object which the report has noticed, is the accounts in the War and Navy Departments. Upon this subject the committee say, there remains in the War Department more than three millions of dollars "unaccounted for or not yet settled," and in the Department of the Navy more than four millions, "an unaccounted for or unsettled balance."

This statement, although it does not contain any explicit charge against those departments, yet it is so expressed as to countenance those infamous falsehoods which have appeared in certain newspapers, charging the departments with the embezzlement of the public money. A charge which the committee certainly did not intend to countenance. The report ought to have been more explicit upon this point; the committee ought to have explained what they intended by "balances unaccounted for or unsettled." I take the liberty of declaring that, although in point of form it may be true, that these sums remain unaccounted for, yet, in fact, nothing comparable to it exists. The mode in which business is transacted in the offices of the accountants of the War and Navy, I understand to be this: whenever a sum of money is advanced to an individual, he is immediately charged with it; and although it may have been advanced for services actually rendered, or supplies furnished, yet nothing is passed to his credit till a voucher is produced for every item in the account, and the account, although nothing is due upon it, remains unsettled, and, in the sense of the committee, a balance unaccounted for. In this manner, these millions mentioned by the committee are principally made up. For instance, in the War Department, the account of the Quartermaster General remains unsettled to the amount of nearly nine hundred thousand dollars; his account, however, has been rendered, accompanied, as I understood, by vouchers which cover the whole amount, but in consequence of some dispute or uncertainty respecting a small part of the account, it remains open, and the whole of this large sum has gone in to make a part of the balance unaccounted for in the War Department. Other accounts are in the same situation, and it is from such facts that the committee have thought themselves justified in declaring that these balances remain unaccounted for.

In the Department of the Navy, although, from the causes which I have mentioned, there remains a great number of open accounts, amounting to more than four millions of dollars, yet the accountant declared to the committee that vouchers had been transmitted to the office, covering the whole sum, except about five hundred thousand dollars; but the accounts were not settled, nor the vouchers carried to the credit of the particular accounts, because the mode of settlement did not warrant the entry of any credit until every item was covered by a voucher. The accountant further declared, that this sum of five hundred thousand dollars consisted principally of moneys recently advanced for the current service, for which vouchers were constantly coming in, and that on winding up the whole account of that department, he was persuaded that Government would not sustain losses to exceed ten or twelve thousand dollars.

Under such circumstances, can it be imagined that the committee were justified in talking about millions unaccounted for? Or, if they thought proper to do it, should they omit to explain, in a more ample and satisfactory manner, their meaning? Ought not the facts which I have mentioned, on every principle of fairness and truth, to have been annexed to that report! If this had been done, it would have appeared that the disbursements of the War and Navy Departments were made with so much attention and good fortune, that the losses of the Government have been less than are generally experienced by merchants in transactions of equal extent.

It is said, that the documents which attend the report will explain this point. I must be permitted to say that the report will be published in every newspaper, (for which purpose it appears to be principally intended,) whilst the voluminous documents will be very much confined to the members of this House, and never read by those who will read the report.

Again, the committee say that four navy yards were purchased without authority, and the money misapplied which was paid for them. In my judgment, this is one of the most extraordinary opinions ever pronounced. The facts which gave rise to the purchase of the navy yards were as follows: In the year 1799, Congress authorized by law the building of six 74-gun ships, and one million of dollars was then appropriated for that object, and for building six sloops-of-war. The Secretary of the Treasury found that the committee ought to have understood that ships could not be built either in the air or upon the water, and as he was directed to build the ships, that he must, of course, procure land to place them upon, and that the land must be either purchased or hired. He found that there was not a navy yard within the United States calculated for building ships-of-the-line, and that the expense of preparing yards upon private property would be lost the moment the ship was launched, and of course that this would be bad economy. Experience had likewise taught him, that the better mode would be to purchase the ground, as it would then remain at the control of the Government, so long as it was wanted, and the improvements would be saved. This course was accordingly pursued, and I believe that few gentlemen, except the committee, will conclude that it was not the wisest and best. But whether it was the best course or not, it was certainly authorized by law, because it can never be seriously doubted, whether a law which directs a thing to be done, does authorize the agents to be employed to do everything which becomes necessary for accomplishing the object. The laws which have authorized the building of ships have certainly empowered the public agents to purchase timber, copper, cordage, and every other necessary material, and yet no law for those objects has ever named any one of those articles. On the same principle, the law which directed the building of these particular ships, necessarily authorized the public agent to procure the ground to place them upon, although it was not said, whether the ships should be built upon the water or upon the land.

But there has been one omission in this part of the report, which, on every principle of fairness ought to be connected with it, and for which purpose the report ought to be recommitted: the omission of the letter of Mr. Stoddert, late Secretary of the Navy, explanatory of the purchase made by him of the navy yards, addressed to the committee, in answer to an application made by them upon this subject. This letter contains, in my opinion, a complete justification of that transaction, and was so viewed by the minority of the committee, who urged that it might, at least, be included in the report; but, to our astonishment, the minority refused this justice to the man whom their report had implicated. This opinion of the majority, in respect to the propriety of including Mr. Stoddert's letter, I must believe, will remain a solitary one, for I can scarcely imagine it possible that any other gentleman in this House would have refused, when they presented a charge against this gentleman with one hand, to offer with the other his vindication, written at their own request. If, however, the motion to recommit should prevail, I will then move an instruction to the committee, which will produce Mr. Stoddert's letter.

The committee have likewise thought proper, in general terms, to censure the expenditure for erecting the public buildings on the banks of the Schuylkill, near Philadelphia. They do not say whether the money expended upon that object was authorized or unauthorized; they only say that the expense, which amounted to about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, could not be justified. Without troubling the House with any comments upon the propriety of this conduct of the committee in passing the bounds which their appointment had limited, and erecting themselves into a board of censors, to condemn every expenditure which did not please them, whether authorized or not, I must be permitted to say, that nothing, in my judgment, could excuse them, if they took this course, in suppressing the facts which led to the erection of those buildings.

That the expense was justified by law, I presume cannot be doubted, when the object and the nature of the appropriations for the Military Establishment are considered. And as to the extent of the expense, it is a point about which gentlemen may probably differ in opinion. For my own part, I readily acknowledge that I am not a competent judge, nor do I believe (I speak with great deference) that the majority of the committee possess sufficient experience to decide the question. The former Secretary of War, who commenced the buildings, (Mr. McHenry,) was certainly a man of liberal mind and of large and extensive views, and disposed to found every permanent establishment upon a scale which should in some measure comport with the future prospect of this country, and prove them to be the establishments of a nation, and not of a petty corporation. The circumstances which induced the War Department to commence these buildings, I have understood to be, (without having received, however, any particular information in relation to the fact,) that the military stores at Philadelphia were at that time stored in private buildings without the city, and exposed in those situations to fires and accidents; that Philadelphia being one of the finest mercantile towns in this country, rendered it convenient to collect stores at that point, and being at the same time sufficiently inland to be secure from any foreign attack, and withal somewhat central, it was desirable to render the collection of military stores extensive, and to establish what may be now called an arsenal at that place. To accomplish these objects, and for other military purposes, the buildings were commenced on the Schuylkill. And being disposed to place more confidence in the Secretary of War than in the committee on this point, I can see nothing at present which proves the building to have been unnecessary or too extensive, and I think it highly probable that the founder will hereafter derive more honor from commencing them than the committee will receive from censuring the measure.

What renders the report of the committee still more extraordinary, both in respect to erecting the buildings, and also the purchase of navy yards, is, that another subject, resembling these in principle, was before the committee, and on which they refused to report. This was the erecting of the extensive navy stores in this place by the present Administration.

The present Secretary of the Navy was requested to inform the committee when those stores were erected, and from what fund the money had been taken. His answer satisfied the committee that the stores had been erected by the present Administration, and that the money, if I recollect correctly, had been taken from an appropriation for the 74's, navy yards, and docks. The minority of the committee believed, what I trust will be generally believed by those who examine the question, that this was (to say no more of it) at least as doubtful an expenditure as that for the purchase of navy yards, or for erecting the buildings on the Schuylkill. If an authority to build 74's, to complete navy yards and docks, gave an authority to erect stores for the accommodation of the navy, it was thought that an authority to build ships, necessarily included a power to procure the land to place them upon; and that an authority to purchase military stores and to manage the affairs of the army necessarily included a power to furnish, at the public expense, buildings to cover the stores, and for other necessary military purposes, at the discretion of the officers entrusted with those concerns. The minority of the committee, therefore, urged to include this transaction in the report, together with the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, but the request was rejected by the majority. We believed that the cases were precisely similar in principle, and that it was not conducting with impartiality to include the one without the other; and we have thought that when it was discovered that the present Administration was conducting on principles precisely similar to those of their predecessors, it would greatly tend to satisfy all parties that the conduct of the Government had been correct. I feel no hesitation in declaring that, in my judgment, the present Administration were authorized to erect the navy stores, although I believe that the power may be better questioned than it could be in the other cases. These navy stores, I presume, are useful both for receiving the necessary materials for ship building, and securing the stores of the public ships laid up in ordinary; and although not expressly authorized by the words of the law, may very well be considered as a proper appendage to a navy yard, or as buildings rendered necessary in the finishing of the 74's; and as to the extent of the buildings, I am content to leave that point to the Department to which it has been confided. The propriety, however, of including this statement in the report (I trust) will be apparent to the House, and it will not in this place be thought correct to confine our criticisms exclusively to the past Administration. I therefore urge this as a further reason for recommending the report.

The committee have likewise mentioned the payment of about two hundred dollars to some persons at Georgetown, on account of a house which had been hired in that place by Mr. McHenry, the former Secretary of War. If the committee believed it proper to trouble the House with this trifling transaction, they ought to have stated every circumstance which attended it, and the House could then decide (if, indeed, it was proper to decide at all) whether the payment was rightly made or not. Since the committee, however, have not done this, I beg leave to state what I have understood to be the circumstances under which this payment was made.

In the Spring of 1800, whilst the Government remained at Philadelphia, Mr. McHenry was Secretary at War, and being obliged to prepare for removing his office, agreeably to law, to the permanent seat of Government, he found it necessary to engage a house in Georgetown, in the vicinity of the public buildings, for himself and family. After this was done, and without any previous notice, he was compelled to resign his office, by a request from the President, which in such case may be considered as a command. The house, of course, became useless to him, and the person of whom he hired it claimed either rent or damages, and, upon a reference, the sum of about two hundred dollars was awarded. It is obvious, from this statement, that the expense was incurred by Mr. McHenry in consequence of being Secretary of War; that it was an extra expense, arising entirely from the order to remove from Philadelphia to Washington, and that it was a dead loss, produced by these causes, and for which Mr. McHenry did not receive the benefit of a cent. Under these circumstances, it was decided that Government ought to pay the loss; and if the committee had given us the facts, it is highly probable that the House would be of opinion that the decision was right.

Much has been said by the committee respecting a payment to Mr. Tracy for his services and expense in visiting the Western posts in the Summer of 1800. And here the committee have again, in the usual manner, excluded from their report the cases which have arisen under the present Administration, and which compare in principle with the case of Mr. Tracy.

It is objected to the employment of Mr. Tracy and the payment to him, because he was at that time a Senator of the United States, and by the

MAY, 1802.

H. OF R.

Constitution no member of the Legislature can hold at the same time an Executive office. But the case of Mr. Dawson, who was sent to France with the convention, compares essentially with the case of Mr. Tracy. Mr. Dawson continued in the employment of Government under that agency, and received his pay, after he was elected a member of this House. His account was before the committee, and it appeared that he was paid up to the month of October. And surely the Constitution has made no distinction between the members of the House and of the Senate. If it was right and Constitutional to employ Mr. Dawson on one agency, it was equally so to employ Mr. Tracy on another.

It is likewise objected to the account of Mr. Tracy, that his agency continued up to the commencement of the last session of Congress, and he was paid accordingly, and that in his account, as a Senator, he has likewise been allowed what is usually called travel from Litchfield to Washington, by which means he received (it is said) wages as an agent and travel as a Senator at the same time. But the committee forgot to include the cases of the new Senators who went from this House into the Senate last Spring. Mr. Stone of North Carolina, Mr. Sheafe of New Hampshire, and, I presume, Mr. Muhlenburg, also retained their seats in this House until the 3d of March, and they received their pay up to that time, and their travel at the commencement and at the close of the session; they went the next day into the Senate, and the two former, and probably the latter, received during that short Senatorial session their travel to and from the seat of Government. If it was right to allow those gentlemen what the committee would, I presume, call double pay, it cannot be objected to in the case of Mr. Tracy, who was employed as an agent up to the commencement of the session, entitled to receive his pay as such, and likewise entitled to his mileage as a Senator upon the settlement of that account.

I have not, however, been able to discover that either of these cases are repugnant to law. The Constitution declares "that no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." An office can only be created by the Constitution or by law, and there is neither a law or a provision in the Constitution creating an office in which either Mr. Tracy or Mr. Dawson was employed. The employment in which they were engaged was a mere agency, and could not with more propriety be called an office than the employment of purchasing bills for Government, upon commissions, or the building of a light-house upon contract. I cannot, then, see any Constitutional difficulty in either of these cases. If, however, any such objection did exist, I should rather suppose that the right of a Senator had become vacated, belonged exclusively to the Senate, and that the business of investigating the right of the members of this House to their seats belonged to the Committee of Elections.

The objection to what is called double pay, appears to arise from an inattention to the language of the law on this subject. The law fixing the compensation of members of the Legislature does not say a word about travel; the words are: "Each Senator shall be entitled to receive six dollars for every day he shall attend the Senate, and shall also be allowed, at the commencement and end of every such session or meeting, six dollars for every twenty miles of the estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress." The same expressions are used with respect to the members of the House, changing only the names. When a member, then, takes his seat in the Senate, he is entitled to his six dollars for every twenty miles of the estimated distance from his place of residence, let him come from what employment he may. It would, therefore, have been a mere affectation in either of the Senators to have refused this allowance, because in one case they had been engaged in the House of Representatives, and in the other, the gentleman had been employed in transacting business for the War Department. I am, therefore, inclined to believe that the decision in the Senate, which settled this allowance, was correct. I have not mentioned either of these cases with the remotest view of censuring the gentlemen who have been named, but finding a strong similarity existing between them and that of Mr. Tracy, I was compelled to refer to them to show a corresponding practice under the present Administration with that which has been so severely censured by the committee.

I have already mentioned that the case of Mr. Dawson was before the committee, and I will now state that the minority, seeing the strong similarity of his case with that of Mr. Tracy in one important feature, urged to include it in the report, but the majority, by the usual decision, rejected the proposition.

I might go into an examination of every part of the report, but at this late hour, and at the close of the session, I shall scarcely be excused for saying more than is absolutely necessary to explain my motion, and this I trust has already been done.

I have said that the report is erroneous both in facts and in inferences. By the erroneous statement of facts, I principally mean that the facts are not fully stated; that those facts are generally omitted which would most strongly repel the censures which the committee have bestowed upon the former Administration and upon individuals; and I have been always taught that partial statements are misstatements, and that the suppression of truths necessary to be known is as erroneous as the uttering of falsehood. I repeat again, that I have not the smallest intention of charging the committee with drawing up intentionally a partial or erroneous report, but such I think, and trust I have proved it to be, and I must expect from the candor of the committee, when they review their own work, they will unite with me, in the motion for recommitment.

There is one consideration, attending this transaction, which has been already alluded to, and which ought to impress itself strongly on the House; it is the division under which this report was made. Is it possible, that gentlemen can believe, that a report attended with such circumstances, and so many objections, can be respected? Will it not be considered as the result of party violence, and calculated to agitate the public mind, rather than to elucidate any salutary truths? But I will not enlarge upon these topics; I have in some measure explained my motion, and submit it to the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON had very little inclination, at this time, to enter into an explanation of this subject, which had been so misunderstood by the gentleman just up, on account of indisposition, nor was he very anxiously opposed to the recommitment, but he could perceive not a shadow of reason why the report should be recommitment.

The gentleman had grounded his motion upon the opinion, that all the necessary facts had not been stated. It was, to be sure, a very late period of the session, and the discussion would therefore consume much precious time; but notwithstanding that, if it should appear that any material facts had been suppressed, there would be good ground for recommitting the report. He should therefore think it necessary to test the grounds advanced, to prove the necessity of the recommitment.

1. It was first stated in favor of the motion, that the expense attending the removal of the Government was a duly authorized expense, because it had been passed by the accounting officers of the Treasury. But the real question is, were those accounting officers authorized to pass this account? In the examination of this question, the committee referred to the act of 1790, section six, in which are these words: "And all offices attached to the said seat of Government, shall accordingly be removed thereunto (Washington) by their respective holders." The question which occupied the committee was, what expense this act was intended to cover. In recurring to the documents, the committee found that $15,000 and odd was paid for removing the furniture of the offices, &c. This the committee did not think an unauthorized expense, because the law empowered it. The books, furniture, records, papers, &c., of the officers, and of the President, they thought the law authorized the removal of; but the committee could see no authority for paying $32,000 for the removal of the heads of departments, their furniture, their clerks and their families and furniture; they could see no reason, for paying to the clerks, &c. for their broken glass, and china, their tavern expenses, and what is called their dead house-rent in Philadelphia. The committee saw no reason, for saying these accounts were passed at the offices of the accounting officers, because it must be well known, that no account could be paid until it had been so passed. The only question which occupied the committee, was, to inquire whether the money so paid was duly authorized. Whether, for instance, one officer for breaking a looking-glass—another a piece of china, &c.—another to receive his house rent—another get his expenses paid, to come here to look after a house, and his tavern expenses while here, were the expenses within the meaning of the law above quoted? Facts of these kinds appearing to the view of the committee, they were bound to express an opinion upon them, for they did not think the accounts were legally passed. The law merely authorized the necessary expense for removing the public offices; it did not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to be paid five hundred dollars for the removal of his family and furniture, nor the Secretary at War seven hundred dollars. Several others also received as much as five hundred dollars, and thence, from the heads of the departments, down to the clerks, to fifty dollars. The committee did not mean to implicate the characters of these gentlemen for receiving the public money, but they considered it their duty to disclose facts, and to declare that they did not believe the expenditure legally authorized.

The second observation the gentleman made was, from that part of the report which states that an unsettled balance of four millions in the War Department, and of three millions in the Navy Department, remains. He says it was the duty of the committee to have stated, that almost the whole of those sums had been received, although unsettled. If the House will examine the documents accompanying this report, they will find that the sums paid into the Treasury from this large sum, have actually been passed to the credit of the departments. This the committee thought sufficient, because any man who would give himself the trouble to examine, would find that much has been settled. But the committee could not say with precision how much, because the period of the session was such as to prevent them from passing through such voluminous accounts. It would have been an extremely laborious and tedious undertaking, and therefore the committee were obliged to report briefly. The committee could not examine particularly into the items, nor form any comparison whereby to prove their accuracy or inaccuracy; they were obliged to take it for granted that those things were all right. They reported agreeably to the mode of doing business in the Treasury Department. Until the account of any individual is finally closed, let him be indebted ever so little, he is considered, in the Treasury books, a debtor for the whole of the account. In this way the committee reported, and accompanied the document with marginal notes, exhibiting where the accounts have been rendered and partially settled.

As to the navy yards, the committee having been appointed "to report whether moneys drawn from the Treasury, have been faithfully applied to the objects for which they were appropriated, and whether the same have been regularly accounted for;" and knowing that six navy yards had been purchased, very naturally inquired under what authority these purchases had been made, and how they were paid for. They referred to the law authorizing the building of six seventy-fours and six sloops of war. The committee submitted an inquiry to the former Secretary of the Navy, (Mr.

MAY, 1802.

Disbursement of Public Moneys.

H. OF R.

Stoddert,) directing him to inform the committee as to the purchase. Mr. Stoddert answered, that a law had passed, appropriating one million of dollars for building the seventy-fours and sloops of war, and that fifty thousand dollars were also appropriated for two dock yards; and also that two hundred thousand dollars were appropriated for the purchase of timber, or land clothed therewith; and that he thought himself authorized to purchase six navy yards, wherein to build the seventy-fours. To these several laws the committee referred for the authority under which the Secretary acted, but they could find no such authority; they could find no other, than authority to purchase two dock yards, wherein to repair the ships. Now, although not stated in the report, there is very good reason to believe that the fifty thousand dollars never was laid out upon the two dock yards, but that this sum was cast into the surplus fund. Whether Mr. Stoddert's opinion was correct or not, that it would be more economical to build the seventy-fours in public yards, than in private yards at rent, the committee were not appointed to inquire; it was their business to say whether he was authorized to act so, let his private opinion be what it might. The committee were clearly of opinion, that he was not authorized to take money appropriated for one purpose and make use of it for another.

As to the reason, why the gentleman wishes the report recommitting; to wit, to insert Mr. Stoddert's answer with the report; it is true a motion for the insertion was made. But the committee thought that letter was addressed to them, and not to the House; that it was to inform their minds, so as to enable them to make the report. They paid due attention to the reasoning of the letter, but it did not convince them that Mr. S. acted authoritatively. Mr. Stoddert's reasoning upon the subject could not form a part of the report; the committee were called upon to form an opinion, and not to substitute that of any individual. They were to inquire whether moneys appropriated were used to the purposes for which they were appropriated. They thought it was not, because it was appropriated to build ships, and to purchase land with timber on it, or timber alone. The question then is, whether six navy yards are six seventy-four gun ships, and whether six sloops-of-war are lands with timber growing on it or not? If Mr. Stoddert's reasoning had been adopted by the committee, it would have become their reasoning, and except it should be theirs, it would have had no business in the report. If a disposition of vindication could have been admitted, Mr. Stoddert might have been permitted to have appeared with counsel before the committee, but facts alone were required, and facts the committee state. Ships had been built for the public before, but the idea never was entertained to build docks for them. No measure different from those taken in the building of the frigates, except by legal authority, ought to have been taken with the seventy-fours.

The military arsenal at Philadelphia, the gentleman said, was built to keep the stores in with more safety, than they could be kept in private stores, in the neighborhood of which frequently fires occurred. All this might be truth, but if these were facts, Mr. Nicholson would ask, why were not Congress applied to, to say whether they would take the risk, or whether build stores, for the more safe deposit of the public stores? But the money which built this military arsenal or laboratory, (more properly,) he believed it would be found was taken from the Quartermaster's department. Now, was it ever thought, that this fund should supply resources to build a laboratory? Was the Quartermaster's department ever appropriated to, for other than the purposes expressed or intended? No laboratory can be built, but by the authority of the State where erected; but where is the State authority, or where the appropriated fund for this purpose? Upon examination, the committee could see no authority to appropriate or apply public money for this purpose, and yet they found that one hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars were taken from the Quartermaster's department for this military arsenal! The committee could see no authority for the expense, and that fact they have stated.

As to the resignation of Mr. McHenry, whether voluntary or at the request of the President, the committee saw no reason why the Government should provide the house for Mr. McHenry at Georgetown. It might be supposed that neither that officer, nor his friends, would have thanked the committee for reporting any reasons, which might have caused his removal from office:—they had nothing to do with it, having no document upon the subject.

The account of Mr. Tracy is next vindicated, and all the gentleman appears to regret here is, that Mr. Dawson's account is not inserted in the report. One general answer might be given to this. It was believed by a majority of the committee, that Mr. Tracy did receive money from the Treasury improperly, but it never has been suggested that Mr. Dawson did so, and therefore there is no comparison of the cases. Nay, it was said by the gentleman himself, (Mr. Griswold,) that he did not blame Mr. Dawson. The committee saw a most material distinction in the cases. At the time of Mr. Tracy's appointment, he was a member of the Senate of the United States. At the time of Mr. Dawson's appointment, he was a member of neither branch. Mr. Dawson received his warrant of appointment some time in March, but he was not elected to fill a seat in this House till the end of April, and then he was on his mission. His functions of member of Congress had ceased before his appointment, and his appointment took place before his re-election. Again, Mr. Dawson received no pay after some time in October last, which was some months before the sitting of the House. On the contrary, Mr. Tracy received his pay of officer, or agent, or whatever he was, for seventeen days after the sitting of the Senate; so that he was paid as a member of the Senate, and as an officer at the same time. The committee could not discover the cases as parallel to each other, and therefore did not insert the case of Mr. Dawson, which was moved by the minority.

Several other cases were also mentioned—those of Mr. Sheafe, Mr. Muhlenberg, and Mr. Stone; but whether they were as represented or not, they were not brought into the view of the committee; otherwise there would have been an inquiry.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—I did not mention the case of General Muhlenberg, nor did I charge the other gentlemen with improper conduct: I believe they were strictly warranted to act as they did. I merely stated the reference for the purpose of showing that Mr. Tracy was entitled to the compensation he received for travel, as well as the others, because it has been a long-standing rule of the Senate to allow the travel in such cases. It is not our province, therefore, to object to it. Respecting the decision of the Senate, I wish not to oppose it. And being no uncommon case, there is no necessity to bring up that of Mr. Tracy, whom I consider entitled to his travel, both as an agent and as a Senator.

Mr. NICHOLSON observed, that not being brought before the committee, and he not having heard of the case till this day, it could not be a reason why the report should be recommitted.

The case of the navy yard at this place was brought before the committee. It was the request of the minority that the case should be inquired into. The committee sent to request the Secretary of the Navy to say by what authority the storehouse had been erected here, or from what fund it was paid. The answer was, that the storehouse had been erected out of a fund granted in February, eighteen hundred and one, for completing the seventy-fours, the navy yards, and the docks. The ships had been ordered to be laid up in ordinary at this place, and the navy yard purchased. When the present Secretary of the Navy came into office, he found, that as a navy yard was to be completed here, and as sails, rigging, and other naval stores, must be kept here; and finding that one storehouse was already built, and another begun, here, it would be most prudent to complete that storehouse, as a necessary appendage to a navy yard where shipping would be sent for repairs. To this none of the gentlemen objected, but rather approved; and this is surely a purpose to which the money was appropriated. Whether the other applications are or not, is for the House to decide. The committee have stated the facts.

Mr. DAWSON said, he did not rise to answer the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) because he thought that had been ably done by the gentleman last up, and because his observations did not command that respect; but he rose to prevent any improper impression, which the misrepresentations of that gentleman might possibly make respecting himself. The gentleman stated that a member of this House was appointed to an official station on a foreign mission. As stated by the gentleman from Maryland, I did receive the appointment some time last March, said Mr. D. During my absence, the people of my district elected me a member of this House. Some time in October my business was closed. I arrived here some time in January, but did not receive salary as a member till some days after my arrival, and till I had taken my seat. This is well known to that and every other gentleman. Every gentleman must also know, that I could not be a member of this House until I took my seat, and therefore I could not have been appointed to, or held my seat, while exercising the business of the nation abroad. I must therefore say, that unless the other observations of the gentleman (Mr. GRISWOLD) are better founded than his relation of facts, they deserve very little credit indeed.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS always thought that a motion to recommit a report was grounded upon the insufficiency of that report as to facts. But he had hearkened with much attention, and had not discovered any arguments built on a misstatement of facts. If no facts are misstated, then the motion must necessarily fall. That the committee have not given a full and ample report upon the account, is admitted in the report; they say that the business was of such a nature, that it was not in their power, during their limited period, to do it. It was not uncommon, or contrary to rule, for committees to report in part, and this might be taken as a report in part. Did the gentleman mean to say, that no report ought to have been made, till all the subjects upon which the committee might have turned their attention had been fully examined? The committee have said, that there are many things which they should have investigated if they had had time. It is not certain, for instance, to what length the construction of the laws have been carried. The gentleman has said, that a certain construction has been put upon laws making certain appropriations, and this House has nothing to do with it. With this we cannot agree as a Legislative body, because if this length can be admitted, anything can. However men might differ in committees, it is for the House to determine on the facts stated in their report. Here the committee have reported certain facts: they have brought into view the uses to which certain appropriations were applied, to support which they have produced documents, so far as they were able. It is for the House, upon a view of these facts, to say whether or not the moneys have been applied to their proper uses, as directed by law. Upon this single point, he thought the question turned, whether or not these facts were misstated; if not, there could be no ground for a recommitment.

Mr. BAYARD.—I flatter myself, though perhaps vainly, if this report be recommitted, it will assume a very different shape, both in form and substance, upon its appearance at a subsequent session. The report, though the long work of near half a year, is extremely immature and incomplete. Having been a member of the committee, although of the minority, I have a right to suppose myself acquainted with its proceedings. It was impossible, from the course pursued, for the committee to have any correct knowledge, or certain opinion, as to the results which compose their report. We had no time to compare them with the details contained in the documents transmitted to us from the offices, and from which they were derived.

H. OF R.

Gentlemen may consider me, if they please, as speaking only of the minority of the committee, for I can speak with certainty only in relation to them. Though the committee existed for more than four months, the report which has been made was not the subject of consideration half the number of days. We had notice one evening to meet the next morning at ten o'clock to receive the report of the committee. I was astonished. The committee had directed no report to be drawn up, they had agreed to no fact, nor resolved upon any principle. We were summoned to meet at the hour to which the House was adjourned, and of consequence had no more time for our deliberation, than the period of grace, between the nominal hour of adjournment and the actual time of the House being called to order. The report was produced and once read. There was not time to compare the statements made with the documents referred to. Our opinions were immediately called for upon the report, as the intention was to present it that morning to the House. Upon a great part of the report, it was impossible for some of us to form so hasty an opinion; but there were some things obviously exceptionable. I shall not be considered as finding fault with the chairman of the committee—I presume he considered himself as conforming to the ordinary course of proceeding. Some of the exceptions which occurred to us, upon the cursory reading of the report, were stated. I will not say that a word was not corrected, but no material change was suffered. Observing that the official conduct of Mr. Stoddert was deeply implicated in the report, we urged that common justice required, that as Mr. S. was on the spot, that we should hear his defence, before we passed our judgments upon his acts. Upon this point the minority was joined by the chairman, and a letter was in consequence addressed to the late Secretary, requesting him to explain the grounds from which the authority was derived to make several disbursements. He was allowed till next morning to furnish an answer to the committee. At our meeting the ensuing day, Mr. Stoddert's answer was received. He had been manifestly hurried, but to the minority of the committee the answer was entirely satisfactory. We endeavored to vary the report accordingly, or at least to have the Secretary's letter annexed, and referred to among the documents. The attempts however were overruled. It occurred to us at this time, that we were bound to observe at least the same appearance of justice in relation to Mr. Tracy, whose conduct was the subject of our animadversion, which had been shown in respect to Mr. Stoddert.

It was therefore insisted, before the report was made, that Mr. Tracy should be allowed an opportunity of explanation. The chairman so far complied with the wish of the minority, as to agree that the report should be shown by a member of the committee to Mr. Tracy, and his answer waited for till the next morning. Upon the third day we made an effort to introduce into the report several cases, which had occurred under the present Administration, which the minority considered as standing upon the same ground with acts of the former Administration, which were condemned in the report. The effort was vain. The cases we referred to were distinguished by the vote of the majority from those which were stated. After one or two small amendments, the report was offered for our agreement, and adopted by four against three. The same morning the chairman presented it to the House.

I have made this statement in order that the House may be acquainted with the ground upon which I undertook to assert that the report was immature.

It was impossible, in the time allowed us, to weigh the evidence of facts, to consider the soundness of principles, or to examine the correctness of statements contained in the report. It will be perceived by those who are accustomed to the forms of proceeding upon committees, that our course has been entirely novel. It was usual heretofore for a committee to agree upon the substance of their report, and then to instruct their chairman to draw up a report in conformity to their opinion. In the present instance our opinions had not been asked, upon any point embraced by the report, before it was offered to us in its complete form.

If the points and cases which the report contains had been separately brought under discussion, they would have been more fully investigated and considered, and the result might, in consequence, possibly have been varied. As it regarded myself, this new mode of proceeding was a complete surprise. I had concluded, from everything which fell under my observation, that the intention of making a report was entirely abandoned. This inference was drawn from the small impression which had ever been observable from any discovery which the committee had made, as well as from the omission of any consultation which usually had been preparatory to a report. It would have been difficult for any of those to have conceived that such a report would have been made, who had never previously, from any one member of the committee, heard that any act of the Administration had been discovered worthy of being made the subject of our censorial power.

I see it stated in the report, that from the year seventeen hundred and ninety-seven to the year eighteen hundred and one, inclusive, a sum was advanced by the Treasury, chargeable to the War Department, exceeding ten millions of dollars, of which upwards of three millions remains unsettled or unaccounted for. And that from the year seventeen hundred and ninety-eight to eighteen hundred and one, a sum exceeding nine millions has been advanced on account of the Navy Department, and a balance unaccounted for, or unsettled, of more than four millions now remains. This statement may be warranted by the mere form in which the balances were transmitted to us, but is calculated to make the most erroneous impression. When the document containing the balances was sent to us, no one supposed it to afford any light, as to the objects of our investigation, or to furnish any complete information, upon which an opinion could be formed as to the money due to the United States. The face of the document itself, attests, that of the sums stated to be unsettled, the greater part had in fact been accounted for, and the formal closing of the accounts not having been considered very important either to the Government or to the individuals, they have remained open from the most trivial impediments. It would seem, from the mode in which these balances are sustained, that if one hundred thousand dollars have been advanced on a contract and ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine have been accounted for, yet the whole balance will appear to be due, till a voucher is produced for the last dollar. It appears also, in the face of the document, that balances are in some instances stated due to the United States, where it is manifest that the sum stated as a balance was a payment of a debt due from the Government. Many of the items, are money paid to the officers of the Army and Navy on their account of pay and subsistence, where the money was due for services. Nay, there are cases where money has been advanced on account, and afterwards, upon the inspection of the vouchers, the balance ascertained and paid, and yet, from the account not being formally closed, the whole sum appears and is reckoned among the balances due to the United States.

H. OF R.

Disbursement of Public Moneys.

MAY, 1802.

More than four millions are stated as unsettled balances upon the transactions of the Navy Department. I remember well, when we were in the office of the accountant of that department, the accountant stated it as his opinion, that the Treasury was not in advance for the department more than five hundred thousand; and that from his knowledge of those advances, he did not think the United States would lose ten thousand dollars, upon all the transactions of the department. I was struck with the information, knowing that the contracts of the Government are formed and executed by advances, and considering that ten thousand could be deemed but a very small loss upon an expenditure of ten millions of dollars. I considered it as an example of skill, vigilance, and success in the management of the public affairs, that is rarely afforded even in the conduct of private concerns. What has been remarked with respect to the Navy, equally applies to the War Department.

The aggregate balance of near four millions, stated as unsettled or unaccounted for, in the report, is composed of items, which, explained by the notes annexed to them, appear chiefly to be accounted for, to the satisfaction of the War Department. One item, which enters into the general balance, is a sum exceeding eight hundred and eighty thousand dollars. It appears that General Wilkins has furnished vouchers for the whole amount of the advances made to him, but has not furnished accounts for a small quantity of public property sold on the Ohio, (I believe some boats,) and therefore the account is not closed, and the whole amount ever advanced to him is computed among the unsettled balances. I understood the accountant was satisfied with General Wilkins's accounts.

Mr. NICHOLSON—The gentleman says the accountant of the War Department was satisfied with the accounts of General Wilkins. I did not understand the fact so—vouchers were sent on, but they were not satisfactory.

Mr. BAYARD.—I know not that there was complete satisfaction, as to the manner of each disbursement, but I mean, that it sufficiently appeared that the money had been expended on the public account. Thus an unsettled account, probably less in amount than two thousand dollars, gives the appearance of a balance unaccounted for, exceeding eight hundred and eighty thousand dollars. There are numerous instances of the same kind. In the list of balances, is the sum of one hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars, charged against Captain Vance; and it is stated, in the annexed note, that it appears that the whole sum has been duly applied. So against B. Williamson is charged a sum exceeding two hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars, though it is stated that he has furnished accounts of the application of the whole sum. It is needless to cite other instances of a similar kind; those which have been shown must convince the whole House that the report is not explicit, and is extremely exposed to a false interpretation. The objection to this part of the report furnishes the strongest ground for a recommitment. It certainly cannot be the design to raise a belief, that millions of the public money remain unaccounted for, when the documents from which all our knowledge is derived show that a very small sum remains unaccounted for; and when I undertake to say, that the evidence before us is not sufficient to prove that there is a dollar due to the United States. Can it be the interest of any party in the nation, or of any member upon this floor, to destroy the public confidence in the general administration of the Government? Let the peculiar honesty of one Administration be suspected, and their successors will soon sink under the same odious suspicion. On such a subject, we should banish our partialities and antipathies, not merely as a sacrifice which belongs to justice, but as an act required by a great national and common interest. I acknowledge that this part of the report will be harmless in the hands of those who will read, and are able to understand the documents on which it is founded. But the bulk of the document will probably exclude it from the public papers, and the great number of persons who read the report will read it without explanation. The probability, therefore, of the report creating false impressions, of a nature extremely derogatory from the honor of the Government, would alone be a sufficient motive with me to vote in favor of the motion to recommit.

There are many other grounds upon which I consider the report exceptionable. It is not however my intention at this late hour (six o'clock) to enter into all the details of the report. My observations will be confined to a few prominent and important points, upon which the different members of the committee held very opposite opinions. I had no knowledge of the resolution of my friend from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) to submit the motion on the table, before the meeting of the House this morning, and am therefore the more gratified that the honorable mover has taken so comprehensive a view of the subject, as to render it totally unnecessary for me to go over the whole ground.

MAY, 1802.

Disbursement of Public Moneys.

H. OF R.

I shall beg the indulgence only of a few words, upon one or two heads, respecting which the opinion I entertain is decidedly opposed to that expressed by a majority of the committee. I cannot well conceive of a plainer mistake, than what appears in the opinion, pronounced on the purchase of six navy yards, made by the late Secretary of the Navy. The committee, I think, ought to be allowed an opportunity of reviewing that opinion. Four of those six yards are considered as purchased without authority, and the money paid for them misapplied.

By the act of the Legislature, of February 1799, the Secretary of the Navy was directed to cause to be built six ships, each to carry not less than seventy-four guns; and six sloops-of-war of eighteen guns. For this purpose, a million of dollars was appropriated; two hundred thousand were appropriated to the purchase of land, bearing timber suitable for the Navy, and fifty thousand dollars for the making of two docks. These laws, passed on successive days, indicated the design of a permanent Navy Establishment. It was perfectly understood that the ships of the line were not directed to be built for the occasional defence of the country at that period, but were intended as the commencement of a lasting system of defence, which was expected to increase with the growth of the commerce and resources of the country. It was far from our expectation that the Navy of the United States was to be limited to six ships of the line, or to any number within the convenient means of the country, short of a force adequate to render our flag respectable and our navigation secure. It was not supposed that the seventy-fours would be launched for several years, but we had hopes when they left the stocks, a flourishing commerce would enable us to lay the keels of new ships in their places. Under this view were the two hundred thousand dollars appropriated, to the purchase of land producing timber fit for a navy. With this knowledge, so plainly derivable from the policy pursued by the Legislature, what was the Secretary of the Navy to do? It was made his duty to build six seventy-fours and six sloops-of-war. It is surely not expected that they were to be built on the water or in the air, and of consequence it will be allowed that he had authority to provide yards, for the purpose of constructing them. The public had no yards, and it was therefore necessary to obtain ground from individuals. As there were no persons disposed to make charitable grants, it remained only for the United States to purchase ground in fee simple, or for a term of years, paying a gross sum or an annual rent. The act of Congress, directing the ships to be built, appropriated not a dollar either for the renting or for the purchase of land. But a million of dollars were appropriated to the building of the ships, which was directed to be done, but which could not be done without an expenditure for land. Can there be a plainer proposition, than that an appropriation for a certain service embraces every article without which the service cannot be performed? In the present instance, the service imposed upon the Secretary could not be performed without obtaining navy yards at the public expense. It therefore rested in his discretion, for the faithful exercise of which he was accountable to the Government, either to purchase or rent the ground, necessary for the yards. It was his duty to conform to the views of the Legislature, and to make such an arrangement as would be most advantageous to the public. If it answered the object, and was most for the interest of the Government to rent, then surely he ought to have rented; but if it comported more with their views, or was more to their benefit to purchase, it was then his duty to purchase.

This inquiry, however, was never made by the committee. They never asked the question whether it was cheaper to buy or to rent, and they have condemned the Secretary for buying and not renting, when he had no more authority to rent than to buy, and when by buying he has probably saved to the United States several hundred thousand dollars. The situation of this officer is peculiarly hard. Having been directed to build a number of ships for the public service, he has purchased navy yards for the purpose, and in consequence has subjected himself to the accusation of expending public money without authority. If he had rented land for the purpose, he would have been equally liable to the same reproach; and if he had neglected to do either, he would have been exposed to an impeachment. The Secretary has it fully in his power to show, that his purchases will save a large sum of money to the United States. A navy yard, for a seventy-four, cannot be prepared without great expense. Under this head, I am informed by the Secretary, that one hundred thousand dollars were expended on one frigate, the Constellation. This was occasioned in a great degree by leasing the yard. At the expiration of the lease, the public lose the benefit of all their expense in preparing and improving the ground.

In addition to the inference which the Secretary might fairly make, of an authority to purchase ground for the navy yards, if a purchase could be made on cheaper terms than a contract of lease, he had further to consider the intention, plainly manifested by the Legislature, of establishing a system which would require the use of these navy yards at a future time, beyond the duration of any common lease. Nay, he knew not what time was to be consumed in building the ships directed, and of course could not know for what term a contract could be made. At present, if the Government should be disposed to sell the ships on the stocks, they have the power to sell the navy yards, and they will have the same power when the ships are launched; and they may thus convert in effect the permanent purchase into a term for years, and restore to the Treasury the money which has been expended. But, sir, what I consider as the hardest act on the part of the majority of the committee, was their refusal to suffer the answer of the Secretary to the letter we addressed to him, explaining the grounds of his conduct, to accompany the documents annexed to the report. We have been told by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) that it was not the business of the committee to report the opinions of the Secretary, or of any other individual. If this be correct, I believe it was as little the business of the committee to report their own opinions. They should have confined themselves to the statement of facts, and upon those facts have left the House and the nation at large to form their own opinions.

H. OF R.

Disbursement of Public Moneys.

MAY, 1802.

If this course had been pursued there would have been little occasion to publish the reasoning of Mr. Stoddert; but, as the opinion of the committee is merely their inference from certain premises, it was due to the public, as well as to the Secretary, that the grounds should be explained which had led him to a different conclusion from that adopted by the committee. This report seems, at present, intended only for public information; certainly I must believe to give correct information. The letter of Mr. Stoddert throws great light upon a part of it, and when our object is only to inform the people on a subject, why should we refuse any light which places it more clearly before their eyes?

I shall be allowed to say a few words in relation to the case of Mr. Tracy. I am not satisfied with the opinion or the conduct of the committee in relation to it. The service rendered by Mr. T. was not incompatible with his appointment of Senator. He was employed to visit the posts on the frontiers, and to collect for the Government all the material information respecting them. This was a very delicate, confidential, and difficult service; but the employment constituted no office. It was a simple agency, confined to a single occasion, performed under instructions, but no commission. But, sir, if the case of Mr. Tracy presented anything irregular, some of us conceived that the case of Mr. Dawson, standing on the same ground, ought also to have been stated in the report. The gentleman from Maryland has contended, to-day, that there is a difference between the cases. I am sensible of the difference. The one is the case of Mr. Tracy, the other is the case of Mr. Dawson. I see nothing in it to censure, but still considering it in every material respect the same with that of Mr. Tracy, there was equal reason for making it a part of the report. The chief ground on which it has been attempted to distinguish the cases is, that Mr. T. was a Senator, at the time when he was sent on his mission, and that when Mr. D. was appointed to his, he was not a member of this House. This distinction exists, but I trust I shall be able clearly to show that it is not material. And give me leave here to tell the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Dawson,) that in attempting to impeach the credit always due to the statements of my honorable friend from Connecticut, the imputed misstatement arose from his own misapprehension. The gentleman from Connecticut did not mean to state that he was a member of the House at the time of appointment, but that he was a member during a period that he was rendering service under Executive instructions.

I say, sir, that the cases are not materially distinguished by the circumstance that Mr. D. was not a member at the time of his appointment, because the holding a seat in either of the branches of the Legislature, under no Administration, has been considered as forming an incapacity to receive an Executive appointment. Under the former Administrations, several instances of such appointments occur; and under the present, I need only refer to the case of Mr. Pinckney, who was a member of the Senate at the time of his appointment as Minister to the Court of Madrid. The circumstance, therefore, of being or not being a member of the Legislature at the time of an appointment, is wholly immaterial. A member of the Legislature has an unexceptionable right to receive an Executive appointment, but the question is, whether the acceptance or exercise of an office under the Executive, does not vacate a seat in the Legislature. On this subject, I have no doubt that the acceptance of an office under the Executive, does vacate a seat in the Legislature. But the question still remains, whether the employments of Messrs. Tracy and Dawson are to be considered, under the Constitution, as offices. Upon this point, there cannot be a doubt but that the appointment of Mr. Dawson was as much in the nature of an office as that of Mr. Tracy. It will be remembered, that Mr. Dawson invited his constituents to elect him, proffered his services, and engaged to be at his post, when his duty should require his attendance. He was elected in April, and virtually accepted his place from the time of his election, and yet continued to serve under the Executive, and to receive pay for his services till October following. But, sir, I do not conceive that it belonged to the committee, or that it belongs to this House, to interfere in any degree in the case of Mr. Tracy. The employment of Mr. T. was unquestionably unexceptionable. The only question is, whether the employment did not vacate his seat in the Senate? This question, the Constitutional privilege of the Senate confines to that body, and for us to decide upon it, is an invasion of those privileges. If any thing wrong has been done, which attaches blame, it is by the Senate. With a knowledge of the employment in which Mr. T. had been engaged, they allowed him to retain his seat as a member of their body.

It is stated, that Mr. Tracy received pay for mileage as Senator, while the pay of his agency continued. The compensation for travelling is governed by the law of its own nature. Mileage is due where there is no travelling. An allowance is made to members, which is regulated by the distance of the place of their usual residence from the seat of Government. They are entitled to, independent on their coming from or returning home. When Congress adjourns, a member from Georgia is entitled to his mileage, whether he returns to his State, travels to the North, or remains at the Seat of Government.

It has been the practice in the Senate, when a member of this House, is appointed to that body, to allow him full mileage, notwithstanding his receiving mileage, for the same travelling, from this House. This happened in the case of Mr. Stone of North Carolina, and Mr. Sheafe of New Hampshire. They were both members of this House, during the last session, and held their seats till the third of March. On the fourth of March, they took their seats in the Senate, which had been called to meet on that day. They received full mileage as members of the respective Houses. Mileage is not a compensation for service, but an indemnification for a supposed expense. A person cannot be a member of the two Houses at the same time, but for the same time he is allowed mileage by each House. If, therefore, the employment of Mr. Tracy were a mere agency, there could be no objection to his receiving his mileage, during the continuance of the agency. The discussion of this subject has been extremely unpleasant to me. It is always unpleasant to have occasion to introduce into debate the names of gentlemen, whose feelings are unavoidably excited and often injured. But considering as a defect in the report, and a reason for recommitment, the statement of a case under the former Administration, and the omission of one precisely similar under the present, I have felt myself justified, as the case of Mr. T. was stated in the report, to state the case of Mr. Dawson in the debate.

I need, sir, say very little relative to the expense attending the erection of the laboratory in the vicinity of Philadelphia. The subject has been well explained by my friend from Connecticut; the building was necessary for the preservation of the arms and stores of the United States, and the expense was therefore properly defrayed out of the appropriations for the Quartermaster's department.

The gentleman from Maryland, in justifying the erection of stores at Washington, has furnished ample authority for the erection of the buildings near Philadelphia. The public stores lately built here, are paid for out of an appropriation for making a wharf. The gentleman, however, has contended that the articles of naval equipment could not be preserved, without the covering and protection of stores, and thence he infers an authority to erect them. I am not disposed to question the soundness of the argument, but it applies with equal force in vindication of the expense incurred in erecting the stores, or the laboratory, as it has been called, which is the subject of animadversion in the report. We contended, on the committee, that the case of the stores erected in this city, ought also to be stated in the report, on the same ground with that of the laboratory, but distinctions satisfactory to the mind of the majority excluded it.

I ask pardon for having detained the House so long at this late hour. The subject is of considerable importance, and I confess I have felt not a little anxiety, to prevent a false impression being made by the report upon some points. I see no reason, which I had the means of explaining, why gentlemen should not agree to recommitment. It is not proposed to act upon the report this session. The committee confess their task is very imperfectly executed. Why send out such an unfinished work to the world? Subject it to the labor of another session. Five months were scarcely sufficient to enable the committee to unfold the papers, which they were assigned to examine. In five years they could acquire but an imperfect knowledge of the several accounts on the files of the different offices. Upon a vast subject our time has been occupied with very small details. We have looked into half a dozen accounts, and discovered a few questionable expenditures. But as to the application of the millions, drawn from the Treasury, for the service of the different departments, it is still covered with the dust of the offices.

I must confess that, according to my view, a committee is altogether inadequate to the task assigned to the Committee of Investigation. In my opinion, the business belongs to the Secretary of the Treasury, or, if you distrust him, create a standing commission, with powers equal to the object. We were charged to examine into the accounts of all the public money, which had ever been drawn from the Treasury. Our duty confines us the greater part of the day to the floor of this House. How was it possible for a committee of seven, having everything to learn, with the fragments of their hours, to accomplish an object, which would require the regular work of years? I conceive the subject, if gentlemen have serious impressions with respect to it, should be sent to the Secretary of the Treasury. He has already more knowledge relative to it, than a committee would acquire during a whole Congress; and if any important discoveries are to be made, it may safely be trusted that he will bring them to light.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he rose again on this subject, merely to answer the observations of the gentleman who had spoken of the manner in which business had been done in that committee. He (Mr. BAYARD) said it was usual to direct the chairman of committees in what way the report was to be made, and presented for acceptance. Having very little of this kind of business to do, Mr. N. said he was not very conversant in the precise manner, but he thought it was usual for the chairman to make propositions to the committee, to call forth their attention. He knew of no way to facilitate business so much, as by bringing in a sketch of a report, comprehending the principal features which the papers before that committee exhibited. This he did on the ninth of April: other business prevented it being done sooner. The length of the report, comprehending all the principles exhibited to view, and including the balances therein drawn, and afterwards copying it, took a considerable length of time. Being then presented to the committee as mere propositions, which they might strike out or amend at pleasure, (which was last Tuesday,) it was resolved to apply to Mr. Stoddert for his answer to that part of the report concerning him. That was done. It was afterwards proposed that Mr. Stoddert's answer should become a part of the report. This was overruled. A new proposition was then made, that Mr. Dawson's case should be made a part of the report. This the majority thought improper also. Proposition was then made that Mr. Tracy should be heard. A letter written by the gentleman from Delaware to him, for that purpose, was handed to the chairman to sign, but another gentleman thought it better to wait on Mr. Tracy in person. This was agreed to with some amendment. The report was then postponed till the subsequent day, to hear what Mr. Tracy might say. The committee then met at nine o'clock and waited till twelve, but Mr. Tracy did not come; the report was therefore made up without hearing him. These facts he had thought proper to state, that the House might exonerate the committee from having done wrong.

Mr. RANDOLPH said his illness, and the length of the sitting, rendered him too fatigued to proceed far in the investigation of the observations of the gentleman from Delaware, but he felt one observation so strongly merited reply, that he could not abstain from rising; he meant the particular wherein Mr. Dawson and Mr. Tracy were paralleled. He says, the difference is only in the name of the parties, but he has failed to prove this similarity. The difference is so palpable that no man can fail to perceive the dissimilarity (with the exception, I must say, of the gentleman from Delaware.) Mr. Tracy was a member of the Senate of the United States, when he received his appointment. That he was blameable for taking, or precluded from accepting it, no one will say; unless it can be proved to have been an office, created while he was a member of the Senate. But this was not the case with Mr. Dawson. Mr. Tracy being a member of the Senate, I will say that his constituents had no power whatever to revoke their confidence in him, because he did not return to their suffrages. The other gentleman was a private citizen, and the act of placing confidence in him, obtained after his appointment and during his absence on the mission. This was an act for which he was not responsible to any man upon earth, and, therefore, it does not belong to this House. Another distinction in the cases is, that Mr. Tracy accepted an emolument for services rendered, at the same identical time that he was receiving his mileage as a Senator. He certainly, therefore, received double pay for his services. If Mr. Dawson had received his pay as Member of Congress, and his compensation for his mission to France at the same period, the cases would have been so far similar. But it was not so, for his foreign mission ceased long before the House sat. Mr. Tracy received emolument at that time, for an office which he could not and did not fill; and which, if he had filled, was totally incompatible with the office of Senator. This is a true distinction between the cases. The question whether a person holding an office under the Government is eligible to a seat in this House, might easily have been determined by the gentleman, and the question whether Mr. Dawson was eligible to his seat, might also have been determined by him; because Mr. Dawson, submitting to the House, when he took his seat, whether or no it was proper, was publicly invited, because it was considered that a foreign mission was an exceptional case; and for this reason, because the person is elected by the people, when, from the nature of the case, he must be ignorant of his having been the depositary of their confidence. If, therefore, there is any objection, that objection is removed by this necessary event. But the case of Mr. Tracy is totally different: he not only received and held two commissions at the same time, but he also received the double emoluments.

With respect to the double allowance for travel, the cases of the two gentlemen were mentioned in the Senate as parallels. I will remark that this is a case that does not come before this House, and we are told that it was not offered to the Committee. Indeed, how can we act at all upon the informal, unofficial, and unfounded statements of the gentleman who preceded me? Indeed I should lament if this were a fact: my knowledge of, and acquaintance with one of the gentlemen spoken of, (Mr. Stone,) is such, that to parallel it with the case of Mr. Tracy, would make me lament exceedingly. Indeed I cannot conceive, how they could besaid to receive double compensation: they received their full pay for their services in this House, till the fourth of March; they went into the Senate chamber under a new appointment, but they did not in any way hold at the same time two distinct offices, or receive emoluments in that view. I do not mean, however, to defend the usage of the Senate in that particular, because though I cannot call it corrupt, I must call it an abuse; but being an usage it was received.

Another parallel mentioned, was that of building stores on the public grounds in this city, and the military arsenal or laboratory at Philadelphia. Now it appears to me, that you cannot very easily define the term "navy yard," without these appurtenances to preserve the materials in. But there is a material distinction, between building on ground where we have the right of soil and jurisdiction, and building upon the ground of others. Of what importance is it to dwell on these cases, in order to prove that it is unnecessary to recommit the report? It amounts to nothing, but that different officers of the Government have put different constructions on the same law. Does this invalidate the report or the reasoning of the committee? Does it disprove the facts stated, or invalidate the charges exhibited against A or B? The gentleman really reminded me of the exertions of a counsellor defending a criminal at the bar of justice. But I would ask, does it diminish the crime of A or B, that C and D have committed the like crimes? This is a strange mode of defence, though not unusually offered.

Upon the whole, as the lateness of the hour nor my strength will admit of enlargement, I would observe that the committee were appointed to make certain inquiries; they have reported upon those inquiries, and now you are to be told that because different authorities have put different constructions upon the law, the report must be recommitted! Sir, this will be no way ever to discover and bring to light improper conduct; we did not wish to know their construction. The committee have reported in a manner and temper highly honorable to them, and I trust we shall not offer to give a kind of counter report, by sending it back to them, when there is no reason for that measure. This will be giving a color to transactions whose illegality is evident. I see no force in any argument used in favor of the motion.

Mr. GRISWOLD read, without comment, a certificate from the Secretary of the Senate, that Mr. Stone and Mr. Sheafe did receive their mileage from the Senate, for their coming and return to attend the Senate, on the fourth of March.

The question was then taken on the motion to recommit the report, and negatived—yeas 22, nays 46, as follows:

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT moved that the House do now, according to the standing order of the day, resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, to take into consideration a motion referred to them on the nineteenth of February last, in the form of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, proposing two articles of amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the election of President and Vice President; to which committee were also referred certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, to the same effect.

Mr. HUGER thought the gentleman from New York could not be serious. He held it a bad precedent at that late period of the session to attempt to alter the Constitution. It mattered not, whether he was for or against the proposed amendment, he should be opposed to agreeing to it at this late day. He believed the Constitution to be the rock of the Union; and he doubted whether as good a one could be formed, were the present one lost. He believed it had been formed by our most distinguished statesmen with the greatest care. Whenever, therefore, it was contemplated to alter a part of this Constitution, it ought to be done with the greatest circumspection. He confessed that he trembled at the idea of altering it, though he was attached to that part of it which gave the right of altering it. As to this particular provision, he was far from having made up his mind on it. It does appear, on first blush, that the people should designate the persons voted for as President and Vice President; but, on second thoughts, there were many reasons against it. Congress having agreed to adjourn on Monday, it was improper now to discuss the subject, as it was impossible to give it a full investigation. The more important we deem the amendment, the greater is the regard which should be paid to the mode of adopting it; and at this moment, when there is scarcely a quorum of members present, if you take it up, you in some measure prevent a discussion of it.

Mr. H. concluded by calling for the yeas and nays on taking up the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER said he hoped the amendment would not be taken up at this late hour. It would be recollected that at an antecedent session he had laid a similar resolution on the table, when it had been refused by the House to take it up from the late day of the session, though this amendment had been offered at the recommendation of New Hampshire. As this treatment was thought respectful to New Hampshire, Mr. F. did not think that it would be disrespectful to New York.

Mr. BAYARD wished to know whether it was in order to move the postponement of the question till November.

The SPEAKER said such a motion was not in order, as the resolutions had been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAVIS was sorry the gentleman from New York (Mr. VAN CORTLANDT) had thought proper to place the House in so delicate a situation. After suffering these resolutions to lay for some months, they are now brought up on the last day, when the House is not prepared to investigate them, though there may be weighty considerations in favor of them. He was, therefore, against taking them up at present. If taken up, he should be almost compelled to vote against them; not, however, because he was really against them, but from the manner in which they are urged. Are gentlemen prepared to say that the House is in a fit state to investigate them? If there is a determination to carry them whether reasonable or not, it is certain a majority may carry them. Had they been called up a month ago, he should have been pleased; but he thought it the height of imprudence to push them now.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT said he was sorry the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HUGER) was uneasy at the disorder of the House. For his part, he had never seen the House more orderly. As to its being a late hour, that, he conceived, had nothing to do with the business, as the resolutions had lain on the table for a long time, and he presumed every gentleman, expecting to be called on to vote on them, had made up his mind. As to the remarks of the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. FOSTER,) it cannot surely be a reason with him to vote now against these resolutions, because the House had formerly been against his resolutions.

Mr. MOTT was sorry these resolutions were taken up at this late hour. He did not hesitate to say that he was in favor of them; but he was against taking them up at so late a day of the session.

Mr. ELMENDORF said, if the subject required any particular investigation, he should be opposed to taking it up to-day. But it was so exceedingly plain that he was persuaded it ought not to take up much of the time of the House. He certainly wished it had been taken up when there was a fuller House; but he thought it so important, that it would at no time be improper to adopt it by the vote of a Constitutional majority. If it were important that the people should elect the man of their choice, it ought to be adopted. It must be evident to every gentleman, that in the Convention there must have been great contrariety of opinion on this point; and in practising under the Constitution a great variety of evils had been discovered. As, therefore, there had been a practical demonstration of the evils of the present plan, he believed the public mind was prepared to receive the amendment. This being a self-evident truth, he should vote in favor of adopting the amendment at this time.

Mr. BAYARD felt strongly impressed by the reasons which had been assigned in point of time. The subject was not totally novel to him; but though he had heard it spoken of, expecting that it would be regularly brought up, he had not examined it in proportion to its magnitude. He believed we ought to be extremely cautious in amending the Constitution, as he believed that no instrument had been better weighed in all its parts. He confessed he was puzzled to account for the regulations prescribed in the election of a President and Vice President; yet he was perfectly satisfied there must have been very strong reasons for it, from his reliance on the talents of those who formed the Constitution. He had, however, no hesitation in saying, from all his reflections on the subject, that he was inclined to be in favor of a discrimination of the individuals voted for as President and Vice President, as well as in favor of districts. But he believed it very improper at this late hour to agitate the subject, and he considered it a bad precedent at the end of a session to make any innovation in the Constitution. However immaterial any amendment might appear to be, it ought to be very circumspectly examined; for often our first impressions are erroneous, and we are induced, on mature reflection, to change them. He was, therefore, in point of time, against taking up the resolutions; he thought it improper, when the members were occupied in preparing to depart, in packing up their clothes, with which they had packed up many of their ideas; when we are here, barely to go through the formalities attending the final passage of bills. He concluded by observing, that he repeated it, that he was friendly to the amendment, but hostile to taking it up at that time.

The question on taking up the resolutions was then taken by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 38, nays 30, as follows:

NAYS—James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, John Campbell, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Thomas T. Davis, William Eustis, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, William Helms, Archibald Henderson, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Lowndes, Lewis R. Morris, James Mott, Thomas Plater, Nathan Read, William Shepard, Henry Southard, John Stanley, John Stewart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Samuel Tenney, Thomas Tillinghast, George B. Upham, Peleg Wadsworth, and Lemuel Williams.

Mr. GRISWOLD wished to know, whether, on a preparatory question, the concurrence of two-thirds were required, as this would form a precedent.

The SPEAKER decided that two-thirds were not necessary.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole—Mr. S. SMITH in the Chair.

As soon as the Chairman had taken the Chair, Mr. BAYARD rose, and observed, that he believed the question to be determined was on going into Committee on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN said, the decision was for going into a Committee for the purpose of taking into consideration an amendment to the Constitution, "That in all future elections of President and Vice President, the persons voted for shall be particularly designated by declaring which is voted for as President, and which as Vice President."

The SPEAKER said that question had not been stated from the Chair. The only question was on going into Committee on the state of the Union; and it was now competent to any member to offer any resolution on the state of the Union, or the House may consider the subject notified as continued.

Mr. BAYARD moved for that proposition of amendment that related to a division of each State into districts.

The CHAIRMAN, having read it, said he had always considered it as the practice, that the Committee must take up that resolution on which it had been moved to go into committee. He, therefore, considered the other resolutions as before the Committee.

Mr. HUGER.—I ask if the Committee has not a right to take up which resolution it pleases? If they have, I hope the motion of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN.—The question is already decided.

Mr. BAYARD thought there was great justice in the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. DAVIS,) that the House was not in a state to make an amendment to the Constitution. He could hardly believe that, had it been proposed to amend the Constitution on an earlier day, it would have been done without a word of explanation being uttered. He believed this was doing too much, and without the defect of the former system being pointed out. He believed there was not a more important opinion than that the instrument from which we derive our power, and the nation its liberty, should be touched with a cautious hand. He believed gentlemen would see that this was not the time to touch it, and they will say, we will not agree to this amendment until the other, for districting the States, is first agreed to; he, therefore, moved that the Committee should rise.

Mr. BACON hoped the Committee would not rise until other reasons were assigned than he had heard. The House had just agreed to take up the resolutions, and it is now moved to recede from the determination of the House without any reason being assigned for the change. The question was important, but not novel. He believed that every citizen called upon to give his vote had paid particular attention to, and had made up his mind upon it. This was the case with himself. He had long been of opinion that such an amendment was very important, and even necessary, and he should continue to think so until he had heard satisfactory reasons in opposition assigned. He was disposed to listen with the greatest attention and candor to the arguments of gentlemen. The gentleman from Delaware urged as a reason against taking up this amendment its great importance; and now he is for taking up another amendment infinitely more important.

Mr. B. concluded by saying that as this was a subject on which the welfare of the United States depended, in his opinion the House could not excuse itself from taking it up.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had almost despaired of this subject being acted upon after the late decision of the House. He was, however, very glad to find the House now disposed to take it up. He was much surprised that the gentleman from Delaware wanted information, not only from his usual attention to Constitutional questions, but from the part he took in the Presidential election. He believed the question to be very plain, and one which had been well considered by every citizen in the United States. Under the Constitution electors are to vote for two persons, one of whom does not reside in the State of the electors; but it does not require a designation of the persons voted for. Wise and virtuous as were the members of the Convention, experience has shown that the mode therein adopted cannot be carried into operation; for the people do not elect a person for an elector who, they know, does not intend to vote for a particular person as President. Therefore, practically, the very thing is adopted, intended by this amendment. If this proposition is now adopted by us, it will still have to be sanctioned by the other branch of the Legislature, and afterwards by three-fourths of the States. For these reasons, Mr. M. thought this amendment ought to be adopted. It ought to be adopted, because it had been maturely considered; because it had been recommended by several States, and because serious inconveniences had been, and still more serious inconveniences might be experienced under the present mode.

Mr. DANA said he was for the Committee rising, as this was not a proper time to act on so important a subject. He knew that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) had said his mind was made up, though he was ready to hear any arguments against the amendment. He has told us that he guessed every member was ready to act; but as this was only a guess, others may guess as well as he. He also thought his friend from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) inconsistent; but the very remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts fortified the correctness of the observation made by his friend from Delaware, who had said one of the proposed amendments is important, the other is still more important, and thence the necessity of more time for deliberation.

If the subject of amending the Constitution be taken up, a second question may arise, whether a Vice President is wanted at all; whether that office was not created solely to influence the purposes of the present mode. He believed the journals of the Convention would show that the office of Vice President was not introduced till this mode was laid down. Other amendments may be found necessary. He was willing to consider that part of the Constitution which related to the apportionment of representatives, and to determine whether the representatives should be in proportion to the whites, or in proportion to the whites compounded with slaves. He believed, also, when an amendment was proposed, it was proper to view all its parts, and see whether an amendment apparently necessary would not materially differ from other parts of the Constitution equally necessary. For this examination there was not time.

Mr. HUGER said he was willing to acknowledge that his bias was in favor of the amendment; but he did not like to be obliged at this late moment to vote on it, without having time to consider it himself, and without giving time to others to investigate it. Besides, it was evident, that if the amendment for a discrimination was first adopted, the other amendment for districts may not be adopted; and in the opinion of some gentlemen it was important to adopt both. This measure is now forced upon us. In this sitting we are obliged to vote in the negative, though rather in favor of the amendment. But when thus improperly forced upon us, we think it the safest course to vote against it.

Where is the necessity of this precipitation?

There cannot be party motives in the measure; for the same Legislature will meet the next session. In these circumstances, he thought it an act of cruelty to force those to vote who are not prepared. He said his mind was not made up, nor did he believe the minds of the community were. He could not say from his own personal knowledge what was the wishes of his constituents; though he was rather inclined to think they were for the amendment. He believed the design of the Constitution in originating this business in these two Houses of Congress, was to have it investigated in a body whose members came from every part of the Union, and by having the debate published in every part of the Union to prepare the people correctly to judge. He, therefore, conceived it of immense importance that every amendment should be maturely investigated. He said, he looked round and scarcely saw a quorum. Are gentlemen prepared to offer arguments? He did not like to allude to party; but do not gentlemen know that those who agree with him have more than a third in this House when it is full? He did not know that that was now the case. In the last count we had only sixty-eight votes, and yet with these numbers we are called upon to decide, at the end of the session, a Constitutional question.

The question was taken on the Committee rising, and lost—ayes 25.

The question was then taken on the resolution of amendment, on which there were—ayes 42, noes 22.

The CHAIRMAN.—The question is lost.

Mr. VARNUM said he apprehended the Committee were to vote by simple majorities; this is a preparatory step, and the House will decide by a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. NICHOLSON was clearly of this opinion, that the Committee ought to decide in the usual way.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he did not know how the gentleman could find the mode of deciding in Committee but by that practised in the House.

Mr. ELMENDORF thought no more than a simple majority was required. He, therefore, appealed from the decision of the Chair. After some explanation, Mr. E. observed that as the House would have to decide upon the same point, he would withdraw his motion of appeal.

The Committee rose, and reported their disagreement to the amendment—two-thirds of the members, the Constitutional number, not concurring in it.

The question was carried—ayes 42—for taking up the report.

The House immediately took up the report; when

The SPEAKER put the question on concurring with the report of the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the amendment.

Mr. HUGER moved to postpone the further consideration of the amendment to the third Monday in November.

Mr. H. said he would not repeat the arguments he had before used. Of those against taking up the amendment at this time, there were, at least the gentleman from Delaware and himself who were likely to be in favor of it, if taken up at a proper time. He should, therefore, regret if, by voting in the negative, it should be lost. He wished it to be understood, and particularly by his constituents, that he voted against it, not because he was really against the amendment, but from the consideration of the improper time at which it was urged. He concluded by calling for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT said he was very sorry he could not oblige the gentleman (Mr. HUGER) with the delay he solicited, and he was also very sorry that that gentleman could not oblige himself and his constituents at the same time. He regretted that it was so late in the session; but had not the subject been before the House for months, and before the people for years? The gentleman says he wants time—to repeat a hundred and a hundred times what the House had heard before. At this endless repetition Mr. VAN C. was surprised. He said, he should in many cases have taken a part in debate, if other gentlemen had not expressed the same ideas which he entertained himself. He did not wish to say that other gentlemen had made long speeches for the purpose of appearing in the newspapers; though he must say the conduct of the gentleman from South Carolina looked like it. Mr. VAN C. concluded by observing that it was their duty to do good, and if the adoption of this amendment would have that effect, it could never be too late to adopt it.

Mr. HUGER said however favorable that gentleman may be to dumb legislation, he confessed he was inimical to it.

The question of postponement was then taken by yeas and nays, and lost—yeas 28, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, John Campbell, John Condit, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, William Helms, Archibald Henderson, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Lowndes, Lewis R. report of the Committee in their disagreement to the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD said he was sorry the subject was pressed upon them. It had not undergone in his mind a mature consideration. He considered his giving a vote of concurrence as operating simply a postponement till November. He had voted for the postponement, and he would vote for a concurrence. Next session the subject may be taken up, and maturely considered.

Mr. NICHOLSON inquired whether the question of concurrence required two-thirds.

The SPEAKER.—This is the final question, and therefore requires two-thirds. All preparatory questions only require a majority.

Mr. VARNUM asked whether the question would be final. It appeared to him that after this is decided, there will be another question on agreeing to the resolution itself.

The question was taken, by yeas and nays, on agreeing to the report, and lost—yeas 24, nays 48—two-thirds voting against concurrence, as follows:

YEAS—James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, John Campbell, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, Archibald Henderson, Benjamin Huger, Thomas Lowndes, Lewis R. Morris, Thomas Plater, Nathan Read, William Shepard, John Stanley, Benjamin Tallmadge, Samuel Tenney, Thomas Tillinghast, George B. Upham, Peleg Wadsworth, and Lemuel Williams.

NAYS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, Phaniel Bishop, Robert Brown, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Richard Cutts, Thomas T. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, John P. Van Ness, Joseph B. Varnum, and Robert Williams.

Mr. HUGER said he would repeat what he had said before, viz: that he did not vote against the amendment because he was opposed to it, but because he was decidedly opposed to the time in which it was proposed.

Mr. HUGER moved the postponement of the third reading of the resolution till Monday, lost—ayes 25.

Resolved, That the said resolution be read a third time to-day.

The engrossed resolution was afterwards brought in, and read a third time, when the question was taken on it by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 47, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—John Archer, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, Phaniel Bishop, Richard Brent, Robert Brown, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Richard Cutts, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, William Dickson, Lucas Elmendorf, William Eustis, John Fowler, Edwin Gray, John A. Hanna, Daniel Heister, Joseph Heister, James Holland, David Holmes, Michael Leib, John Milledge, Samuel L. NAYS—James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, Manasseh Cutler, John Davenport, Roger Griswold, Archibald Henderson, Benjamin Huger, Lewis R. Morris, Nathan Read, John Stanley, Benjamin Tallmadge, Samuel Tenney, George B. Upham, and Lemuel Williams.

Ordered, That the Clerk of the House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

MONDAY, May 3.

Ordered, That there be a call of the House this day at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the proper officers to prepare and lay before the House, during the first week of the ensuing session of Congress, the following statements:

A detailed account of the expenditure and application of all public moneys which have passed through the Quartermaster General's department, from the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, to the thirty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and one.

A similar account of the expenditure of all public moneys which have passed through the Navy agents.

A similar account of the expenditure and application of all the moneys drawn out of the Treasury for the contingencies of the Military and Naval Establishments.

Copies of the contracts made by the Navy Department for the purchase of timber and stores, and the accounts of the moneys paid under such contracts.

Ordered, That Mr. ROBERT WILLIAMS and Mr. THOMAS MORRIS be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen,' with two amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments of the Senate to the bill first mentioned in the said message, and the same being severally twice read, were agreed to.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia."

Whereupon, Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

Georgia Limits—The District of Columbia.

MAY, 1802.

On motion, Ordered, That the call of the House directed by a vote of this day, to be at two o'clock, be postponed until four o'clock in the afternoon.

GEORGIA LIMITS.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved the appointment of a committee to bring in a bill to repeal an act for the amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, &c.

[The object of this motion was to prevent the agreement lately made between the Commissioners of the United States and of Georgia from going into effect before the next session of Congress; the said agreement declaring that the settlement shall be conclusive, unless Congress shall repeal within six months the above law.]

This motion was supported by Messrs. GRISWOLD, HENDERSON, and DAVIS, and opposed by Messrs. MILLEDGE, S. SMITH, and ELMENDORF.

When the yeas and nays were taken, and the motion lost—yeas 24, nays 36, as follows:

NAYS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, Richard Brent, Robert Brown, John Clopton, John Condit, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, William Dickson, Lucas Elmendorf, John Fowler, Edwin Gray, William Helms, James Holland, David Holmes, John Milledge, Thomas Moore, James Mott, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, jun., John Smilie, John Smith, of New York, John Smith, of Virginia, Samuel Smith, Richard Stanford, John Taliaferro, jr., David Thomas, Philip R. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, John P. Van Ness, Joseph B. Varnum, and Robert Williams.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled 'An act concerning the District of Columbia,' with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The most material amendments authorize the erection of a jail, appropriating therefor $17,000, and the organization of the militia by the President.

The amendment which authorizes the erection of a jail gave rise to some debate; in which it was supported by Messrs. TALIAFERRO and HUGER, and opposed by Messrs. ELMENDORF, DAVIS, and VARNUM.

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to strike out $17,000 and insert $8,000. This last motion prevailed; and, so amended, the amendment of the Senate was agreed to—yeas 32, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, Richard Brent, John Campbell, John Clopton, Manasseh Cutler, John Dawson, Wm. Dickson, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, Daniel Heister, William Helms, Archibald Henderson, David Holmes, Benjamin Huger, Lewis R.

Morris, Thomas Morris, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, jr., Thomas Plater, Nathan Read, John Smith, of Virginia, Henry Southard, John Taliaferro, jr., Samuel Tenney, Philip R. Thompson, Philip Van Cortlandt, John P. Van Ness, and Henry Woods.

NAYS—Thomas Boude, Robert Brown, John Condit, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, Thomas T. Davis, Lucas Elmendorf, John Fowler, John A. Hanna, Joseph Heister, Michael Leib, Samuel L. Mitchell, Thos. Moore, James Mott, John Smilie, John Smith, of New York, Samuel Smith, Richard Stanford, Joseph Stanton, jr., John Stewart, Benjamin Tallmadge, David Thomas, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Joseph B. Varnum, and Robert Williams.

On the question that the House do agree to the said twelfth amendment of the Senate, as amended, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Resolved, That this House doth also agree to all the other amendments proposed by the Senate to the said bill.

The House then adjourned until five o'clock, post meridian.

FIVE O'CLOCK, P. M.

The House met pursuant to adjournment.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have disagreed to the resolution of this House, in the form of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, "proposing an article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the election of President and Vice President;" two-thirds of the members present in the Senate not having concurred in their agreement to the same.

On motion, Ordered, That Mr. GRISWOLD and Mr. SAMUEL SMITH be appointed a committee, on the part of this House, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with the committee appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the committee appointed on the part of this House, jointly, with the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress, reported that the committee had performed that service; and that the President signified to them he had no farther communication to make during the present session.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House, having completed the business before them, are now about to adjourn until the first Monday in December next; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate, having completed the Legislative business before them, are now ready to adjourn. Whereupon,

The SPEAKER adjourned the House until the first Monday in December next.

Internal Taxes.

SUPPLEMENTAL SPEECH.

[The following is the conclusion of the speech of GOUVERNEUR MORRIS, delivered in the Senate on the 31st of March, 1802, on the Repeal of the Internal Taxes,—and which was unavoidably omitted, in its proper place, while the volume was in course of printing. It should have been inserted in page 235, immediately before Mr. MASON.]

MR. MORRIS, in conclusion.—I have heard it said, that however improper it may be to repeal these taxes, it is now too late to object; for that, after the recommendation of our First Magistrate, they are considered by the people as no longer to be paid. I will not question the veracity of those who make this assertion, but I must beg leave to withhold my assent. The people of this country know, that to their Representatives alone, is delegated the right of taxation. This is no part of the Executive power. I will not say that the recommendation was unconstitutional. I will not say that it was unjustifiable. But I will say that it was imprudent. And if it does, indeed, involve the consequence which has been stated, I must add that it is injurious. It would have been more proper to have left the unbiassed consideration of this great subject to the two Houses of Congress. But, sir, though I cannot approve, I will not condemn the conduct of our First Magistrate. He, I presume, acted from what he conceived to be his duty. Let us then imitate his example, and perform what on due advisement shall appear to be our duty. Let me say, sir, that there is too much of precipitancy, too much of rashness, in this repeal. It would be wiser to wait, until we possess a knowledge of those facts on which a sound system must be founded. Our experience of the past gives no sufficient light for the future. There is, moreover, during the present, and there will be for some succeeding years, an unusual pressure of our public debt, arising from heavy instalments of foreign loans. This therefore, is not the moment to make a change. I have indeed heard the advocates of the proposed repeal say, they are desirous of paying the public debt, not only according to the terms to which we stand pledged, but at an earlier day. If this be so, how can they think of taking off taxes, or by what strange invention or device do they expect to pay debts by diminishing income? I should have supposed that the best way to effect that object would be to increase our revenues, lessen our expenses, and apply our whole means to the payment of what we owe, steadily and faithfully.

Mr. President, one word more. Hitherto, I have considered this question on the broad ground of policy, of expediency, and of public economy. I have endeavored to show that duties are the most expensive species of tax. That, from a change in the political affairs of the world, and in our own particular situation, there is reason to suppose our revenue will suffer considerable diminution. And that it is more than probable, duties so high, as those under which our commerce now labors, will be evaded. And thence, I have endeavored to draw the natural conclusion, that, instead of repealing the internal taxes, we should lessen the duties, and raise that part which is taken off in the seaports, by direct tax in the country. All this was under the idea, that you had a right to repeal these taxes. But, by recurring to the first volume of your laws, in the 335th page, I find that the sixtieth section of an act laying duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, runs thus:

“And be it further enacted, That the net product of the duties hereinbefore specified, which shall be raised, levied, and collected by virtue of this act, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be, and is hereby, pledged and appropriated for the payment of the interest of the several and respective loans, which had been made in foreign countries, prior to the fourth day of August last; and also upon all and every the loan and loans which have been and shall be made and obtained pursuant to the act, entitled ‘An act making provision for the debt of the United States;’ and, according to the true intent and meaning of the said act, of the several provisions and engagements therein contained and expressed, and subject to the like priorities and reservations as are made and contained in and by the said act, in respect to the moneys therein appropriated, and subject to this farther reservation; that is to say, of the net amount or product during the present year, of the duties laid by this act, in addition to those heretofore laid upon spirits imported into the United States, from any foreign port or place, and of the duties laid by this act on spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills; to be disposed of, towards such purposes for which appropriations shall be made during the present session. And to the end, that the said moneys may be inviolably applied in conformity to the appropriation hereby made, and may never be diverted to any other purpose, until the final redemption or reimbursement of the loans or sums for the payment of the interest whereof they are appropriated, an account shall be kept of the receipts and disposition thereof, separate and distinct from the product of any other duties, impost, excise, and taxes whatsoever, except those heretofore laid, and appropriated to the same purposes.”

And, sir, I find that the sixty-second section of the same act runs thus:

“And be it further enacted, That the several duties imposed by this act shall continue to be collected and paid, until the debts and purposes for which they are pledged and appropriated shall be fully discharged and satisfied, and no longer: Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the Legislature of the United States, from substituting other duties or taxes of equal value to all or any of the said duties and imposts.”

This law was approved by GEORGE WASHINGTON, on the third day of March, in the year 1791.

Now then, I ask, can we rightfully take off this tax without laying on an equivalent, before our debts are paid? I will not say that it is unconstitutional; though while we yet had a Constitution, I should have opposed it on that ground. I will not say you have not the power to do it, because, under the new doctrine of your Legislative omnipotence, I see not the bounds of your power. But I remember well, and let me now call back to the recollection of this Senate, what passed on a late important occasion. It was asked, when we have made a grant, can we resume it? When we have contracted a debt, can we refuse to pay it? When we have made a promise, can we violate it? To these questions it was answered no! Here is a vested right in third persons. The Government is bound. In the case of a debt it has received a consideration, and the engagement taken with the public creditor cannot be broken. I ask, then, what words in our language, or in any language, can be more full, more solemn, or form a contract more sacred than those I have just read. The net amount of the duties is pledged to our creditors, and appropriated to the payment of our debt; and to the end that it may be inviolably applied in conformity to that appropriation, and may never be diverted to any other purpose, a separate account is to be kept, and it is again declared that the duties shall continue to be collected and paid till the debts for which they are pledged shall be fully discharged and satisfied. If these terms be not binding on the Legislature, let us hear the form, if any can be found, of a contract more obligatory. I ask those who mean to vote for this repeal, what they meant by the declaration that vested rights could not be resumed, and that engagements taken with public creditors could not be broken? If, by a wild exertion of licentious force we tear asunder these bands, can we again ask of mankind any share of their confidence? Can we expect to enjoy credit when we show ourselves regardless of our plighted faith?

Sir, I consider this repeal as inconsistent with the true interest of the great body of our people. It appears to me dangerous both to our revenue and to our commerce. But above all, I consider it as a flagrant violation of the public faith.

PUBLIC ACTS OF CONGRESS;

PASSED AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE SEVENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AND HELD AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 7, 1801.

AN ACT for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the second enumeration.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That from and after the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and three, the House of Representatives shall be composed of members elected agreeably to a ratio of one member for every thirty-three thousand persons in each State, computed according to the rule prescribed by the Constitution; that is to say: within the State of New Hampshire, five; within the State of Massachusetts, seventeen; within the State of Vermont, four; within the State of Rhode Island, two; within the State of Connecticut, seven; within the State of New York, seventeen; within the State of New Jersey, six; within the State of Pennsylvania, eighteen; within the State of Delaware, one; within the State of Maryland, nine; within the State of Virginia, twenty-two; within the State of North Carolina, twelve; within the State of South Carolina, eight; within the State of Georgia, four; within the State of Kentucky, six; and within the State of Tennessee, three members.

NATHANIEL MACON,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

ABRAHAM BALDWIN,

President of the Senate, pro tempore.

Approved, January 14, 1802.

TH. JEFFERSON,

President of the United States.

An Act concerning the Library for the use of both Houses of Congress.

Be it enacted, &c., That the books and maps purchased by direction of the act of Congress, passed the twenty-fourth of April, one thousand eight hundred, together with the books or libraries which have heretofore been kept separately by each House, shall be placed in the Capitol, in the room which was occupied by the House of Representatives, during the last session of the sixth Congress.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the time being, be, and they hereby are, empowered to establish such regulations and restrictions in relation to the said library, as to them shall seem proper, and, from time to time, to alter or amend the same: Provided, That no regulation shall be made repugnant to any provision contained in this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That a librarian, to be appointed by the President of the United States solely, shall take charge of the said library; who, previous to his entering upon the duties of his office, shall give bond, payable to the United States, in such a sum, and with such security, as the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the time being, may deem sufficient, for the safe keeping of such books, maps, and furniture as may be confided to his care, and the faithful discharge of his trust, according to such regulations as may be, from time to time, established for the government of the said library; which said bond shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no map shall be permitted to be taken out of the said library by any person; nor any book, except by the President and Vice President of the United States, and members of the Senate and House of Representatives, for the time being.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the keeper of the said library shall receive for his services, a sum not exceeding two dollars per diem for every day of necessary attendance; the amount whereof, together with the necessary expenses incident to the said library, after being ascertained by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the time being, shall be paid out of the fund annually appropriated for the contingent expenses of both Houses of Congress.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the unexpended balance of the sum of five thousand dollars appropriated by the act of Congress aforesaid, for the purchase of books and maps for the use of the two Houses of Congress, together with such sums as may hereafter be appropriated to the same purpose, shall be laid out under the direction of a joint committee, to consist of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives.

Approved, January 26, 1802.

Acts of Congress.

An Act for the protection of the Commerce and Seamen of the United States, against the Tripolitan Cruisers.

Whereas the Regency of Tripoli, on the coast of Barbary, has commenced a predatory warfare against the United States:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful fully to equip, officer, man, and employ such of the armed vessels of the United States, as may be judged requisite by the President of the United States, for protecting effectually the commerce and seamen thereof on the Atlantic Ocean, the Mediterranean and adjoining seas.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to instruct the commanders of the respective public vessels aforesaid, to subdue, seize, and make prize of all vessels, goods, and effects, belonging to the Bey of Tripoli, or to his subjects, and to bring or send the same into port, to be proceeded against, and distributed according to law; and also to cause to be done all such other acts of precaution or hostility as the state of war will justify, and may, in his opinion, require.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, on the application of the owners of the private armed vessels of the United States, the President of the United States may grant to them special commissions, in the form which he shall direct, under the seal of the United States; and such private armed vessels, when so commissioned, shall have the like authority for subduing, seizing, taking, and bringing into port, any Tripolitan vessel, goods or effects, as the beforementioned public armed vessels may by law have; and shall therein be subject to the instructions which may be given by the President of the United States for the regulation of their conduct; and their commissions shall be revocable at his pleasure: Provided, That before any commission shall be granted as aforesaid, the owner or owners of the vessel for which the same may be requested, and the commander thereof, for the time being, shall give bond to the United States, with at least two responsible sureties, not interested in such vessel, in the penal sum of seven thousand dollars; or, if such vessel be provided with more than one hundred and fifty men, in the penal sum of fourteen thousand dollars, with condition for observing the treaties and laws of the United States, and the instructions which may be given, as aforesaid; and also, for satisfying all damages and injuries which shall be done, contrary to the tenor thereof, by such commissioned vessel; and for delivering up the commission, when revoked by the President of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any Tripolitan vessel, goods, or effects, which shall be so captured and brought into port by any private armed vessel of the United States, duly commissioned, as aforesaid, may be adjudged good prize, and thereupon shall accrue to the owners, and officers, and men of the capturing vessel, and shall be distributed according to the agreement which shall have been made between them, or, in failure of such agreement, according to the discretion of the court having cognizance of the capture.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the seamen may be engaged to serve in the Navy of the United States for a period not exceeding two years; but the President may discharge the same sooner, if, in his judgment, their services may be dispensed with.

Approved, February 6, 1802.

An Act extending the privilege of franking and receiving letters, free of postage, to any person admitted, or to be admitted, to take a seat in Congress, as a delegate; and providing compensation for such delegate.

Be it enacted, &c., That any person admitted, or who may hereafter be admitted, to take a seat in Congress, as a delegate, shall enjoy the privilege of sending and receiving letters, free of postage, on the same terms, and under the same restrictions, as are provided for the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the United States, by the act, entitled, "An act to establish the Post Office of the United States;" and that every such delegate so admitted to a seat, be, and is hereby, authorized to receive, free of postage, under the said restrictions, any letters directed to him, and which shall have arrived at the seat of Government prior to the passage of this act: and that every such delegate shall receive, for his travelling expenses and attendance in Congress, the same compensation as is or may be allowed, by law, to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, to be certified and paid in the same manner.

Approved, February 18, 1802.

An Act making certain partial appropriations for the year one thousand eight hundred and two.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of sixty thousand dollars be, and the same hereby is, appropriated towards defraying the expenses of the pay of the Army, during the year one thousand eight hundred and two.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same hereby are, appropriated to the purpose herein recited, respectively, that is to say: for the contingent expenses of the Department of the Treasury, to make good the deficiency of the former appropriations for the same, the sum of sixteen hundred and thirteen dollars and fifty-seven cents.

For the printing of the public accounts, to make good the deficiency of former appropriations for the same, the sum of fourteen hundred dollars.

Towards the contingent expenses of the Department of the Treasury, during the year one thousand eight hundred and two, the sum of one thousand dollars.

Towards the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, during the year one thousand eight hundred and two, the sum of three thousand dollars.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby authorized, in the settlement of the accounts of the several officers herein-after mentioned, to make the following allowances for clerk hire, during the year one thousand eight hundred and one, in addition to the allowances now established by law; that is to say:

To the Accountant of the Navy Department, one thousand nine hundred dollars, and thirty-one cents.

To the Purveyor of Public Supplies, seven hundred dollars.

To the Superintendent of Stamps, three hundred and seventy-seven dollars and seventy-eight cents.

To the Commissioner of Loans of Pennsylvania, one thousand five hundred dollars.

Provided, however, That the expense, thus allowed, shall have been actually incurred: And provided also, That the whole amount paid to each abovementioned officer, respectively, for his compensation, and that of his clerks and persons employed in his office, for the year aforesaid, shall not exceed the sums heretofore appropriated, by law, to those objects, respectively, during the said year.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the aforesaid sums shall be paid and discharged out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States, not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, February 23, 1802.

An Act to repeal certain acts respecting the organization of the Courts of the United States; and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the act of Congress passed on the thirteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," from and after the first day of July next, shall be, and is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the act passed on the third day of March one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled "An act for altering the times and places of holding certain courts therein mentioned and for other purposes;" from and after the said first day of July next, shall be, and is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the acts, and parts of acts, which were in force before the passage of the aforesaid two acts, and which by the same were either amended, explained, altered, or repealed, shall be, and hereby are, after the said first day of July next, revived, and in as full and complete force and operation, as if the said two acts had never been made.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all actions, suits, process, pleadings, and other proceedings, of what nature or kind soever, depending or existing in any of the circuit courts of the United States, or in any of the district courts of the United States, acting as circuit courts, or in any of the additional district courts, which were established by the aforesaid act of Congress, passed on the thirteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, shall be, and hereby are, from and after the said first day of July next, continued over to the circuit courts, and to the district courts, and to the district courts acting as circuit courts, respectively, which shall be first thereafter holden in, and for the respective circuits and districts, which are revived and established by this act, and to be proceeded in, in the same manner as they would have been had they originated prior to the passage of the said act, passed on the thirteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all writs and process, which have issued, or may issue before the said first day of July next, returnable to the circuit courts, or to any district court acting as a circuit court, or any additional district court established by the aforesaid act passed the thirteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, shall be returned to the next circuit court, or district court, or district court acting as a circuit court, re-established by this act; and shall be proceeded on therein, in the same manner, as they could, had they been originally returnable to the circuit courts, and district courts acting as circuit courts, hereby revived and established.

Approved, March 8, 1802.

An Act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, from and after the first of June next, shall be composed of one regiment of artillerists and two regiments of infantry, with such officers, military agents, and engineers, as are hereinafter mentioned.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the regiment of artillerists shall consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, four majors, one adjutant, and twenty companies; each company to consist of one captain, one first lieutenant, one second lieutenant, two cadets, four sergeants, four corporals, four musicians, eight artificers, and fifty-six privates; to be formed into five battalions: Provided always, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to retain, with their present grade, as many of the first lieutenants, now in service, as shall amount to the whole number of lieutenants required; but that in proportion as vacancies happen therein, new appointments be made to the grade of second lieutenants, until their number amount to twenty; and each regiment of infantry shall consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, one major, one adjutant, one sergeant major, two teachers of music, and ten companies; each company to consist of one captain, one first and one second lieutenant, one ensign, four sergeants, four corporals, four musicians, and sixty-four privates.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be one brigadier general, with one aid-de-camp, who shall be taken from the captains or subalterns of the line; one adjutant and inspector of the army, to be taken from the line of field officers; one paymaster of the army, seven pay-masters, and two assistants, to be attached to such districts as the President of the United States shall direct, to be taken from the line of commissioned officers, who, in addition to their other duties, shall have charge of the clothing of the troops; three military agents, and such number of assistant military agents as the President of the United States shall deem expedient, not exceeding one to each military post; which assistants shall be taken from the line; two surgeons; twenty-five surgeon's mates, to be attached to garrisons or posts, and not to corps.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the monthly pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, be as follows, to wit: to the brigadier general, two hundred and twenty-five dollars, which shall be his full and entire compensation, without a right to demand or receive any rations, forage, travelling expenses, or other perquisites or emoluments whatsoever, except such stationery as may be requisite for the use of his department; to the adjutant and inspector of the army, thirty-eight dollars in addition to his pay in the line, and such stationery as shall be requisite for his department; to the paymaster of the army, one hundred and twenty dollars, without any other emolument, except such stationery as may be requisite in his department and the use of the public office now occupied by him; to the aid-de-camp, in addition to his pay in the line, thirty dollars; to each paymaster attached to districts, thirty dollars, and each assistant to such paymaster, ten dollars, in addition to his pay in the line; to each military agent, seventy-six dollars, and no other emolument; to each assistant military agent, eight dollars, in addition to his pay in the line, except the assistant military agents at Pittsburg and Niagara, who shall receive sixteen dollars, each, in addition to their pay in the line; to each colonel, seventy-five dollars; to each lieutenant colonel, sixty dollars; to each major, fifty dollars; to each surgeon, forty-five dollars; to each surgeon's mate, thirty dollars; to each adjutant, ten dollars, in addition to his pay in the line; to each captain, forty dollars; to each first lieutenant, thirty dollars; to each second lieutenant, twenty-five dollars; to each ensign, twenty dollars; to each cadet, ten dollars; to each sergeant major, nine dollars; to each sergeant, eight dollars; to each corporal, seven dollars; to each teacher of music, eight dollars; to each musician, six dollars; to each artificer, ten dollars; and to each private, five dollars.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the commissioned officers aforesaid, shall be entitled to receive, for their daily subsistence, the following number of rations of provisions: a colonel, six rations; a lieutenant colonel, five rations; a major, four rations; a captain, three rations; a lieutenant, two rations; an ensign, two rations; a surgeon, three rations; a surgeon's mate, two rations; a cadet, two rations or money in lieu thereof, at the option of the said officers and cadets at the posts, respectively, where the rations shall become due; and if at such posts supplies are not furnished by contract, then such allowance as shall be deemed equitable, having reference to former contracts, and the position of the place in question: and each non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, one ration; to the commanding officers of each separate post, such additional number of rations as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, direct, having respect to the special circumstances of each post; to the women who may be allowed to any particular corps, not exceeding the proportion of four to a company, one ration each; to such matrons and nurses as may be necessarily employed in the hospital, one ration each; and to every commissioned officer who shall keep one servant, not a soldier of the line, one additional ration.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That each ration shall consist of one pound and a quarter of beef, or three quarters of a pound of pork, eighteen ounces of bread or flour, one gill of rum, whiskey, or brandy, and at the rate of two quarts of salt, four quarts of vinegar, four pounds of soap, and one pound and a half of candles, to every hundred rations.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the following officers shall, whenever forage is not furnished by the public, receive at the rate of the following sums per month, in lieu thereof: each colonel, twelve dollars; each lieutenant colonel, eleven dollars; each major, ten dollars; each adjutant, six dollars; each surgeon, ten dollars; and each surgeon's mate, six dollars.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That every non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, of the artillery and infantry, shall receive annually the following articles of uniform clothing, to wit: one hat, one coat, one vest, two pair of woollen and two pair of linen overalls, one coarse linen frock and trousers for fatigue clothing, four pair of shoes, four shirts, two pair of socks, two pair of short stockings, one blanket, one stock and clasp, and one pair of half gaiters: and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause to be furnished, to the paymasters of the respective districts, such surplus of clothing as he may deem expedient; which clothing shall, under his direction, be furnished to the soldiers, when necessary, at the contract prices, and accounted for by them out of their arrears of monthly pay.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States cause to be arranged the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the several corps of troops now in the service of the United States, in such manner as to form and complete, out of the same, the corps aforesaid; and cause the supernumerary officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, to be discharged from the service of the United States, from and after the first day of April next, or as soon thereafter as circumstances may permit.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the said corps, shall be governed by the rules and articles of war, which have been established by the United States in Congress assembled, or by such rules and articles as may be hereafter, by law, established: Provided, nevertheless, That the sentence of general courts martial, extending to the loss of life, the dismissal of a commissioned officer, or which shall respect the general officer, shall, with the whole of the proceedings of such cases, respectively, be laid before the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to direct the same to be carried into execution, or otherwise, as he shall judge proper.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the commissioned officers who shall be employed in the recruiting service, to keep up, by voluntary enlistment, the corps as aforesaid, shall be entitled to receive for every effective able-bodied citizen of the United States, who shall be duly enlisted by him for the term of five years, and mustered, of at least five feet six inches high, and between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five years, the sum of two dollars: Provided, nevertheless, That this regulation, so far as respects the height and age of the recruit, shall not extend to musicians or to those soldiers who may re-enlist into the service: And provided, also, That no person under the age of twenty-one years shall be enlisted by any officer, or held in the service of the United States, without the consent of his parent, guardian, or master, first had and obtained, if any he have; and if any officer shall enlist any person contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, for every such offence he shall forfeit and pay the amount of the bounty and clothing which the person so recruited may have received from the public, to be deducted out of the pay and emoluments of such officer.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and paid to each effective able-bodied citizen, recruited as aforesaid, to serve for the term of five years, a bounty of twelve dollars; but the payment of six dollars of the said bounty shall be deferred until he shall be mustered and have joined the corps in which he is to serve.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the said corps shall be paid in such manner, that the arrears shall, at no time, exceed two months, unless the circumstances of the case shall render it unavoidable.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That if any officer non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, in the corps composing the peace establishment, shall be disabled by wounds or otherwise, while in the line of his duty in public service, he shall be placed on the list of invalids of the United States, at such rate of pay, and under such regulations, as may be directed by the President of the United States for the time being: Provided, always, That the compensation to be allowed for such wounds or disabilities, to a commissioned officer, shall not exceed for the highest rate of disability half the monthly pay of such officer, at the time of his being disabled or wounded; and that no officer shall receive more than the half pay of a lieutenant colonel; and that the rate of compensation to non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, shall not exceed five dollars per month: And provided also, That all inferior disabilities shall entitle the person so disabled to receive an allowance proportionate to the highest disability.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That if any commissioned officer in the military peace establishment of the United States, shall, while in the service of the United States, die, by reason of any wound received in actual service of the United States, and leave a widow, or, if no widow, a child or children under sixteen years of age, such widow or, if no widow, such child or children shall be entitled to and receive half the monthly pay, to which the deceased was entitled at the time of his death, for and during the term of five years. But in case of the death or intermarriage of such widow, before the expiration of the said term of five years, the half pay, for the remainder of the time, shall go to the child or children of such deceased officer: Provided, always, That such half pay shall cease on the decease of such child or children.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the paymaster shall perform the duties of his office, agreeably to the direction of the President of the United States, for the time being; and before he enters on the duties of the same, shall give bonds, with good and sufficient sureties, in such sums as the President shall direct, for the faithful discharge of his said office, and shall take an oath to execute the duties thereof with fidelity: and it shall moreover, be his duty to appoint from the line, with the approbation of the President of the United States, the several paymasters to districts, and assistants, prescribed by this act; and he is hereby authorized to require the said paymasters to districts, and assistants, to enter into bond, with good and sufficient surety, for the faithful discharge of their respective duties.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the military agents, designated by this act, to purchase, receive, and forward to their proper destination, all military stores, and other articles, for the troops in their respective departments, and all goods and annuities for the Indians, which they may be directed to purchase, or which shall be ordered into their care by the Department of War. They shall account with the Department of War, annually, for all the public property which may pass through their hands, and all the moneys which they may expend in discharge of the duties of their offices, respectively: previous to their entering on the duties of their offices, they shall give bonds, with sufficient sureties, in such sums as the President of the United States shall direct, for the faithful discharge of the trust reposed in them, and shall take an oath faithfully to perform the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That if any non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, shall desert the service of the United States, he shall, in addition to the penalties mentioned in the rules and articles of war, be liable to serve, for and during such a period as shall, with the time he may have served previous to his desertion, amount to the full term of his enlistment; and such soldier shall and may be tried by a court martial, and punished, although the term of his enlistment may have elapsed previous to his being apprehended or tried.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall procure or entice a soldier in the service of the United States to desert, or who shall purchase from any soldier his arms, uniform clothing, or any part thereof; and every captain or commanding officer of any ship or vessel, who shall enter on board such ship or vessel, as one of his crew, knowing him to have deserted, or otherwise carry away any such soldier, or shall refuse to deliver him up to the orders of his commanding officer, shall, upon legal conviction, be fined at the discretion of any court having cognizance of the same, in any sum not exceeding three hundred dollars, or be imprisoned any term not exceeding one year.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That every officer, non-commissioned officer, musician and private, shall take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation, to wit: "I, A. B., do solemnly swear, or affirm, (as the case may be,) that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America, and that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against their enemies or opposers, whomsoever; and that I will observe and obey the orders of the President of the United States, and the orders of the officers appointed over me, according to the rules and articles of war."

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That whenever a general court martial shall be ordered, the President of the United States may appoint some fit person to act as judge advocate, who shall be allowed, in addition to his other pay, one dollar and twenty-five cents for every day he shall be necessarily employed in the duties of the said court; and in cases where the President shall not have made such appointment, the brigadier general or the president of the court may make the same.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That where any commissioned officer shall be obliged to incur any extra expense in travelling and sitting on general courts martial, he shall be allowed a reasonable compensation for such extra expense actually incurred, not exceeding one dollar and twenty-five cents per day, to officers who are not entitled to forage, and not exceeding one dollar per day to such as shall be entitled to forage.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That no non-commissioned officer, musician or private shall be arrested, or subject to arrest, or to be taken in execution for any debt under the sum of twenty dollars, contracted before enlistment, nor for any debt contracted after enlistment.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That whenever any officer or soldier shall be discharged from the service, except by way of punishment for any offence, he shall be allowed his pay and rations, or an equivalent in money, for such term of time as shall be sufficient for him to travel from the place of discharge to the place of his residence, computing at the rate of twenty miles to a day.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That to each commissioned officer, who shall be deranged by virtue of this act, there shall be allowed and paid, in addition to the pay and emoluments to which they will be entitled by law at the time of their discharge—to each officer whose term of service in any military corps of the United States shall not have exceeded three years, three months' pay; to all other officers, so deranged, one month's pay of their grades, respectively, for each year of past service in the army of the United States, or in any regiment or corps now or formerly in the service thereof.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered, when he shall deem it expedient, to organize and establish a corps of engineers, to consist of one engineer, with the pay, rank, and emoluments of a major; two assistant engineers, with the pay, rank, and emoluments of captains; two other assistant engineers, with the pay, rank, and emoluments of first lieutenants; two other assistant engineers, with the pay, rank, and emoluments of second lieutenants; and ten cadets, with the pay of sixteen dollars per month, and two rations per day; and the President of the United States is, in like manner, authorized, when he shall deem it proper, to make such promotions in the said corps, with a view to particular merit, and without regard to rank, so as not to exceed one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, four captains, four first lieutenants, four second lieutenants, and so as that the number of the whole corps shall, at no time, exceed twenty officers and cadets.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That the said corps when so organized, shall be stationed at West Point, in the State of New York, and shall constitute a military academy; and the engineers, assistant engineers, and cadets of the said corps, shall be subject, at all times, to do duty in such places, and on such service, as the President of the United States shall direct.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That the principal engineer, and in his absence the next in rank, shall have the superintendence of the said military academy, under the direction of the President of the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, at the public expense, under such regulations as shall be directed by the President of the United States, to procure the necessary books, implements, and apparatus, for the use and benefit of the said institution.

SEC. 29. And be it further enacted, That so much of any act or acts, now in force, as comes within the purview of this act, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed; saving, nevertheless, such parts thereof as relate to the enlistments or term or service of any of the troops, which, by this act, are continued on the present military establishment of the United States.

Approved, March 16, 1802.

An Act for the accommodation of persons concerned in certain fisheries therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this act, it shall be lawful for the collector of the customs for the district of Edenton, to permit any vessel having on board salt only, after due report and entry, and security given for the duties, to proceed, under the inspection of an officer of the customs, to any fishery, or other landing place within the district, (to be designated in the permit,) and there discharge the same; subject, however, in all other respects, to the regulations, penalties, and provisions established by an act passed the second of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage."

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That every inspector, or other officer of the customs, while performing duty on board any such vessel, elsewhere than in the port to which such officer may properly belong, shall be entitled to receive from the master, or commander thereof, such provisions and other accommodations, (free from expense,) as are usually supplied to passengers, or as the state and condition of the vessel will admit.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if, by reason of the delivery of any cargo of salt, in manner aforesaid, more than fifteen working days, (computing from the date of entry,) shall, in the whole, be spent therein, the wages or compensation of such inspector, or other officer of the customs, who may be employed on board any vessel, in respect to which such term may be so exceeded, shall, for every day of such excess, be paid by the master or owner; and until paid, it shall not be lawful for the collector to grant a clearance, or to permit such vessel to depart from the district.

Approved, March 16, 1802.

An Act to amend an act, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States."

Be it enacted, &c., That the collectors in each district shall prepare and transmit to their respective supervisors, correct lists of all lands within their respective collection districts, which by the act passed the fourteenth day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, entitled "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States," they now are or hereafter shall be authorized to advertise for sale, specifying therein the persons in whose names the assessments were originally made, and the sums due thereon respectively; of which lists it shall be the duty of the supervisor, in all cases, to cause correct transcripts to be made out, and to cause to be inserted for five weeks successively, in one or more newspapers published within his district, one of which shall be the gazette in which are published, by authority, the laws of the State within whose limits the said district may be comprised, if there be any such gazette, a notification, that such transcripts are lodged at his office, and are open to the free inspection of all parties concerned; and also notifying, that the tax due upon the said lands may be paid to the collector within whose division the aforesaid lands are contained, or to the supervisor of the district, at any time within the space of six months from the date of such notification, and the time when, and places where sales will be made of all lands upon which any part of the direct tax shall remain due after the expiration of the time aforesaid.

7th Con.—42

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in case of failure on the part of the owner or owners of the aforesaid lands to pay within the aforesaid time the full amount of tax due thereon, the collectors, under the direction, and with the approbation of their respective supervisors, shall immediately proceed to sell, at public sale, at the times and places mentioned in the advertisement of the supervisor, so much of the lands aforesaid as may be sufficient to satisfy the same, together with all the costs and charges of preparing lists, advertising, and notifying, as aforesaid, and of the sale.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted. That the aforesaid tax, including all costs and charges as aforesaid, shall be and remain a lien upon all lands and other real estate on which the same has been assessed, until the tax due upon the same, including all costs and charges, shall have been collected, or until a sale shall have been effected, according to the provision of this act, or of the act to which this is a supplement.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in all cases wherein any tract of land may have been assessed in one assessment, which at the time when such assessment was made, was actually divided into two or more distinct parcels, each parcel having one or more distinct proprietor or proprietors, it shall be the duty of the collector to receive in manner aforesaid, from any proprietor or proprietors thus situated, his or their proportion of the tax due upon such tract; and thereupon, the land of the proprietor or proprietors, upon which the tax shall have been thus paid, shall be forever discharged from any part of the tax due under the original assessment.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in any case in which it may have happened that lands actually belonging to one person, may have been, or hereafter shall be, assessed in the name of another, and no sale of the same shall yet have been made, the same proceedings shall be had for the sale of the aforesaid lands, in order to raise the tax assessed in relation to the same, as is provided by the eleventh section of the act to which this is a supplement, in the case of lands assessed, the owner whereof is unknown; and such sale shall transfer and pass to the purchaser a good and effectual title.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the right of redemption reserved to the owners of lands and tenements sold under this act, or the act to which this is a supplement, shall in no wise be affected or impaired: Provided always, That the owners of lands which shall thus be sold after the passing of this act, in order to avail themselves of that right, shall make payment or tender of payment within two years from the time of sale, for the use of the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, of the amount of the said tax, costs, and charges, with interest for the same, at the rate of twenty-five per cent. per annum.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and hereby is authorized and empowered, under the direction of the President of the United States, to augment the compensation fixed by law for the Commissioner or for the principal and assistant assessors, or either of them, in any division where it shall be found necessary for carrying into effect the act entitled, "An act to provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, and the enumeration of slaves within the United States," so, however, as that the Commissioner shall in no case receive more than five dollars per day, nor the principal or assistant assessor in any case receive more than three dollars per day, which additional compensation shall be subject to the same rules of settlement as are established by the act last aforesaid.

Approved, March 16, 1802.

An Act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following boundary line, established by treaty between the United States and various Indian tribes, shall be clearly ascertained, and distinctly marked in all such places as the President of the United States shall deem necessary, and in such manner as he shall direct, to wit: Beginning at the mouth of the Cayahoga river on Lake Erie, and running thence up the same to the portage between that and the Tuscaroras branch of the Muskingum; thence, down that branch, to the crossing place above Fort Lawrence; thence westwardly to a fork of that branch of the Great Miami river running into the Ohio, at or near which fork stood Laromie's store, and where commences the portage, between the Miami of the Ohio and St. Mary's river, which is a branch of the Miami, which runs into Lake Erie; thence a westwardly course to Fort Recovery, which stands on a branch of the Wabash; thence southwestwardly, in a direct line to the Ohio, so as to intersect that river, opposite the mouth of Kentucky or Cuttawa river; thence down the said river Ohio to the tract of one hundred and fifty thousand acres, near the rapids of the Ohio, which has been assigned to General Clarke, for the use of himself and his warriors; thence around the said tract, on the line of the said tract, till it shall again intersect the said river Ohio; thence down the same to a point opposite the high lands or ridge between the mouth of the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers; thence southeastwardly on the said ridge, to a point, from whence a southwest line will strike the mouth of Duck river; thence, still eastwardly on the said ridge, to a point forty miles above Nashville; thence northeast to Cumberland river; thence up the said river to where the Kentucky road crosses the same; thence to the Cumberland mountain, at the point of Campbell's line; thence in a southwestwardly direction along the foot of the Cumberland mountain to Emory's river; thence down the same to its junction with the river Clinch; thence down the river Clinch to Hawkins's line; thence along the same to a white oak, marked one mile tree; thence south fifty-one degrees west, three hundred and twenty-eight chains, to a large ash tree on the bank of the river Tennessee, one mile below Southwest

Point; thence up the northeast margin of the river Tennessee, (not including islands,) to the Wild Cat Rock, below Tellico block-house; thence in a direct line to the Militia Spring, near the Maryville road leading from Tellico; thence from the said spring to the Chilhowee mountain, by a line so to be run as will leave all the farms on Nine-mile creek to the northward and eastward of it, and to be continued along the Chilhowee mountain until it strikes Hawkins's line; thence along the said line to the great Iron mountain; and from the top of which a line to be continued in a southeastwardly course to where the most southern branch of Little river crosses the divisional line to Tugaloo river; thence along the South Carolina Indian boundary to and over the Oconna mountain, in a southwest course to Tugaloo river; thence in a direct line to the top of Currahee mountain, where the Creek line passes it; thence to the head or source of the main south branch of the Oconee river, called the Appalachee; thence down the middle of the said main south branch and river Oconee, to its confluence with Oakmulgee, which forms the river Altamaha; thence down the middle of the said Altamaha, to the old line on the said river; and thence along the said old line to the river St. Mary's: Provided always, That if the boundary line between the said Indian tribes and the United States shall, at any time hereafter, be varied, by any treaty which shall be made between the said Indian tribes and the United States, then all the provisions contained in this act shall be construed to apply to the said line so to be varied, in the same manner, as said provisions apply, by force of this act, to the boundary line hereinbefore recited.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen of, or other person resident in, the United States, or either of the territorial districts of the United States, shall cross over, or go within the said boundary line, to hunt, or in any wise destroy the game; or shall drive, or otherwise convey any stock of horses or cattle to range on any lands allotted or secured by treaty with the United States, to any Indian tribes, he shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding six months.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any such citizen, or other person, shall go into any country which is allotted, or secured by treaty as aforesaid, to any of the Indian tribes south of the river Ohio, without a passport first had and obtained from the Governor of some one of the United States, or the officer of the troops of the United States, commanding at the nearest post on the frontiers, or such other person as the President of the United States may, from time to time, authorize to grant the same, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding fifty dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding three months.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any such citizen, or other person, shall go into any town, settlement, or territory, belonging, or secured by treaty with the United States, to any nation or tribe of Indians, and shall there commit robbery, larceny, trespass, or any other crime, against the person or property of any friendly Indian or Indians, which would be punishable, if committed within the jurisdiction of any State, against a citizen of the United States; or, unauthorized by law, and with a hostile intention, shall be found on any Indian land, such offender shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months; and shall also, when property is taken or destroyed, forfeit and pay to such Indian or Indians, to whom the property taken and destroyed belongs, a sum equal to twice the just value of the property so taken or destroyed; and if such offender shall be unable to pay a sum at least equal to the said just value, whatever such payment shall fall short of the said just value, shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States: Provided, nevertheless, That no such Indian shall be entitled to any payment out of the Treasury of the United States, for any such property taken or destroyed, if he, or any of the nation to which he belongs, shall have sought private revenge, or attempted to obtain satisfaction by any force or violence.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any such citizen, or other person, shall make a settlement on any lands belonging or secured, or granted by treaty with the United States, to any Indian tribe, or shall survey, or attempt to survey, such lands, or designate any of the boundaries, by marking trees, or otherwise, such offender shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, and suffer imprisonment not exceeding twelve months. And it shall, moreover, be lawful for the President of the United States to take such measures, and to employ such military force, as he may judge necessary, to remove from lands, belonging or secured by treaty, as aforesaid, to any Indian tribe, any such citizen, or other person, who has made, or shall hereafter make, or attempt to make a settlement thereon.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any such citizen, or other person, shall go into any town, settlement, or territory, belonging to any nation or tribe of Indians, and shall there commit murder, by killing any Indian or Indians, belonging to any nation or tribe of Indians in amity with the United States, such offender, on being thereof convicted, shall suffer death.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no such citizen, or other person, shall be permitted to reside at any of the towns, or hunting camps, of any of the Indian tribes as a trader, without a license, under the hand and seal of the superintendent of the department, or of such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize to grant licenses for that purpose; which superintendent, or person authorized, shall, on application, issue such license, for a term not exceeding two years, to such trader, who shall enter into bond with one or more sureties, approved of by the superintendent, or person issuing such license, or by the President of the United States, in the penal sum of one thousand dollars, conditioned for the true and faithful observance of such regulations and restrictions as are, or shall be made for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and the superintendent, or person issuing such license, shall have full power and authority to recall the same, if the person so licensed shall transgress any of the regulations, or restrictions, provided for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and shall put in suit such bonds as he may have taken on the breach of any condition therein contained.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any such citizen or other person, who shall attempt to reside in any town or hunting camp, of any of the Indian tribes, as a trader, without such license, shall forfeit all the merchandise offered for sale to the Indians, or found in his possession, and shall, moreover, be liable to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, and to imprisonment not exceeding thirty days.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That if any such citizen, or other person, shall purchase, or receive of any Indian, in the way of trade or barter, a gun, or other article commonly used in hunting, any instrument of husbandry, or cooking utensil, of the kind usually obtained by the Indians, in their intercourse with white people, or any article of clothing, excepting skins or furs, he shall forfeit a sum not exceeding fifty dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding thirty days.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That no such citizen, or other person, shall be permitted to purchase any horse of an Indian, or of any white man in the Indian territory, without special license for that purpose; which license, the superintendent, or such other person as the President shall appoint, is hereby authorized to grant, on the same terms, conditions, and restrictions, as other licenses are to be granted under this act: and any such person, who shall purchase a horse or horses, under such license, before he exposes such horse or horses for sale, and within fifteen days after they have been brought out of the Indian country, shall make a particular return to the superintendent, or other person, from whom he obtained his license, of every horse purchased by him as aforesaid; describing such horses by their color, height, and other natural or artificial marks, under the penalty contained in their respective bonds; and every such person purchasing a horse or horses, as aforesaid, in the Indian country, without a special license, shall, for every horse thus purchased and brought into any settlement of citizens of the United States, forfeit a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding thirty days; and every person who shall purchase a horse, knowing him to be brought out of the Indian territory, by any person or persons, not licensed, as above, to purchase the same, shall forfeit the value of such horse.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That no agent, superintendent, or other person authorized to grant a license to trade, or purchase horses, shall have any interest or concern in any trade with the Indians, or in the purchase or sale of any horse to or from any Indian, excepting for and on account of the United States: and any person offending herein shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That no purchase, grant, lease, or other conveyance of lands, or of any title or claim thereto, from any Indian, or nation, or tribe of Indians, within the bounds of the United States, shall be of any validity, in law or equity, unless the same be made by treaty or convention, entered into pursuant to the Constitution: and it shall be a misdemeanor in any person, not employed under the authority of the United States, to negotiate such treaty or convention, directly or indirectly, to treat with any such Indian nation, or tribe of Indians, for the title or purchase of any lands by them held or claimed, punishable by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding twelve months: Provided, nevertheless, That it shall be lawful for the agent or agents of any State, who may be present at any treaty held with Indians under the authority of the United States, in the presence and with the approbation of the Commissioner or Commissioners, appointed to hold the same, to propose to, and adjust with the Indians, the compensation to be made for their claims to lands within such State, which shall be extinguished by the treaty.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That in order to promote civilization among the friendly Indian tribes, and to secure the continuance of their friendship, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to cause them to be furnished with useful domestic animals, and implements of husbandry, and with goods or money, as he shall judge proper, and to appoint such persons, from time to time, as temporary agents, to reside among the Indians, as he shall think fit: Provided, That the whole amount of such presents, and allowance to such agents, shall not exceed fifteen thousand dollars per annum.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That if any Indian or Indians, belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States, shall come over or cross the said boundary line, into any State or territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy any horse, horses, or other property, belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the territorial districts of the United States, or shall commit any murder, violence, or outrage, upon any such citizen or inhabitant, it shall be the duty of such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent, to make application to the superintendent, or such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize for that purpose; who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction or instruction of the President of the United States, make application to the nation or tribe, to which such Indian or Indians shall belong, for satisfaction; and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction, in a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, then it shall be the duty of such superintendent or other person authorized as aforesaid, to make return of his doings to the President of the United States, and forward to him all the documents and proofs in the case, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper to obtain satisfaction for the injury: and, in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guaranty to the party injured an eventual indemnification: Provided always, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent, shall, in any way, violate any of the provisions of this act, by seeking, or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge, by crossing over the line, on any of the Indian lands, he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States, for such indemnification: And provided, also, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the legal apprehension or arresting, within the limits of any State or district, of any Indian having so offended: And provided, further, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to deduct such sum or sums as shall be paid for the property taken, stolen, or destroyed, by any such Indian, out of the annual stipend which the United States are bound to pay to the tribe to which such Indian shall belong.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the superior courts in each of the said territorial districts, and the circuit courts, and other courts of the United States of similar jurisdiction in criminal causes, in each district of the United States, in which any offender against this act shall be apprehended, or, agreeably to the provisions of this act, shall be brought for trial, shall have, and are hereby invested with full power and authority to hear and determine all crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, against this act; such courts proceeding therein in the same manner as if such crimes, offences, and misdemeanors had been committed within the bounds of their respective districts: and in all cases where the punishment shall not be death, the county courts of quarter sessions in the said territorial districts, and the district courts of the United States, in their respective districts, shall have, and are hereby invested with, like power to hear and determine the same, any law to the contrary notwithstanding: And, in all cases where the punishment shall be death, it shall be lawful for the Governor of either of the territorial districts where the offender shall be apprehended, or into which he shall be brought for trial, to issue a commission of oyer and terminer to the superior judges of such district, who shall have full power and authority to hear and determine all such capital cases, in the same manner as the superior courts of such districts have in their ordinary sessions; and when the offender shall be apprehended, or brought for trial into any of the United States, except Kentucky or Tennessee, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to issue a like commission to any one or more judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the judge of the district, in which such offender may have been apprehended or shall have been brought for trial; which judges, or any two of them, shall have the same jurisdiction in such capital cases, as the circuit court of such district, and shall proceed to trial and judgment in the same manner as such circuit court might or could do. And the district courts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Maine, shall have jurisdiction of all crimes, offences, and misdemeanors committed against this act, and shall proceed to trial and judgment, in the same manner as the circuit courts of the United States.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the military force of the United States to apprehend every person who shall or may be found in the Indian country, over and beyond the said boundary line between the United States and the said Indian tribes, in violation of any of the provisions or regulations of this act, and him or them immediately to convey, in the nearest convenient and safe route, to the civil authority of the United States, in some one of the three next adjoining States or districts, to be proceeded against in due course of law: Provided, That no person, apprehended by military force as aforesaid, shall be detained longer than five days after the arrest, and before removal. And all officers and soldiers who may have any such person or persons in custody, shall treat them with all the humanity which the circumstances will possibly permit; and every officer and soldier who shall be guilty of maltreating any such person, while in custody, shall suffer such punishment as a court martial shall direct: Provided, That the officer having custody of such person or persons shall, if required by such person or persons, conduct him or them to the nearest judge of the supreme or superior court of any State, who, if the offence is bailable, shall take proper bail if offered, returnable to the district court next to be holden in said district, which bail the said judge is hereby authorized to take, and which shall be liable to be estreated as any other recognizance for bail in any court of the United States; and if said judge shall refuse to act, or the person or persons fail to procure satisfactory bail, then the said person or persons are to be proceeded with according to the directions of this act.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That if any person, who shall be charged with a violation of any of the provisions or regulations of this act, shall be found within any of the United States, or either of the territorial districts of the United States, such offender may be there apprehended and brought to trial in the same manner as if such crime or offence had been committed within such State or district; and it shall be the duty of the military force of the United States, when called upon by the civil magistrate, or any proper officer, or other person duly authorized for that purpose and having a lawful warrant, to aid and assist such magistrate, officer, or other person authorized as aforesaid, in arresting such offender, and him committing to safe custody, for trial according to law.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the amount of fines and duration of imprisonment, directed by this act as a punishment for the violation of any of the provisions thereof, shall be ascertained and fixed, not exceeding the limits prescribed, in the discretion of the court before whom the trial shall be had; and that all fines and forfeitures which shall accrue under this act, shall be one half to the use of the informant, and the other half to the use of the United States; except where the prosecution shall be first instituted on behalf of the United States; in which case the whole shall be to their use.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any trade or intercourse with Indians living on lands surrounded by settlements of the citizens of the United States, and being within the ordinary jurisdiction of any of the individual States; or the unmolested use of a road from Washington district to Mero district, or to prevent the citizens of Tennessee from keeping in repair the said road, under the direction or orders of the Governor of said State, and of the navigation of the Tennessee river, as reserved and secured by treaty; nor shall this act be construed to prevent any person or persons travelling from Knoxville to Price's settlement, or to the settlement on Obed's river, (so called,) provided they shall travel in the trace or path which is usually travelled, and provided the Indians make no objection; but if the Indians object, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to issue a proclamation, prohibiting all travelling on said traces, or either of them, as the case may be; after which the penalties of this act shall be incurred by every person travelling or being found on said traces, or either of them, to which the prohibition may apply, within the Indian boundary, without a passport.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be clearly ascertained and distinctly marked, in all such places as he shall deem necessary, and in such manner as he shall direct, any other boundary lines between the United States and any Indian tribe, which now are, or hereafter may be, established by treaty.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to take such measures, from time to time, as to him may appear expedient to prevent or restrain the vending or distributing of spirituous liquors among all or any of the said Indian tribes, anything herein contained to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force from the passage thereof; and so far as respects the proceedings under this act, it is to be understood that the act, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the district of Tennessee,'" is not to operate.

the contingent expenses of the several departments, during the year one thousand eight hundred and two.

Approved, April 2, 1802.

An Act making appropriation for defraying the expense of a negotiation with the British Government, to ascertain the boundary line between the United States and Upper Canada.

Be it enacted, &c., That a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, payable out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense which shall be incurred in negotiating with the Government of Great Britain, for ascertaining and establishing the boundary line between the United States and the British province of Upper Canada; when the President of the United States shall deem it expedient to commence such negotiation.

Approved, April 3, 1802.

An Act making an appropriation for defraying the expenses which may arise from carrying into effect the convention made between the United States and the French Republic.

Be it enacted, &c., That, for the payment of such demands as may be justly due for French vessels and property captured, and which must be restored or paid for, pursuant to the convention between the United States and the French Republic, there be appropriated a sum not exceeding three hundred and eighteen thousand dollars, to be paid, under the direction of the President of the United States, out of any public money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, April 3, 1802.

An Act to repeal the Internal Taxes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, the internal duties on stills, and domestic distilled spirits, on refined sugars, licenses to retailers, sales at auction, carriages for the conveyance of persons, and stamped vellum, parchment, and paper, shall be discontinued, and all acts and parts of acts relative thereto, shall, from and after the said thirtieth day of June next, be repealed: Provided, That for the recovery and receipt of such duties as shall have accrued, and on the day aforesaid remain outstanding, and for the payment of drawbacks or allowances on the exportation of any of the said spirits or sugars, legally entitled thereto, and for the recovery and distribution of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and the remission thereof, which shall have been incurred before and on the said day, the provisions of the aforesaid acts shall remain in full force and virtue.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the office of Superintendent of Stamps shall cease and be discontinued from and after the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and two; after which day the Commissioner of the Revenue shall perform all the duties by law enjoined on the said Superintendent of Stamps, which may be required in pursuance of this act: that the office of collectors of the internal duties shall continue in each collection district respectively, until the collection of the duties above mentioned shall have been completed in such district, and no longer, unless sooner discontinued by the President of the United States, who shall be and hereby is empowered, whenever the collection of the said duties shall have been so far completed in any district as to render, in his opinion, that measure expedient, to discontinue any of the said collectors, and to unite into one collection district any two or more collection districts, lying and being in the same State: that the office of supervisor shall continue in each State or district, respectively, until the collection of the duties above mentioned, together with the collection of the direct tax, shall have been completed in each State or district, and no longer; unless sooner discontinued by the President of the United States, who shall be and hereby is empowered, whenever the collection of the said duties and tax shall have been so far completed in any State or district as, in his opinion, to render that measure expedient, to discontinue any of the said offices; in which case, the collectors thereafter employed in the collection of the said duties and tax in such State or district shall be appointed and removed by the President alone, and shall be immediately accountable to the officers of the Treasury Department, under such regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury: that for the promoting of the collection of any of the above mentioned duties or tax, which may be outstanding after the said thirtieth day of June next, the President of the United States shall be, and he hereby is empowered, at any time hereafter, to make such allowance as he may think proper, in addition to that now allowed by law to any of the collectors of the said duties and tax, and the same from time to time to vary: Provided, That such additional allowance shall in no instance exceed, in the aggregate, five per cent. of the gross amount of the duties and tax outstanding on that day: and the office of Commissioner of the Revenue shall cease and be discontinued, whenever the collection of the duties and tax above mentioned shall be completed, unless sooner discontinued by the President of the United States, who shall be, and hereby is empowered, whenever the collection of the said duties and tax shall have been so far completed as, in his opinion, to render that measure expedient, to discontinue the said office, in which case the immediate superintendence of the collection of such parts of the said duties and tax as may then remain outstanding, shall be placed in such officer of the Treasury Department, as the Secretary for the time being, may designate: Provided, however, That all bonds, notes, or other instruments, which have been charged with the payment of a duty, and which shall, at any time prior to the said thirtieth day of June, have been written or printed upon vellum, parchment, or paper, not stamped or marked according to law, or upon vellum, parchment, or paper stamped or marked at a lower rate of duty, than is, by law, required for such bond, note, or other instrument, may be presented to any collector of the customs within the State; and where there is no such collector, to the marshal of the district, whose duty it shall be, upon the payment of the duty with which such instrument was chargeable, together with the additional sum of ten dollars, for which duty and additional sum the said collector or marshal shall be accountable to the Treasury of the United States, to endorse upon some part of such instrument his receipt for the same; and thereupon the said bond, note, or other instrument shall be, to all intents and purposes, as valid and available to the person holding the same, as if it had been or were stamped, counterstamped, or marked as by law required; anything in any act to the contrary, notwithstanding.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That owners of stills, whose licenses to distil shall not have expired on the thirtieth day of June next, shall at their option, pay either the whole duty which would have accrued on their stills on account of such licenses, or the duty which would have accrued on said stills, on the day aforesaid, if they had taken licenses ending on that day: the owners of snuff mills, whose licenses have not expired on the first day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, shall be allowed a deduction from the duties incurred on the same, proportionate to the time thus remaining unexpired on such licenses: that the several banks, which may have agreed to pay the annual compensation of one per cent. on their dividends, in lieu of the stamp duty on the notes issued by them, shall pay only at the rate of one per cent. per annum on such dividends, to the thirtieth day of June next: that retailers of wines and spirits, who may take licenses, after the passing of this act, shall pay for such licenses only in proportion to the time which may intervene between the obtaining such licenses and the thirtieth day of June next: and that the owners of carriages for the conveyance of persons, who may enter the same after the passing of this act, and before the thirtieth day of June next, shall pay the duty for the same only to the said thirtieth day of June.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the supervisor of the Northwest district shall, in addition to the same commissions on the product of all the internal duties collected in his district, as heretofore have been allowed to the supervisor of Ohio, be allowed an annual salary of five hundred dollars, and at the rate of three hundred dollars per annum for clerk hire.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the following extra allowances for clerk hire, shall be made for one year, to the supervisors of the following districts, as a full compensation for the additional duties arising from the settlement of accounts of certain inspectors of the internal revenues, whose offices have been suppressed by the President of the United States; that is to say, to each of the supervisors of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina, and South Carolina, the sum of eight hundred dollars, and to the supervisor of Virginia, the sum of five hundred dollars.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of any act as directs an annual entry of stills to be made, be, and the same hereby is, repealed.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the certificates accompanying foreign distilled spirits, wines, and teas, which are now furnished by the supervisors to the inspectors of the ports, shall, from and after the aforesaid thirtieth day of June, be furnished by such collectors of the customs, as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury. And it shall be the duty of the inspectors to account with such collectors, for the application of such certificates, in like manner, and under the same regulations as heretofore they have accounted with the supervisors.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, for preparing and issuing the certificates, the collectors performing that duty shall be entitled to, and receive, the same compensation as heretofore has been allowed to the supervisors, respectively.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all persons who shall, on or after the thirtieth day of June next, have any blank vellum, parchment, or paper, which has been stamped by the superintendent of stamps and counter-stamped by the commissioner of the revenue, and on which a duty has been paid to the use of Government, shall be entitled to receive from such collector or collectors of the customs, or other revenue officer in the respective States or districts as may be designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, the value of the said stamps, after deducting, in all cases, seven and an half per cent., and the said officers are hereby authorized to pay the same: Provided, The said blank vellum, parchment, or paper, be presented within four months after the thirtieth day of June next.

Approved, April 6, 1802.

An Act authorizing the erection of certain light-houses, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, there shall be purchased, for the use of the United States, the land whereon lately stood the light-house on Gurnet Point, and so much land adjoining thereto, as may be sufficient for vaults and any other purposes necessary for the better support of the said light-house.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to procure a new lantern or lanterns, with suitable distinctions, and to cause convenient vaults to be erected; and the said light-house, on the Gurnet, at the entrance on Plymouth harbor, to be rebuilt.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized, to cause to be rebuilt, of such height as he may deem expedient, the light-house now situated on the Eastern end of Newcastle

Acts of Congress.

Island, at the entrance of Piscataqua river, either on the land owned by the United States, or on Pollock Rock: Provided, That if built on Pollock Rock, the Legislature of New Hampshire shall vest the property of the said rock in the United States, and cede the jurisdiction of the same.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a sufficient light-house to be erected on Lynde's point, at the mouth of Connecticut river, in the State of Connecticut, and to appoint a keeper, and otherwise provide for such light-house, at the expense of the United States: Provided, That sufficient land for the accommodation of such light-house can be purchased at a reasonable price, and the Legislature of the State of Connecticut shall cede the jurisdiction over the same to the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to cause proper light-houses to be built, and buoys to be placed, in the situations necessary for the navigation of the sound between Long Island and the main; and be, to that effect, authorized to cause, by proper and intelligent persons, a survey to be taken of the said sound, as far as may be requisite; and to appoint keepers, and otherwise provide for such light-houses, at the expense of the United States: Provided, That sufficient land for the accommodation of the respective light-houses can be purchased at a reasonable price; and that the Legislatures of Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York, shall, respectively, cede the jurisdiction over the same to the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a sufficient light-house to be erected on the south point of Cumberland island, at the entrance of St. Mary's river, within the State of Georgia; and that, under the direction of the said Secretary, there shall be purchased, if the same cannot otherwise be obtained, sufficient land for the erection of the said light-house, and accommodations for the better support thereof: Provided, That the Legislature of Georgia shall cede the jurisdiction over the same to the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That there shall be, and hereby are, appropriated, for the reimbursement of the merchants of Plymouth and Duxbury, for moneys expended by them in erecting a temporary light on the Gurnet, a sum not exceeding two hundred and seventy dollars; for the rebuilding the light-house on the said Gurnet, a sum not exceeding two thousand five hundred dollars; for rebuilding the light-house on the eastern end of Newcastle island, a sum not exceeding four thousand dollars; and for the erection of the said light-house on said Lynde's point, a sum not exceeding two thousand five hundred dollars; for the erection of a light-house on Cumberland South Point, a sum not exceeding four thousand dollars; and for taking the survey, and for erecting light-houses and placing buoys in the sound, a sum not exceeding eight thousand dollars to be paid out of any moneys which may be in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the President of the United States, to cause to be expended, in repairing and erecting public piers in the river Delaware, a sum not exceeding thirty thousand dollars; and that the same be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the jurisdiction of the site where any such piers may be erected, shall be first ceded to the United States, according to the conditions in such case by law provided.

Approved, April 6, 1802.

An Act for the relief of the Marshals of certain districts therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to apportion to the several marshals of the districts of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, respectively, who have been employed or concerned in taking the late census, the compensation allowed by the "Act providing for the second census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," according to the service each may have performed.

Approved, April 6, 1802.

An Act declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, &c., That the assent of Congress is hereby given, and declared, to an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, entitled "An act to amend, and reduce into one, the several acts of Assembly for improving the navigation of Appomattox river from Broadway to Pocahontas bridge."

Approved, April 14, 1802.

An Act to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to augment the salaries of the officers therein mentioned," passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine.

Be it enacted, &c., That an act, entitled "An act to augment the salaries of the officers therein mentioned," be, and the same is hereby, revived and continued in force for and during the term of two years from the commencement of the present year.

Approved, April 14, 1802.

An act to amend an act, entitled "An act to retain a further sum on drawbacks, for the expenses incident to the allowance and payment thereof, and in lieu of stamp duties on debentures."

Be it enacted, &c., That the second section of the act, entitled "An act to retain a further sum on drawbacks, for the expenses incident to the allowance and payment thereof, and in lieu of stamp duties on debentures," shall not be deemed to operate upon unregistered ships or vessels owned by the citizens of the United States at the time of passing the said act, in those cases where such ship or vessel at that time possessed a sea-letter or other regular document, issued from a custom-house of the United States, proving such ship or vessel to be American property.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, whenever satisfactory proof shall be made to the Secretary of the Treasury that any unregistered ship or vessel was in fact the property, in whole, of a citizen or citizens of the United States, on the thirteenth day of May, in the year one thousand eight hundred, that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be issued to such ship or vessel a certificate, which shall entitle such unregistered ship or vessel to the same privileges which are hereinbefore granted to unregistered ships or vessels owned by citizens of the United States, and carrying a sea-letter or other regular document, issued from a custom-house of the United States before the passing of the said act, entitled "An act to retain a further sum on drawbacks, for the expenses incident to the allowance and payment thereof, and in lieu of stamp duties on debentures."

Approved, April 14, 1802.

An Act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject.

Be it enacted, &c., That any alien, being a free white person, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, or any of them, on the following conditions, and not otherwise.

First. That he shall have declared, on oath or affirmation, before the supreme, superior, district, or circuit court of some one of the States, or of the Territorial districts of the United States, or a circuit or district court of the United States, three years at least before his admission, that it was bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, whereof such alien may at the time be a citizen or subject.

Secondly. That he shall, at the time of the application to be admitted, declare on oath or affirmation, before some one of the courts aforesaid, that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whereof he was before a citizen or subject; which proceedings shall be recorded by the clerk of the court.

Thirdly. That the court admitting such alien shall be satisfied that he has resided within the United States five years, at least, and within the State or Territory where such court is at the time held, one year at least; and it shall further appear to their satisfaction that during that time he has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same: Provided, That the oath of the applicant shall, in no case, be allowed to prove his residence.

Fourthly. That in case the alien applying to be admitted to citizenship shall have borne any hereditary title, or been of any of the orders of nobility in the kingdom or state from which he came, he shall, in addition to the above requisites, make an express renunciation of his title or order of nobility in the court to which his application shall be made, which renunciation shall be recorded in the said court: Provided, That no alien who shall be a native citizen, denizen, or subject, of any country, state, or sovereign, with whom the United States shall be at war at the time of his application, shall be then admitted to be a citizen of the United States: Provided, also, That any alien who was residing within the limits, and under the jurisdiction of the United States, before the twenty-ninth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, may be admitted to become a citizen, on due proof made to some one of the courts aforesaid that he has resided two years, at least, within and under the jurisdiction of the United States, and one year, at least, immediately preceding his application, within the State or Territory where such court is at the time held; and on his declaring on oath, or affirmation, that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, whereof he was before a citizen or subject; and moreover, on its appearing to the satisfaction of the court, that during the said term of two years, he has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same; and where the alien applying for admission to citizenship shall have borne any hereditary title, or been of any of the orders of nobility in the kingdom or state from which he came, on his moreover making in the court an express renunciation of his title or order of nobility, before he shall be entitled to such admission: all of which proceedings, required in this proviso to be performed in the court, shall be recorded by the clerk thereof: And provided, also, That any alien who has resided within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States at any time between the said twenty-ninth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, and the eighteenth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, may, within two years after the passing of this act, be admitted to become a citizen, without a compliance with the first condition above specified.

SEC. 2. Provided, also, and be it further enacted, That, in addition to the directions aforesaid, all free white persons, being aliens, who may arrive in the United States after the passing of this act, shall, in order to become citizens of the United States, make registry and obtain certificates in the following manner, to wit: every person desirous of being naturalized shall, if of the age of twenty-one years, or held in service, shall be reported by his parent, guardian, master, or mistress, to the clerk of the district court of the district where such alien or aliens shall arrive, or to some other court of record of the United States, or of either of the Territorial districts of the same, or of a particular State; and such report shall ascertain the name, birth-place, age, nation, and allegiance of each alien, together with the country whence he or she migrated, and the place of his or her intended settlement; and it shall be the duty of such clerk, on receiving such report, to record the same in his office, and to grant to the person making such report, and to each individual concerned therein, whenever he shall be required, a certificate, under his hand and seal of office, of such report and registry; and for receiving and registering each report of any individual or family, he shall receive fifty cents; and for each certificate granted pursuant to this act, to an individual or family, fifty cents: and such certificate shall be exhibited to the court by every alien who may arrive in the United States after the passing of this act, on his application to be naturalized, as evidence of the time of his arrival within the United States.

SEC. 3. And whereas, doubts have arisen whether certain courts of record in some of the States are included within the description of district or circuit courts: Be it further enacted, That every court of record in any individual State, having common law jurisdiction, and a seal, and clerk or prothonotary, shall be considered as a district court within the meaning of this act; and every alien who may have been naturalized in any such court, shall enjoy, from and after the passing of this act, the same rights and privileges as if he had been naturalized in a district or circuit court of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the children of persons duly naturalized under any of the laws of the United States, or who, previous to the passing of any law on that subject by the Government of the United States, may have become citizens of any one of the said States, under the laws thereof, being under the age of twenty-one years, at the time of their parent's being so naturalized or admitted to the rights of citizenship, shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens of the United States, and the children of persons who now are or have been citizens of the United States, shall, though born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, be considered as citizens of the United States: Provided, That the rights of citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers have never resided within the United States: Provided, also, That no person heretofore proscribed by any State, or who has been legally convicted of having joined the army of Great Britain, during the late war, shall be admitted a citizen, as aforesaid, without the consent of the Legislature of the State in which such person was proscribed.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts heretofore passed respecting naturalization, be, and the same are, hereby repealed.

An Act in addition to an act, entitled "An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen."

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passing of this act, and until the first day of January next, it shall be lawful for the holders or proprietors of warrants heretofore granted in consideration of military services, or register's certificates of fifty acres, or more, granted, or hereafter to be granted, agreeable to the third section of an act, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled an act, regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen," approved the first day of March, one thousand eight hundred, to register and locate the same, in the same manner, and under the same restrictions, as might have been done before the first day of January last: Provided, That persons holding register's certificates for a less quantity than one hundred acres, may locate the same on such parts of fractional townships, as shall, for that purpose, be divided by the Secretary of the Treasury into lots of fifty acres each.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to receive claims to lands for military services, and claims for duplicates of warrants issued from his office, or from the land office of Virginia, or of plats and certificates of surveys founded on such warrants, suggested to have been lost or destroyed, until the first day of January next, and no longer; and, immediately thereafter, to report the same to Congress, designating the numbers of claims of each description, with his opinion thereon.

Approved, April 26, 1802.

An Act to amend the Judicial System of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this act, the Supreme Court shall be holden by the justices thereof, or any four of them, at the city of Washington, and shall have one session in each and every year, to commence on the first Monday of February, annually, and that if four of the said justices shall not attend within ten days after the time hereby appointed for the commencement of the said session, the business of the said court shall be continued over till the next stated session thereof: Provided, always, That any one or more of the said justices, attending as aforesaid, shall have power to make all necessary orders touching any suit, action, writ of error, process, pleadings, or proceedings, returned to the said court or depending therein, preparatory to the hearing, trial, or decision of such action, suit, appeal, writ of error, process, pleadings, or proceedings. And so much of the act, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," passed the twenty-fourth day of September, seventeen hundred and eighty-nine, as provides for the holding a session of the Supreme Court of the United States on the first Monday of August, annually, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the associate justices resident in the fourth circuit formed by this act, to attend at the city of Washington on the first Monday of August next, and on the first Monday of August each and every year thereafter, who shall have power to make all necessary orders touching any suit, action, appeal, writ of error, process, pleadings, or proceedings, returned to the said court, or depending therein, preparatory to the hearing, trial, or decision of such action, suit, appeal, writ of error, process, pleadings, or proceedings; and that all writs and process may be returnable to the said court on the said first Monday in August, in the same manner as to the session of the said court hereinbefore directed to be holden on the first Monday of February, and may also bear teste on the said first Monday in August, as though a session of the said court was holden on that day; and it shall be the duty of the Clerk of the Supreme Court to attend the said justice on the said first Monday of August, in each and every year, who shall make due entry of all such matters and things as shall or may be ordered as aforesaid by the said justice; and at each and every such August session, all actions, pleas, and other proceedings relative to any cause, civil or criminal, shall be continued over to the ensuing February session.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all actions, suits, process, pleadings, and other proceedings, of what nature or kind soever, civil or criminal, which were continued from the Supreme Court of the United States, which was begun and holden on the first Monday of December last, to the next court to have been holden on the first Monday of June, under the act which passed on the thirteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States;" and all writs, process, and proceedings, as aforesaid, which are or may be made returnable to the same June session, shall be continued, returned to, and have day in the session to be holden by this act, on the first Monday of August next; and such proceedings shall be had thereon, as is hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the districts of the United States (excepting the districts of Maine, Kentucky, and Tennessee) shall be formed into six circuits, in manner following:

The districts of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, shall constitute the first circuit;

The districts of Connecticut, New York, and Vermont, shall constitute the second circuit;

The districts of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, shall constitute the third circuit;

The districts of Maryland and Delaware, shall constitute the fourth circuit;

The districts of Virginia and North Carolina, shall constitute the fifth circuit;

And the districts of South Carolina and Georgia, shall constitute the sixth circuit.

And there shall be holden annually in each district of the said circuits two courts, which shall be called circuit courts. In the first circuit, the said circuit court shall consist of the justice of the Supreme Court residing within the said circuit; and the district judge of the district where such court shall be holden. And the sessions of the said court, in the district of New Hampshire, shall commence on the nineteenth day of May, and the second day of November, annually; in the district of Massachusetts, on the first day of June, and the twentieth day of October, annually; in the district of Rhode Island, on the fifteenth day of June, and the fifteenth day of November, annually.

In the second circuit, the said circuit court shall consist of the senior associate justice of the Supreme Court residing within the fifth circuit, and the district judge of the district, where such court shall be holden.

And the sessions of the said court in the district of Connecticut, shall commence on the thirteenth day of April, and the seventeenth day of September, annually; in the district of New York, on the first day of April, and the first day of September, annually; in the district of Vermont, on the first day of May, and the third day of October, annually.

In the third circuit, the said circuit court shall consist of the justice of the Supreme Court residing within the said circuit, and the district judge of the district where such court shall be holden; and the sessions of the said court, in the district of New Jersey, shall commence on the first day of April, and the first day of October, annually; in the district of Pennsylvania, on the eleventh day of April, and the eleventh day of October, annually.

In the fourth circuit, the said circuit court shall consist of the justice of the Supreme Court residing within the said circuit, and the district judge of the district where such court shall be holden; and the sessions of the said court in the district of Delaware, shall commence on the third day of June, and the twenty-seventh day of October, annually; in the district of Maryland, on the first day of May, and the seventh day of November, annually; to be holden hereafter at the city of Baltimore only.

In the fifth circuit, the circuit court shall consist of the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and the district judge of the district where such court shall be holden; and the sessions of the said court in the district of Virginia, shall commence on the twenty-second day of May, and the twenty-second day of November, annually; in the district of North Carolina, on the fifteenth day of June, and the twenty-ninth day of December, annually.

In the sixth circuit, the said circuit court shall consist of the junior associate justice of the Supreme Court in the fifth circuit, and the district judge of the district where such court shall be holden; and the sessions of the said court in the district of South Carolina shall commence at Charleston on the twentieth day of May, and at Columbia on the twentieth day of November, annually; in the district of Georgia, on the sixth day of May at Savannah, and on the fourteenth day of December hereafter at Louisville, annually: Provided, That, when only one of the judges hereby directed to hold the circuit courts shall attend, such circuit court may be held by the judge so attending: and that when any of the said days shall happen on a Sunday, then the said court hereby directed to be holden on such day, shall be holden on the next day thereafter; and the circuit courts, constituted by this act, shall be held at the same place or places in each district of every circuit, as by law they were respectively required to be held previous to the thirteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, excepting as is hereinbefore directed. And none of the said courts shall be holden until after the first day of July next; and the clerk of each district court shall be also clerk of the circuit court in such district, except as is hereinafter excepted.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That on every appointment which shall be hereafter made of a chief justice or associate justice, the said chief justice and associate justices shall allot themselves among the aforesaid circuits as they shall think fit, and shall enter such allotment on record. And in case no such allotment shall be made by them at their session next succeeding such appointment, and also after the appointment of any judge, as aforesaid, and before any allotment shall have been made, it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States to make such allotment as he shall deem proper, which allotment, made in either case, shall be binding, until another allotment shall be made; and the circuit courts constituted by this act, shall have all the power, authority, and jurisdiction within the several districts of their respective circuits, that, before the thirteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, belonged to the circuit courts of the United States; and in all cases which, by appeal or writ of error, are, or shall be, removed from a district to a circuit court, judgment shall be rendered in conformity to the opinion of the judge of the Supreme Court presiding in such circuit court.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That whenever any question shall occur before a circuit court upon which the opinions of the judges shall be opposed, the point upon which the disagreement shall happen, shall, during the same term, upon the request of either party, or their counsel, be stated under the direction of the judges, and certified under the seal of the court, to the Supreme Court, at their next session to be held thereafter; and shall, by the said court, be finally decided. And the decision of the Supreme Court, and their order in the premises, shall be remitted to the circuit court, and be there entered of record, and shall have effect according to the nature of the said judgment and order: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the cause from proceeding, if, in the opinion of the court, farther proceedings can be had, without prejudice to the merits: And provided, also, That imprisonment shall not be allowed, nor punishment in any case be inflicted, where the judges of the said court are divided in opinion upon the question touching the said imprisonment or punishment.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the district of North Carolina shall be divided into three districts, one to consist of all that part thereof which, by the laws of the State of North Carolina, now forms the districts of Edenton and Halifax, which district shall be called the district of Albemarle, and a district court in and for the same shall be holden at Edenton by the district judge of North Carolina, on the third Tuesday in April, on the third Tuesday in August, and on the third Tuesday in December, in each and every year; one other to be called the district of Pamptico, and to consist of all that part of North Carolina which, by the laws of the said State, now forms the districts of Newbern and Hillsborough, together with all that part of the district of Wilmington which lies to the northward and eastward of New river; for which district of Pamptico, a district court shall be holden at Newbern, by the district judge last aforesaid, on the second Tuesday in April, on the second Tuesday in August, and on the second Tuesday in December in each and every year; and one other, to consist of the remaining part of the said district of North Carolina, and to be called the district of Cape Fear, in and for which a district court shall be holden at Wilmington by the district judge last aforesaid, on the first Tuesday in April, on the first Tuesday in August, and on the first Tuesday in December, in each and every year; which said district courts, hereby directed to be holden, shall respectively have and exercise, within their several districts, the same powers, authority, and jurisdiction, which are vested, by law, in the district courts of the United States.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the circuit court and district courts for the district of North Carolina shall appoint clerks for the said courts respectively, which clerks shall reside and keep the records of the said courts at the places of holding the courts whereto they shall respectively belong, and shall perform the same duties and be entitled to and receive the same emoluments and fees, respectively, which are by law established for the clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States respectively.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all actions, causes, pleas, process, and other proceedings relative to any cause, civil or criminal, which shall be returnable to, or depending in the several circuit or district courts of the United States on the first day of July next, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, respectively transferred, returned and continued to the several circuit and district courts constituted by this act, at the times hereinbefore and hereinafter appointed for the holding of each of the said courts, and shall be heard, tried, and determined therein in the same manner and with the same effect, as if no change had been made in the said courts. And it shall be the duty of the clerk of each and every court hereby constituted, to receive and to take into his safe-keeping the writs, process, pleas, proceedings, and papers, of all those causes and actions which, by this act, shall be transferred, returned, or continued to such court, and also all the records and office papers of every kind respectively belonging to the courts abolished by the repeal of the act, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," and from which the said causes shall have been transferred as aforesaid.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all suits, process, pleadings, and other proceedings, of what nature or kind soever, depending in the circuit court in the district of Ohio, and which shall have been, or may hereafter be commenced within the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, in the said court, shall, from and after the first day of July next, be continued over, returned, and made cognizable, in the superior court of the said Territory next thereafter to be holden, and all actions, suits, process, pleadings, and other proceedings, as aforesaid depending in the circuit court of the said district, and which shall have been or may hereafter be commenced within the Indiana Territory, in said court, shall, from and after the first day of July next, be continued over, returned and made cognizable in the superior court of the said Indiana Territory, next thereafter to be holden.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That in all cases in which proceedings shall, on the said first day of July next, be pending under a commission of bankruptcy issued in pursuance of the aforesaid act, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," the cognizance of the same shall be, and hereby is, transferred to, and vested in, the district judge of the district within which such commission shall have issued, who is hereby empowered to proceed therein, in the same manner and to the same effect, as if such commission of bankruptcy had been issued by his order.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of July next, the district judges of Kentucky and Tennessee shall be, and hereby are, severally entitled to a salary of fifteen hundred dollars annually, to be paid quarter yearly at the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the marshals and attorneys of the United States, for the districts which were not divided, or within the limits of which new districts were not erected by the act entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," passed the thirteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, shall continue to be marshals and attorneys for such districts respectively, unless removed by the President of the United States, and in all other districts which were divided or within the limits of which new districts were erected by the last recited act, the President of the United States be, and hereby is, empowered from and after the first day of July next to discontinue all such supernumerary marshals and district attorneys of the United States in such districts, respectively, as he shall deem expedient, so that there shall be but one marshal and district attorney to each district; and every marshal and district attorney who shall be continued in office, or appointed by the President of the United States in such districts, shall have and exercise the same powers, perform the same duties, give the same bond with sureties, take the same oath, be subject to the same penalties and regulations as are, or may be prescribed by law, in respect to the marshals and district attorneys of the United States. And every marshal and district attorney who shall be so discontinued as aforesaid shall be holden to deliver over all papers, matters, and things, in relation to their respective offices, to such marshals and district attorneys, respectively, who shall be so continued or appointed as aforesaid in such district, in the same manner as is required by law in cases of resignation or removal from office.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, from time to time, as many general commissioners of bankruptcy, in each district of the United States, as he may deem necessary; and upon petition to the judge of a district court for a commission of bankruptcy, he shall proceed as is provided in and by an act, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," and appoint, not exceeding three of the said general commissioners as commissioners of the particular bankrupt petitioned against; and the said commissioners, together with the clerk, shall each be allowed, as a full compensation for their services, when sitting and acting under their commissions, at the rate of six dollars per day for every day which they may be employed in the same business, to be apportioned among the several causes on which they may act on the same day, and to be paid out of the respective bankrupt's estates: Provided, That the commissioners, who may have been, or may be appointed in any district before notice shall be given of the appointment of commissioners for such district by the President in pursuance of this act, and who shall not then have completed their business, shall be authorized to proceed and finish the same upon the terms of their original appointment.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the stated session of the district court, for the district of Virginia, heretofore directed to be holden in the city of Williamsburg, shall be holden in the town of Norfolk, from and after the first day of July next; and the stated sessions of the district court for the district of Maryland, shall hereafter be holden in the city of Baltimore only; and in the district of Georgia, the stated sessions of the district court shall be held in the city of Savannah only.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That for the better establishment of the courts of the United States within the State of Tennessee, the said State shall be divided in two districts, one to consist of that part of said State, which lies on the east side of Cumberland mountain, and to be called the district of East Tennessee, the other to consist of the remaining part of said State, and to be called the district of West Tennessee.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the district judge of the United States, who shall hereafter perform the duties of district judge, within the State of Tennessee, shall annually hold four sessions, two at Knoxville, on the fourth Monday of April, and the fourth Monday of October, in and for the district of East Tennessee, and two at Nashville, on the fourth Monday of May, and the fourth Monday of November, in and for the district of West Tennessee.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a clerk for each of the said districts of East and West Tennessee, to be appointed by the judge thereof, who shall reside and keep the records of the said courts at the places of holding the courts, whereto they respectively shall belong, and shall perform the same duties, and be entitled to, and receive the same emoluments and fees which are established by law for the clerks of the district courts for the United States, respectively.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed, in and for each of the districts of East and West Tennessee, a marshal, whose duty it shall be to attend the district courts hereby established, and who shall have and exercise within such district, the same powers, perform the same duties, be subject to the same penalties, give the same bond with sureties, take the same oath, be entitled to the same allowance, as a full compensation for all extra services, as hath heretofore been allowed to the marshal of the district of Tennessee, by a law, passed the twenty-eighth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, and shall receive the same compensation and emoluments, and in all respects be subject to the same regulations as are now prescribed by law, in respect to the marshals of the United States heretofore appointed: Provided, That the marshals of the districts of East and West Tennessee, now in office, shall, during the periods for which they have been appointed, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States, be and continue marshals for the several districts hereby established, within which they respectively reside.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed, for each of the districts of East and West Tennessee, a person learned in the law, to act as attorney for the United States within such district; which attorney shall take an oath or affirmation for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, and shall prosecute, in such district, all delinquencies, for crimes and offences, cognizable under the authority of the United States, and all civil actions or suits, in which the United States shall be concerned; and shall be entitled to the same allowance, as a full compensation for all extra services, as hath heretofore been allowed to attorneys of the district of Tennessee, by a law passed the twenty-eighth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, and shall receive such compensation, emoluments, and fees, as by law are or shall be allowed to the district attorneys of the United States, respectively: Provided, That the district attorneys of East and West Tennessee, now in office, shall severally and respectively be attorneys for those districts, within which they reside, until removed by the President of the United States.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That all actions, suits, process, pleadings, and proceedings, of what nature or kind soever, which shall be depending or existing in the sixth circuit of the United States, within the circuit courts of the districts of East and West Tennessee, shall be, and hereby are, continued over to the district courts established by this act, in manner following, that is to say: All such as shall on the first day of July next be depending and undetermined, or shall then have been commenced, and made returnable before the circuit court of East Tennessee, to the next district court hereby directed to be holden within and for the district of East Tennessee; all such as shall be depending and undetermined, or shall have been commenced and made returnable before the circuit court of West Tennessee, to the next district court hereby directed to be holden within and for the district of West Tennessee; and all the said suits shall be equally regular and effectual, and shall be proceeded in in the same manner as they could have been if the law authorizing the establishment of the sixth circuit of the United States had not been repealed.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That the next session of the district court for the district of Maine shall be holden on the last Tuesday in May next; and that the session of the said court, heretofore holden on the third Tuesday of June, annually, shall hereafter be holden, annually, on the last Tuesday in May.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That all writs and process which shall have been issued, and all recognizances returnable, and all suits and other proceedings which have been continued to the said district court on the third Tuesday in June next, shall be returned and held continued to the said last Tuesday of May next.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That the chief judge of the district of Columbia shall hold a district court of the United States, in and for the said district, on the first Tuesday of April and on the first Tuesday of October in every year; which court shall have and exercise, within the said district, the same powers and jurisdiction which are by law vested in the district courts of the United States.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That in all suits in equity, it shall be in the discretion of the court, upon the request of either party, to order the testimony of the witnesses therein to be taken by depositions; which depositions shall be taken in conformity to the regulations prescribed by law for courts of the highest original jurisdiction in equity, in cases of a similar nature, in that State in which the court of the United States may be holden: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall extend to the circuit courts which may be holden in those States in which testimony in chancery is not taken by deposition.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a clerk for the district court of Norfolk, to be appointed by the judge thereof, which clerk shall reside and keep the records of the said court at Norfolk, aforesaid, and shall perform the same duties, and be entitled to and receive the same fees and emoluments, which are established by law for the clerks of the district courts of the United States.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of July next, there shall be holden, annually, in the district of Vermont, two stated sessions of the district court, which shall commence on the tenth day of October at Rutland, and on the seventh day of May at Windsor, in each year; and when either of the said days shall happen on a Sunday, the said court, hereby directed to be holden on such day, shall be holden on the day next thereafter.

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That the act, entitled "An act altering the time of holding the district court in Vermont," and so much of the second section of the act, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Vermont," as provides for the holding four sessions, annually, of the said district court in said district, from and after the first day of July next, be, and hereby are, repealed.

SEC. 29. And be it further enacted, That the clerk of the said district court shall not issue a process to summon, or cause to be returned to any session of the said district court, a grand jury, unless by special order of the district judge, and at the request of the district attorney; nor shall he cause to be summoned or returned a petit jury to such sessions of the said district court, in which there shall appear to be no issue proper for the trial by jury, unless by special order of the judge, as aforesaid. And it shall be the duty of the circuit court in the district of Vermont, at their stated sessions, to give in charge to the grand juries all crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, as are cognizable, as well in the said district court as the said circuit court; and such bills of indictment as shall be found in the circuit court, and cognizable in the said district court, shall, at the discretion of the said circuit court, be transmitted by the clerk of the said court, pursuant to the order of the said circuit court, with all matters and things relating thereto, to the district court next thereafter to be holden in said district, and the same proceedings shall be had thereon in said district court as though said bill of indictment had originated and been found in the said district court. And all recognizances of witnesses, taken by any magistrate in said district, for their appearance to testify in any case cognizable in either of the said courts, shall be to the circuit court next thereafter to be holden in said district.

SEC. 30. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, no special juries shall be returned by the clerks of any of the said circuit courts; but that, in all cases in which it was the duty of the said clerks to return special uries before the passing of this act, it shall be the duty of the marshal for the district where such circuit court may be held to return special juries, in the same manner and form, as, by the laws of the respective States, the said clerks were required to return the same.

An Act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the duties on merchandise and tonnage as, together with the moneys, other than surplusses of revenue, which now constitute the sinking fund, or shall accrue to it by virtue of any provisions heretofore made, and together with the sums annually required to discharge the annual interest and charges accruing on the present debt of the United States, including temporary loans heretofore obtained, and also future loans which may be made for reimbursing, or redeeming, any instalments, or parts of the principal of the said debts, will amount to an annual sum of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars, be, and the same hereby is, yearly appropriated to the said fund; and the said sums are hereby declared to be vested in the commissioners of the sinking fund, in the same manner as the moneys heretofore appropriated to the said fund, to be applied by the said commissioners to the payment of interest and charges, and to the reimbursement or redemption of the principal of the public debt, and shall be and continue appropriated until the whole of the present debt of the United States, and the loans which may be made for reimbursing or redeeming any parts or instalments of the principal of the said debt, shall be reimbursed and redeemed: Provided, That after the whole of the said debt, the old six per cent. stock, the deferred stock, the seventeen hundred and ninety-six six per cent. stock, and three per cent. stock, excepted, shall have been reimbursed or redeemed, any balance of the sums annually appropriated by this act, which may remain unexpended at the end of six months next succeeding the end of the calendar year to which such annual appropriation refers, shall be carried to the surplus fund, and cease to be vested by virtue of this act in the commissioners of the sinking fund, and the appropriation, so far as relates to such unexpended balance, shall cease and determine.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury annually, and in each year, to cause to be paid, to the commissioners of the sinking fund the said sum of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars, in such payments, and at such times, in each year, as the situation of the Treasury will permit: Provided, That all such payments as may be necessary to enable the said commissioners to discharge or reimburse any demands against the United States, on account of the principal or interest of the debt, which shall be actually due, in conformity to the engagements of the said States, shall be made at such time and times in each year, as will enable the said commissioners faithfully and punctually to comply with such engagement.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all reimbursements of the capital or principal of the present debt of the United States, including future loans which may be made for reimbursing or redeeming any instalments, or parts of the same, and all payments on account of the interest and charges accruing upon the said debt, shall be made under the superintendence of the commissioners of the sinking fund. And it shall be the duty of the said commissioners to cause to be applied and paid out of the said fund, yearly and every year, at the Treasury of the United States, the several and respective sums following, to wit: first, such sum and sums as, by virtue of any act or acts, they have heretofore been directed to apply and to pay; secondly, such sum and sums as may be annually wanted to discharge the annual interest and charges accruing on any other part of the present debt of the United States, including the interest and charges which may accrue on future loans which may be made for reimbursing or redeeming any instalments or parts of the principal of the said debt; thirdly, such sum and sums as may annually be required to discharge any instalment or part of the principal of the present debt of the United States, and of any future loans which may be made for reimbursing or discharging the same, which shall be actually due and demandable, and which shall not, by virtue of this or any other act, be renewed or prolonged, or reimbursed, out of the proceeds of a new loan: and, also, it shall be the duty of the said commissioners to cause to be applied the surplus of such fund as may at any time exist, after satisfying the purposes aforesaid, towards the further and final redemption, by payment or purchase, of the present debt of the United States, including loans for the reimbursement thereof, temporary loans heretofore obtained from the Bank of the United States, and those demands against the United States, under any treaty or convention with a foreign Power, for the payment of which the faith of the United States has been, or may hereafter be, pledged by Congress: Provided, however, That the whole or any part of such demands, arising under a treaty or convention with a foreign Power, and of such temporary loans, may, at any time, be reimbursed, either out of the sinking fund, or, if the situation of the Treasury will permit, out of any other moneys which have been, or may hereafter be, appropriated to that purpose.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the commissioners of the sinking fund be, and they hereby are, empowered, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to borrow on the credit of the United States, either in America, or abroad, by obtaining a prolongation of former loans, or otherwise, the sums requisite for the payment of the instalments or parts of principal of the Dutch debt, which become due in the years one thousand eight hundred and three, one thousand eight hundred and four, one thousand eight hundred and five, and one thousand eight hundred and six; and that a sum equivalent to that to be thus borrowed, or reloaned, shall be laid out by the commissioners of the sinking fund, in the purchase or redemption of such parts of the present debt of the United States, and other demands against them, as the commissioners of the sinking fund may lawfully pay, agreeably to the provisions herein before made, and as the said commissioners shall, in their judgment, deem most expedient, so as to effect the payment, annually, of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars towards the final discharge of the whole debt, agreeably to such provision: Provided, That the United States shall have a right to reimburse any loan thus made within six years after the date of the same, and that the rate of interest thereupon shall not exceed five per centum per annum, nor the charges thereon the rate of five per centum on the capital borrowed: And provided, always, That the power herein given shall not be construed to repeal, diminish, or affect the power given to the said commissioners, by the tenth section of the act, entitled "An act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt, to borrow certain sums for the discharge of the instalments of the capital, or principal, of the public debt, in the manner and on the terms prescribed by the said section; nor the power given to them by an act, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of certain debts of the United States," to borrow certain sums and to sell the shares of the Bank of the United States, belonging to the United States, in the manner, on the terms, and for the purposes authorized by the said act: And provided, further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to revive any act, or part of an act, authorizing the loan of money, and which hath heretofore expired.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of more effectually securing the reimbursement of the Dutch debt, the commissioners of the sinking fund may and they hereby are empowered, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to contract either with the Bank of the United States, or with any other public institution, or with individuals, for the payment, in Holland, of the whole, or any part, of the principal of the said Dutch debt, and of the interest and charges accruing on the same, as the said demands become due, on such terms as the said commissioners shall think most advantageous to the United States; or to employ either the said bank, or any other public institution, or any individual or individuals, as agent or agents, for the purpose of purchasing bills of exchange, or any other kind of remittances, for the purpose of discharging the interest and principal of said debt; and to allow to such agent or agents a compensation not exceeding one-fourth of one per cent., on the remittance thus purchased or procured by them under the direction of the said commissioners; and as much of the duties on tonnage and merchandise as may be necessary for that purpose is hereby appropriated towards paying the extra allowance or commission resulting from such transaction, or transactions, and also to pay any deficiency arising from any loss incurred upon any remittance purchased or procured under the direction of the said commissioners, for the purpose of discharging the principal and interest of the said debt.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the commissioners of the sinking fund be, and they hereby are, empowered, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to employ, if they shall deem it necessary, an agent in Europe for the purpose of transacting any business relative to the discharge of the Dutch debt, and to the loans authorized by this, or any other act, for the purpose of discharging the same, and also to allow him a compensation not exceeding three thousand dollars a year, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to repeal, alter, or affect any of the provisions of any former act pledging the faith of the United States to the payment of the interest, or principal of the public debt; and that all such payments shall continue to be made at the time heretofore prescribed by law; and the surplus only of the appropriations made by this act, beyond the sums payable by virtue of the provisions of any former act, shall be applicable to the reimbursement, redemption, or purchase of the public debt in the manner provided by this act.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all the restrictions and regulations heretofore established by law, for regulating the execution of the duties enjoined upon the commissioners of the sinking fund, shall apply to and be in as full force for the execution of the analogous duties enjoined by this act, as if they were herein particularly repeated and re-enacted: Provided, however, That the particular annual account of all sales of stock, of loans, and of payments, by them made, shall, hereafter, be laid before Congress on the first week of February in each year; and so much of any former act as directed such account to be laid before Congress within fourteen days after their meeting, is hereby repealed.

Approved, April 29, 1802.

An Act for the relief of the widows and orphans of certain persons who have died in the Naval service of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the widows, if any such there be, and, in case there be no widow, the child or children of the officers, seamen, and marines, who were in the service of the United States, and lost in the ship Insurgent and brigantine Pickering, shall be entitled to, and receive, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to four months' pay of their respective husbands or fathers, as aforesaid.

Approved, April 29, 1802.

An act to regulate and fix the compensation of the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Be it enacted, &c., That the officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, hereinafter mentioned, shall be, and hereby are, entitled to receive, in lieu of their compensations as fixed by law, the following sums; that is to say: The Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, two thousand dollars each; their principal clerks, one thousand three hundred dollars each; and each of their engrossing clerks, one thousand dollars per annum.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, who also performs the duty of Doorkeeper, and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives shall, be, and hereby are, entitled to receive eight hundred dollars per annum, each.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives shall be, and hereby is, entitled to receive five hundred dollars per annum, and two dollars per day, during each session of Congress; and the Assistant Doorkeeper of the Senate and House of Representatives, four hundred and fifty dollars per annum, each; and two dollars each, per day, during each session of Congress.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the compensations to the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and to their clerks, and to the other officers herein named, shall commence with the present year.

Approved, April 29, 1802.

An Act supplementary to an act, entitled "An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the time therein mentioned," and extending the benefits thereof to the art of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.

Be it enacted, &c., That every person who shall, from and after the first day of January next, claim to be the author or proprietor of any maps, charts, book or books, and shall thereafter seek to obtain a copyright of the same, agreeable to the rules prescribed by law, before he shall be entitled to the benefit of the act, entitled "An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the time therein mentioned," he shall, in addition to the requisites enjoined in the third and fourth sections of said act, if a book or books, give information by causing the copy of the record, which, by said act, he is required to publish in one or more of the newspapers, to be inserted at full length in the title page or in the page immediately following the title of every such book or books; and if a map or chart, shall cause the following words to be impressed on the face thereof, viz: "Entered according to the act of Congress, the — day of —, 18—, [here insert the date when the same was deposited in the office,] by A. B. of the State of —, [here insert the author's or proprietor's name, and the State in which he resides.]"

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of January next, every person being a citizen of the United States, or resident within the same, who shall invent and design, en-grave, etch or work, or, from his own works and inventions, shall cause to be designed and engraved, etched or worked, any historical or other print or prints, shall have the sole right and liberty of printing, reprinting, publishing, and vending such print or prints, for the term of fourteen years from the recording the title thereof in the clerk's office, as prescribed by law for maps, charts, book or books: Provided, he shall perform all the requisites in relation to such print or prints, as are directed in relation to maps, charts, book or books, in the third and fourth sections of the act to which this is a supplement, and shall moreover cause the same entry to be truly engraved on such plate, with the name of the proprietor, and printed on every such print or prints as is hereinbefore required to be made on maps or charts.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any printseller or other person whatsoever, from and after the said first day of January next, within the time limited by this act, shall engrave, etch, or work, as aforesaid, or in any other manner copy or sell, or cause to be engraved, etched, copied or sold, in the whole or in part, by varying, adding to, or diminishing from the main design, or shall print, reprint, or import for sale, or cause to be printed, reprinted, or imported for sale, any such print or prints, or any parts thereof, without the consent of the proprietor or proprietors thereof, first had and obtained, in writing, signed by him or them respectively, in the presence of two or more credible witnesses; or, knowing the same to be so printed or reprinted, without the consent of the proprietor or proprietors, shall publish, sell, or expose to sale or otherwise, or in any other manner dispose of any such print or prints, without such consent first had and obtained, as aforesaid, then such offender or offenders shall forfeit the plate or plates on which such print or prints are or shall be copied, and all and every sheet or sheets (being part of, or whereon, such print or prints are or shall be copied or printed) to the proprietor or proprietors of such original print or prints, who shall forthwith destroy the same; and further, that every such offender or offenders shall forfeit one dollar for every print which shall be found in his, her, or their custody; either printed, published, or exposed to sale, or otherwise disposed of, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act; the one moiety thereof to any person who shall sue for the same, and the other moiety thereof to and for the use of the United States, to be recovered in any court having competent jurisdiction thereof.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons, from and after the passing of this act, shall print or publish any map, chart, book or books, print or prints, who have not legally acquired the copyright of such map, chart, book or books, print or prints, and shall, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, insert therein, or impress thereon that the same has been entered according to act of Congress, or words purporting the same, or purporting that the copyright thereof has been acquired; every person so offending, shall forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred dollars, one moiety thereof to the person who shall sue for the same, and the other moiety thereof to, and for the use of the United States, to be recovered by action of debt in any court of record in the United States having cognizance thereof. Provided always, That in every case for forfeitures hereinbefore given, the action be commenced within two years from the time the cause of action may have arisen.

Approved, April 29, 1802.

An Act to amend "An act to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage; and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the thirtieth day of June, in the present year, there shall be paid, annually, to the collector of the customs for the district of Richmond, in addition to the fees and emoluments otherwise allowed by law, the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the said thirtieth day of June, the salary heretofore allowed by law to the collector of the customs for the district of Petersburg be, and the same hereby is, discontinued.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the said thirtieth day of June, whenever the annual emoluments of any collector of the customs, after deducting therefrom the expenditures incident to his office, shall amount to more than five thousand dollars; or those of a naval officer, after a like deduction, to more than three thousand five hundred dollars; or those of a surveyor, after a like deduction, to more than three thousand dollars, the surplus shall be accounted for, and be paid by them, respectively, to the Treasury of the United States. Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend to fines, forfeitures, and penalties, under the revenue laws of the United States.

Approved, April 30, 1802.

An Act to suspend, in part, the act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins; and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the act entitled, "An act for regulating foreign coins; and for other purposes," as is contained within the second section thereof, be, and the same is hereby suspended, for and during the space of three years, from and after the end of the present session of Congress.

Approved, April 30, 1802.

An Act to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An Act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes."

Be it enacted, &c., That the act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," approved April 18, 1796, shall be, and the same is hereby, revived and continued in force, until the fourth day of March next, and no longer.

Approved, April 30, 1802.

An Act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States; and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the inhabitants of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and to assume such name as they shall deem proper; and the said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union, upon the same footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: bounded on the east by the Pennsylvania line, on the south by the Ohio river, to the mouth of the Great Miami river, on the west by the line drawn due north from the mouth of the Great Miami, aforesaid, and on the north by an east and west line, drawn through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, running east after intersecting the due north line aforesaid, from the mouth of the Great Miami, until it shall intersect Lake Erie, or the territorial line, and thence with the same through Lake Erie to the Pennsylvania line, aforesaid: Provided, That Congress shall be at liberty at any time hereafter, either to attach all the territory lying east of the line to be drawn due north from the mouth of the Miami, aforesaid, to the territorial line, and north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, running east as aforesaid to Lake Erie, to the aforesaid State, or dispose of it otherwise, in conformity to the fifth article of compact between the original States, and the people and States to be formed in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all that part of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, heretofore included in the eastern division of said Territory, and not included within the boundary herein prescribed for the said State, is hereby attached to, and made a part of the Indiana Territory, from and after the formation of the said State, subject nevertheless to be hereafter disposed of by Congress, according to the right reserved in the fifth article of the ordinance aforesaid, and the inhabitants therein shall be entitled to the same privileges and immunities, and subject to the same rules and regulations, in all respects whatever, with all other citizens residing within the Indiana Territory.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all male citizens of the United States, who shall have arrived at full age, and resided within the said Territory at least one year previous to the day of election, and shall have paid a Territorial or county tax, and all persons having in other respects, the legal qualifications to vote for representatives in the General Assembly of the Territory, be, and they are hereby, authorized to choose representatives to form a convention, who shall be apportioned amongst the several counties within the eastern division aforesaid, in a ratio of one representative to every twelve hundred inhabitants of each county, according to the enumeration taken under the authority of the United States, as near as may be, that is to say: from the county of Trumbull, two representatives; from the county of Jefferson, seven representatives, two of the seven to be elected within what is now known by the county of Belmont, taken from Jefferson and Washington, counties; from the county of Washington, four representatives; from the county of Ross, seven representatives, two of the seven to be elected in what is now known by Fairfield county, taken from Ross and Washington counties; from the county of Adams, three representatives; from the county of Hamilton, twelve representatives, two of the twelve to be elected in what is now known by Clermont county, taken entirely from Hamilton county; and the elections for the representatives aforesaid, shall take place on the second Tuesday of October next, the time fixed by a law of the Territory, entitled, "An act to ascertain the number of free male inhabitants of the age of twenty-one, in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, and to regulate the elections of representatives for the same," for electing representatives to the General Assembly, and shall be held and conducted in the same manner as is provided by the aforesaid act, except that the qualifications of electors shall be as herein specified.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the members of the convention, thus duly elected, be, and they are hereby, authorized to meet at Chillicothe on the first Monday in November next; which convention, when met, shall first determine, by a majority of the whole number elected, whether it be or be not expedient at that time to form a constitution and State government for the people, within the said Territory, and if it be determined to be expedient, the convention shall be, and hereby are, authorized to form a constitution and State government, or, if it be deemed more expedient, the said convention shall provide by ordinance for electing representatives to form a constitution or frame of government; which said representatives shall be chosen in such manner, and in such proportion, and shall meet at such time and place, as shall be prescribed by the said ordinance; and shall form for the people of the said State a constitution and State government: Provided, The same shall be republican, and not repugnant to the ordinance of the thirteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, between the original States and the people and States of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, until the next general census shall be taken, the said State shall be entitled to one representative in the House of Representatives of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the convention of the eastern State of the said Territory, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory upon the United States:

First, That the section number sixteen, in every township, and where such section has been sold, granted, or disposed of, other lands equivalent thereto, and most contiguous to the same, shall be granted to the inhabitants of such township, for the use of schools.

Second, That the six miles reservation, including the salt springs, commonly called the Sciota salt springs, the salt springs near the Muskingum river, and in the military tract, with the sections of land which include the same, shall be granted to the said State for the use of the people thereof, the same to be used under such terms, and conditions, and regulations, as the Legislature of the said State shall direct: Provided, The said Legislature shall never sell nor lease the same for a longer period than ten years.

Third, That one-twentieth part of the net proceeds of the lands lying within the said State, sold by Congress, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same, such roads to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass: Provided always, That the three foregoing propositions herein offered, are on the conditions that the convention of the said State shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable, without the consent of the United States, that every and each tract of land sold by Congress, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the day of sale.

Approved, April 30, 1802.

An Act to abolish the Board of Commissioners in the City of Washington, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the first day of June next, the offices of the commissioners appointed in virtue of an act passed on the sixteenth day of July, in the year seventeen hundred and ninety, entitled "An act to establish the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States," shall cease and determine; and the said commissioners shall deliver up unto such person as the President shall appoint, in virtue of this act, all plans, draughts, books, records, accounts; deeds, grants, contracts, bonds, obligations, securities, and other evidences of debt in their possession, which relate to the city of Washington, and the affairs heretofore under their superintendence or care.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the affairs of the city of Washington, which have heretofore been under the care and superintendence of the said commissioners, shall hereafter be under the direction of a superintendent, to be appointed by, and be under the control of, the President of the United States; and the said superintendent is hereby invested with all powers, and shall hereafter perform all duties which the said commissioners are now vested with, or are required to perform by, or in virtue of, any act of Congress, or any act of the General Assembly of Maryland, or any deed or deeds of trust from the original proprietors of the lots in the said city, or in any other manner whatsoever.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners shall forthwith settle, with the accounting officers of the Treasury, their accounts for all moneys received and expended by them in their capacity as commissioners, and shall immediately thereafter pay to the said superintendent any balance which may be found against them upon such settlement.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said superintendent shall pay all the debts heretofore contracted by the commissioners, in their capacity as such, the payments of which are not hereinafter specially provided for, out of any moneys received by him arising out of the city funds.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said superintendent shall, under the direction of the President of the United States, sell so many of those lots in the city of Washington which are pledged for the repayment of a loan of two hundred thousand dollars, made by the State of Maryland, in the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six and one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, to the commissioners, for the use of the said city, as may be sufficient to pay the interest already accrued on the said loan, and the interest and instalments thereof, as they may respectively become due: Provided, That if, in the opinion of the President of the United States, the sale of a sufficient number of the said lots, to meet the objects aforesaid, cannot be made without an unwarrantable sacrifice of the property, then so much money as may be necessary to provide for the deficiency is hereby appropriated, and shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the said superintendent shall, prior to the first day of November next, sell, under the directions of the President of the United States, all lots in the said city, which were sold antecedent to the sixth day of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, and which the said commissioners are authorized by law to resell, in consequence of a failure on the part of the purchasers to comply with their contracts; and the moneys arising thereupon shall be applied, on or before the first day of November next, to the payment of the sum of fifty thousand dollars, and the interest thereon, to the State of Maryland, which said sum was formerly loaned by the said State to the commissioners for the use of the city of Washington: Provided, That, if a sufficient sum to meet the objects last aforesaid, shall not be produced by the sale of the whole of the lots aforesaid, then so much money as may be necessary to provide for the deficiency is hereby appropriated, and shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States, not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, after the debts already contracted by the commissioners shall have been discharged, all moneys advanced out of the Treasury in pursuance of this act, shall be reimbursed by the superintendent, by paying into the Treasury all moneys arising from the city funds, until the whole sum advanced, with the interest thereon, shall be repaid.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act, entitled, "An act to establish the temporary and permanent seat of Government of the United States," passed on the sixteenth day of July, in the year seventeen hundred and ninety, as relates to the appointment of commissioners shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful to open books in the city of Washington, for receiving and entering subscriptions for opening the canal to communicate from the Potomac river to the Eastern Branch thereof, through the city of Washington, under the management of Thomas Tingey, Daniel Carroll of Duddington, Thomas Law, and Daniel Carroll Brent, which subscriptions shall be made personally, or by power of attorney; the said books shall be opened for receiving subscriptions, and continue open, until the sum of eighty thousand dollars shall be filled up, in shares of one hundred dollars each; and that each person shall, at the time of subscribing, pay down ten dollars, being one-tenth of each share; and after fourteen days previous notice, by advertisement, there shall be a meeting of the subscribers, and they are hereby declared to be incorporated into a company, by the name of the "Washington Canal Company," and may sue and be sued, as such, and make all necessary by-laws and regulations for the proper management of the business thereof: And such of the subscribers as shall be present at the said meeting, or a majority of them, are hereby empowered and required to elect a president and four directors, for conducting the said undertaking, and managing the said company's business, for and during such time, not exceeding three years, as the said subscribers, or a majority of them, shall think fit. Each member shall be allowed one vote for every share, by him or her held at the time in the said company; and any proprietor, by a writing under his or her hand, executed in presence of two witnesses, may depute any other member or proprietor to vote and act as proxy for him or her, at any general meeting.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the shares in the said company shall be deemed personal, and not real property, and transferable in such manner as the company shall direct.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors so elected, and their successors, or a majority of them, shall have full power and authority to agree with any person or persons, on behalf of the said company, to cut such canals, erect such locks, and perform such other works as they shall judge necessary for opening the canal aforesaid, and the forks thereof; and out of the moneys arising from the subscriptions, wharfage, and tolls, to pay for the same, and to repair and improve the said canal, locks, and other works necessary thereto, and to defray all incidental charges, and also to appoint a treasurer, clerk, and such other officers, toll gatherers, managers and servants, as they shall judge requisite, and to settle their respective wages.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the treasurer of the company shall give bond, with such penalty and such security as the said president and directors, or a majority of them, shall direct.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors, so elected, and their successors, or a majority of them assembled, shall have full power and authority to demand and receive of the proprietors, the remaining nine-tenths of the shares, from time to time, as they may be required by previous advertisement, at least one month in the Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria gazettes; and if any of the said proprietors shall refuse or neglect to pay their proportions within one month after the same so ordered and advertised, as aforesaid, the said shares of defaulters shall be forfeited.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors, so elected, and their successors, or a majority of them, shall not begin to collect wharfage or tolls, until the canal is made practicable for boats and scows to pass through the same, from the Potomac to the Eastern Branch.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That every president and director, before he acts as such, shall take an oath or affirmation for the faithful discharge of his office.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a general meeting of the proprietors on the first Monday in June, and the first Monday in December, every year, in the city of Washington; to which meeting the president and directors shall make a report, and render distinct and just accounts of all their proceedings, and, on finding them fairly and justly stated, the proprietors, then present, or a majority of them, shall give a certificate thereof; and at such half yearly general meetings, after leaving in the hands of the treasurer such sum as shall be judged necessary for repairs, improvements, or contingent charges, an equal dividend of all the net profits arising from the wharfage and tolls hereby granted, shall be ordered and made, to and among all the proprietors of, the said company, in proportion to their several shares.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That for and in consideration of the expenses the said proprietors shall incur, not only in cutting canals, but in erecting locks, and in maintaining and keeping the same in repair, and temporary enlargement and improvement of the same, that, for the space of fifty years, when the act shall cease on repayment of the principal of the sums expended, the company is hereby authorized to collect the same rates of wharfage, on all articles and materials landed on each side of the canal, as are now legally received at the wharves at Georgetown.

Acts of Congress.

And it shall and may be lawful for the said president and directors, for fifty years, and as much longer as their principal sums expended remain unpaid, to demand and to receive, at the most convenient place, for all commodities carried through a lock or locks of the canal, a toll not exceeding half a dollar on each loaded boat, and a quarter of a dollar on each loaded scow; but no toll to be charged returning. But when the wharfage shall produce the annual interest of eight per cent. on the sums expended by the president and directors, exclusive of the tolls, then the tolls shall cease, and the canal, and forks thereof, shall be entirely free for passage; and when the wharfage shall exceed the annual interest of twelve per cent., then the president and directors shall appropriate one-half of the surplus to such public purposes as Congress may direct, or reserve the same as a fund to pay off the principal: Provided, always, That all public property shall pass free of toll and wharfage.

SEC. 18. Provided, nevertheless, and be it further enacted, That in case the said Washington Canal Company, created by this act, shall not, within the term of five years, complete said canal in such manner as to admit boats drawing three feet of water to pass through the whole extent of said canal, that the said canal shall revert to the United States, and all right and authority hereby granted to the said company shall cease and determine.

Approved, May 1, 1802.

An Act to empower John James Dufour, and his associates, to purchase certain lands.

Be it enacted, &c., That, to encourage the introduction and to promote the culture of the vine within the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, it shall be lawful for John James Dufour, and his associates, to purchase any quantity not exceeding four sections of the lands of the United States, lying between the Great Miami river and the Indian boundary line, at the rate of two dollars per acre, payable without interest, on or before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the register of the land office, established at Cincinnati, to receive and to enter on his entry book, the applications of the said Dufour, and his associates, for any unappropriated sections, with the adjoining fractions, if any, not to exceed in the whole four sections, and lying within the district aforesaid: stating in each entry the date of application and the number of the section or fraction, township, and range applied for; and it shall also be the duty of the said register to deliver to the said Dufour, and his associates, a copy of each entry thus made; also a copy of the description or field notes, and of the plat of each tract, with a certificate stating that the same has been purchased under the authority of this act, at the rate of two dollars per acre, payable, without interest, on or before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That payment for said land may be made at the Treasury of the United States, or to the receiver of the land office at Cincinnati, either in specie, or in the evidences of the public debt of the United States, at the rates prescribed by an act, entitled "An act to authorize the receipt of evidences of the public debt in payment for lands of the United States," and a discount at the rate of six per cent. a year shall be allowed on any payments which shall be made before the same shall become due.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That on producing to the Secretary of the Treasury copies of the entries aforesaid, and of the plats of the tracts applied for, also the certificate of the register of the land office established at Cincinnati, that the same have been purchased in conformity to the provisions of this act, the President of the United States shall be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to issue letters patent in the usual form, unto the said Dufour, his associates, and their heirs, for the said lands; with condition expressed in the said letters patent, that, on failure to pay the purchase-money when the same shall become due, the lands therein described, with the improvements thereon, shall be deemed forfeited, and shall revert in the United States.

Approved, May 1, 1802.

An Act making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and two.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums, including any sum which may have been, and might be, expended during the present year, by virtue of any former appropriation, be, and the same are hereby, respectively appropriated, to defray the expenses of the Navy of the United States during the year one thousand eight hundred and two; that is to say:

For the pay and subsistence of the officers, the pay of the seamen, provisions and repairs, five hundred and eight thousand two hundred and twenty-six dollars.

For medicines, instruments, and hospital stores, ten thousand dollars.

For the purchase of ordnance and other military stores, twenty thousand dollars.

For salaries of superintendents of navy yards, storekeepers and clerks, store rent, hire of laborers, &c., twelve thousand dollars.

For the purchase and expense of transportation of timber, and other materials, including ordnance for the seventy-four gun ships, one hundred and ninety thousand five hundred and seventy-five dollars.

For the improvement of navy yards, docks, and wharves, fifty thousand dollars.

For contingencies, ten thousand dollars.

For the pay and subsistence, including provisions for those on shore, and forage for the staff of the marine corps, seventy-one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four dollars and forty cents.

For clothing for the same, fifteen thousand five hundred and nineteen dollars.

For military stores for the same, one thousand two hundred and twenty-four dollars and sixty cents.

For the quartermaster's department, comprising quarters for the officers, and barracks for the men at different stations, fuel, stationery, camp utensils, &c., seven thousand and sixty-one dollars.

For medicine, medical services, and hospital stores, one thousand dollars.

For officers' travelling expenses, armorer's and carpenter's bills, and other contingent expenses, two thousand five hundred and fifty dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the said several sums of money, hereinbefore specifically appropriated, and amounting together to the sum of nine hundred thousand dollars, as shall not have been expended by virtue of any former appropriation, shall be paid, first, out of any balance remaining unexpended of former appropriations for the support of the navy; and secondly, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated by law.

Approved, May 1, 1802.

An Act to extend and continue in force the provisions of an act entitled "An act giving a right of pre-emption to certain persons who have contracted with John Cleves Symmes, or his associates, for lands lying between the Miami rivers, in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio; and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That the several provisions of an act entitled "An act giving a right of pre-emption to certain persons who have contracted with John Cleves Symmes, or his associates, for lands lying between the Miami rivers in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio" shall be, and the same are hereby, continued in force until the first day of March next, subject to the modifications contained in this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the said act shall, and the same are, hereby extended to all persons claiming lands lying between the Miami rivers, and without the limits of Ludlow's survey, by purchase or contract made prior to the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred, with John Cleves Symmes, or his associates.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person claiming lands as aforesaid, either within or without the limits of Ludlow's survey, and who have not obtained a certificate of the right of pre-emption therefor, shall, on or before the first day of November next, give notice of the nature and extent of his claim, in manner prescribed by the second section of the said act. And the receiver of public moneys, and commissioners appointed under the fourth section of the said act, shall meet at Cincinnati, on the second Monday of November next, they having giving four weeks previous notice of such meeting in a public newspaper printed at Cincinnati, and shall then and there proceed to hear and finally decide upon all claims, of which notice has been given as aforesaid, and shall, in all matters relative thereto, govern themselves by the provisions of the said act. Vacancies in the said board of commissioners may be filled by the President of the United States alone. And the duties, powers, and emoluments, of the said commissioners, receiver of public moneys, and register of the land office at Cincinnati, and surveyor general, as prescribed by the said act, shall be, and the same are hereby, continued.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person who may have obtained, or who shall hereafter obtain, as aforesaid, a certificate of a right of pre-emption from the said commissioners, shall be allowed until the first day of January next, to make the first payment required for the lands described in such certificate, and shall, in all other respects relative thereto, conform to the several provisions of the said act.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be viewed, marked, and opened, such roads within the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, as in his opinion will serve to promote the sales of the public lands in future: Provided, That the whole sum to be expended on such roads shall not exceed six thousand dollars, and that the same shall be paid out of the moneys paid by purchasers of public lands on account of surveying expenses.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all the lands around Vincennes, on the Wabash, in the Indiana Territory, the Indian title to which hath been extinguished, shall be surveyed and laid off in the manner prescribed by the third section of an act, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act providing for the sales of lands of the United States in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and above the mouth of the Kentucky river,' under directions from the Secretary of the Treasury, and by such person or persons as the President of the United States alone shall appoint for that purpose: Provided, That the whole expense of surveying and marking the lines shall not exceed four dollars for every mile that actually shall be run, surveyed, and marked. And two plats of lands aforesaid shall be prepared by the person or persons who may survey the same, who shall also designate thereon the bounds of the lands of individuals held under reservations of the State of Virginia, or under the laws of the United States: one of the said plats shall be returned to the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the other shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Indiana Territory.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where any section or fractional section of land lying within the seven ranges of townships has been sold prior to the tenth day of May, one thousand eight hundred, under the authority of the United States, the lines of such section or fractional section, shall be run under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the manner most consistent with the supposed boundaries of the same, at the time of the sale; anything in the act of the tenth of May, one thousand eight hundred, to the contrary notwithstanding. And it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever lines thus run shall interfere with the claim of a purchaser of public lands under the last mentioned act, to permit such purchaser, if he shall desire it, at any time within six months, after such lines, thus interfering with his claim, shall have been run to withdraw his former application, and to apply in lieu thereof for any other vacant section.

Approved, May 1, 1802.

An act to provide for the establishment of certain districts, and therein to amend an act, entitled, "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;" and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the last day of June next, a district shall be formed from the district of Yorktown, in Virginia, to be called the district of East River, which shall comprehend the waters, shores, harbors, and inlets of North and East River, and Mobjack bay, and all other navigable waters, shores, harbors, and inlets, within the county of Matthews, in said State; and it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to designate a proper place to be the port of entry and delivery within the said district; and to appoint a collector and surveyor of the customs to reside and keep their offices thereat, who shall be entitled to receive, in addition to the fees and other emoluments established by law, the annual salary of two hundred dollars each.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the said last day of June next, Bennet's creek, within the district of Edenton, and State of North Carolina, shall cease to be a port of delivery, as heretofore established, and the office, authority, and emoluments of the surveyor of said port, shall also, from thenceforth, terminate and be discontinued; and a port of delivery, in lieu thereof, shall be established on Salmon creek, within the district aforesaid, at a place called Tombstone; and a surveyor of the customs shall be appointed to reside and keep an office thereat, who shall be entitled to receive for his services, in addition to the fees established by law, the annual salary heretofore allowed to the surveyor of Bennet's creek.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the said last day of June next, a port of delivery shall be established at the mouth of Slade's creek, on the north side thereof, within the district of Washington, and State of North Carolina, on a certain tract of land, intended and designated for a town, whereon William Parmley resides; and a surveyor of the customs shall be appointed to reside and keep an office thereat, who shall be entitled to receive for his services, in addition to the fees established by law, an annual salary of one hundred and fifty dollars.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, there shall, from and after the passing of this act, be established a district, to be called the district of Marietta, which shall include all the waters, shores, and inlets of the river Ohio, on the northern side, and the rivers, waters, and shores connected therewith, above or to the eastward of, and including the river Scioto, from the mouth thereof, upwards, as far as the same may be navigable; and a collector of the customs shall be appointed to reside and keep an office at the town of Marietta, which shall be the sole port of entry and delivery for the said district; and the said collector shall be entitled to receive for his services, in addition to the fees and other emoluments established by law, an annual salary of one hundred and fifty dollars.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to establish, when it shall appear to him to be proper, in addition to the port of entry and delivery already established on the Mississippi, south of the State of Tennessee, one other port of entry and delivery on the said river; and to appoint a collector of the customs to reside and keep an office thereat, and to appoint one or more surveyors to reside at such place or places as he may think proper to designate as ports of delivery only; and the surveyor or surveyors thus appointed shall be subject to the control and direction of the collector within whose district he or they shall reside.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, no duty shall be demanded or collected on merchandise, of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States, or of any foreign country, transported coastwise between the Atlantic ports of the United States, and the districts of the United States on the river Mississippi, or any of its branches, although landed at the port of New Orleans, on its passage; provided the same would not be subject to duty, or liable to seizure, if transported from one district of the United States, on the seacoast, to another: And provided, likewise, That no debenture for a drawback shall have been issued upon the export of such merchandise from the Atlantic ports of the United States to any foreign port or place. And to the end as well that frauds on the revenue may be prevented, as that the coasting vessels of the United States may be permitted to participate in the said trade, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President, is hereby authorized to prescribe and establish such forms and regulations, and the same from time to time, with like approbation, to alter and amend, for the government of the officers of the customs in this respect, as he may think proper and necessary; on the observance of which, merchandise thus transported shall be exempted from duty; and it shall be lawful for the coasting vessels of the United States to be employed in the said trade, and not otherwise.

SEC. 7. And whereas it is provided, by the hundred and fourth section of the collection law, that merchandise belonging to British subjects may be brought (without regard to the character of the vessel importing the same) into the ports of the United States on the northern and northwestern frontiers, subject to no higher or other duties than are or shall be payable by the citizens of the United States, on the importation of the same in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the United States; and it being just and reasonable that the same privilege should be extended to vessels and merchandise belonging to persons residing at New Orleans, and other ports of Louisiana and Florida, on the Mississippi, or any of its branches: Be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, all goods and merchandise, the importation of which into the United States shall not be wholly prohibited, shall and may freely, for the purposes of commerce, be brought into the ports of the United States on the Mississippi, or any of its branches, in vessels belonging to New Orleans, or any other port of Louisiana or Florida, on the Mississippi; and such goods or merchandise shall be subject to no higher or other duties than are payable by the citizens of the United States, on the importation of the same in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the United States.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, no duty on the tonnage of any boat, flat, or raft, or other vessel, shall be demanded or collected on the arrival or entry of such boat, flat, or raft, or other vessel, in any district which is or may be established on the Mississippi, or any of its branches, and on the northern and northwestern boundaries of the United States: Provided, nevertheless, That this exemption shall not be construed to extend to any vessel above fifty tons burden, and which shall not be wholly employed in carrying on inland trade between the ports of the United States on the Mississippi, and its branches, and the ports of Louisiana and Florida, on the same, including New Orleans, and between the ports of the northern and northwestern boundaries of the United States and the British provinces of Upper and Lower Canada.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all that part of the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed on the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, that directs that the collector of the district of Georgetown shall reside at Georgetown, be, and is hereby, repealed.

Approved, May 1, 1802.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for the better and more secure carrying of the mail of the United States on the main post road between Petersburg, in Virginia, and Louisville, in Georgia, the Postmaster General shall be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to engage and contract with private companies, or adventurers, for carrying the mail of the United States, for a term of time not exceeding five years, in mail coaches or stages, calculated to convey passengers therein: Provided, That the expense thereof shall not exceed a sum equal to one-third more than the whole of the present expense incurred for carrying the mail on such road on horseback. And the said Postmaster General may hereafter, at his discretion require, as a stipulation in the contract for carrying the mail from Suffield, in Connecticut, by Windsor, in Vermont, to Dartmouth College, in New Hampshire; that the same shall be conveyed in a carriage or line of stages: Provided, The expense thereof shall not exceed more than one-third the sum heretofore given for carrying the mail on the last mentioned route by a post rider.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of November next, no other than a free white person shall be employed in carrying the mail of the United States, on any of the post roads, either as a post rider or driver of a carriage carrying the mail; and every contractor or person who shall have stipulated, or may hereafter stipulate, to carry the mail, or whose duty it shall be to cause the same to be conveyed, on any of the post roads, as aforesaid, and who shall, contrary to this act, employ any other than a free white person as a post rider or driver, or in any other way, to carry the mail on the same, shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of fifty dollars, one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety thereof to the person who shall sue for, and prosecute the same, before any court having competent jurisdiction thereof.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all letters, packets and newspapers, to and from the Attorney General of the United States, shall be conveyed by post free of postage: Provided, That all letters by him sent be franked in the manner required by the seventeenth section of the act to establish the Post Office.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be authorized to allow the postmasters, at the several distributing offices, such compensation as shall be adequate to their several services in that respect: Provided, That the same shall not exceed in the whole five per cent. on the whole amount of postages on letters and newspapers received for distribution, and that the said allowance be made to commence on the first day of June, in the year one thousand eight hundred: Provided, also, That if the number of mails received at, and despatched from, any such office is not actually increased by the distributing system, then no additional allowance shall be made to the postmaster.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed to the deputy postmaster at the city of Washington, for his extraordinary expenses incurred in the discharge of the duties of his office, an additional compensation, at the rate of one thousand dollars per annum, to be computed from the first day of January last.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not be so construed as to affect any existing contracts for carrying the mail.

Approved, May 3, 1802.

An Act to amend an act, entitled "An act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen;" and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the moneys heretofore collected in pursuance of the several acts, "for the relief of sick and disabled seamen," and at present unexpended, together with the moneys hereafter to be collected by authority of the beforementioned acts, shall constitute a general fund, which the President of the United States shall use and employ, as circumstances shall require, for the benefit and convenience of sick and disabled American seamen: Provided, That the sum of fifteen thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the erection of an hospital in the district of Massachusetts.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to cause such measures to be taken as, in his opinion, may be expedient for providing convenient accommodations, medical assistance, necessary attendance, and supplies, for the relief of sick or disabled seamen of the United States, who may be at or near the port of New Orleans, in case the same can be done with the assent of the government having jurisdiction over the port; and for this purpose, to establish such regulations, and to authorize the employment of such persons as he may judge proper; and that, for defraying the expense thereof, a sum not exceeding three thousand dollars be paid out of any moneys arising from the said fund not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the thirtieth day of June next, the master of every boat, raft, or flat, belonging to any citizen of the United States, which shall go down the Mississippi with intention to proceed to New Orleans, shall, on his arrival at Fort Adams, render to the collector or naval officer thereof, a true account of the number of persons employed on board such boat, raft, or flat, and the time that each person has been so employed, and shall pay to the said collector or naval officer at the rate of twenty cents per month, for every person so employed, which sum he is hereby authorized to retain out of the wages of such person: and the said collector or naval officer shall not give a clearance for such boat, raft, or flat, to proceed on her voyage to New Orleans, until an account be rendered to him of the number of persons employed on board such boat, raft, or flat, and the money paid to him by the master or owner thereof: And if any such master shall render a false account of the number of persons, and the length of time they have severally been employed, as is herein required, he shall forfeit and pay fifty dollars, which shall be applied to, and shall make a part of, the said general fund for the purposes of this act: Provided, That all persons employed in navigating any such boat, raft, or flat, shall be considered as seamen of the United States, and entitled to the relief extended by law to sick and disabled seamen.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and appoint for the port of New Orleans, a fit person to be director of the marine hospital of the United States, whose duties shall be in all instances the same as the directors of the marine hospital of the United States, as directed and required by the act, entitled "An act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen."

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That each and every director of the marine hospital within the United States, shall, if it can with convenience be done, admit into the hospital of which he is director, sick foreign seamen, on the application of the master or commander of any foreign vessel to which such sick seamen may belong; and each seaman so admitted shall be subject to a charge of seventy-five cents per day for each day he may remain in the hospital, the payment of which the master or commander of such foreign vessel shall make to the collector of the district in which such hospital is situated: and the collector shall not grant a clearance to any foreign vessel, until the money due from such master or commander, in manner and form aforesaid, shall be paid; and the director of each hospital is hereby directed, under the penalty of fifty dollars, to make out the accounts against each foreign seaman that may be placed in the hospital, under his direction, and render the same to the collector.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the collectors shall pay the money collected by virtue of this and the act to which this is an amendment, into the Treasury of the United States, and be accountable therefor, and receive the same commission thereon as for other moneys by them collected.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That each and every director of the marine hospital shall be accountable at the Treasury of the United States for the money by them received, in the same manner as other receivers of public money, and, for the sums by them expended, shall be allowed a commission at the rate of one per cent.

Approved, May 3, 1802.

An Act making an appropriation for carrying into effect the Convention between the United States of America and His Britannic Majesty.

Be it enacted, &c., That, for carrying into effect the convention of the eighth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and two, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, the sum of two millions six hundred and sixty-four thousand dollars be, and the same hereby is, appropriated.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the aforesaid sum shall be paid in such instalments, and at such times, as are fixed by the said convention, out of any moneys in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, May 3, 1802.

An Act additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia."

Be it enacted, &c., That the circuit court of the county of Washington, in the Territory of Columbia, shall have power to proceed in all common law and chancery causes, which now are or hereafter shall be instituted before it, in which either of the parties reside without the said Territory, in the same way that non-residents are proceeded against in the general court or in the supreme court of chancery in the State of Maryland.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the circuit court of the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, shall have power to proceed in all common law and chancery causes, which now are or hereafter shall be instituted before it, in which either of the parties are non-residents of said District of Columbia, in the same way, and under the same regulations, observed by the district court or by the high court of chancery in Virginia, in proceeding against non-residents.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the courts for the counties of Alexandria and Washington shall hereafter be holden at the periods following, to wit: for the county of Alexandria, on the fourth Monday of June and November, and for the county of Washington, on the fourth Monday of July and December, in each year; and all process heretofore issued from the offices of the said courts and not yet returned, shall be returnable to the first day of the sessions of the said courts, respectively, and all causes now depending in the same shall stand adjourned and continued over to the next sessions of the said courts, as established by this act. And the said courts are hereby invested with the same power of holding adjourned sessions that are exercised by the courts of Maryland.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no ca-pias ad satisfaciendum shall hereafter issue on any judgment rendered by a single magistrate, or in any case where the judgment, exclusive of costs, shall not exceed twenty dollars; but that in such cases execution shall be only on goods and chattels of the debtor, and shall issue by order of the justice who may have taken cognizance of the action, from the clerk's office, and shall be returnable thereto; that all such executions be returnable on the first Monday in every month, and that the same, and also the warrant to bring the property before the justice, be directed to one of the constables, whose duty it shall be to obey the same; that each of the said constables shall give bond, with one sufficient surety, to be approved of by any one of the district judges, for the faithful execution of the duties of his office, in the sum of five hundred dollars; that the clerk's fees for issuing and filing the return of every such execution, shall be twenty-five cents; the constable's fees for return and service, shall be fifty cents; and that a commission of eight per cent. be allowed the constable for every sum thereon by him levied.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That so much of the original act to which this is a further supplement as confines the jurisdiction of the courts of this Territory to cases between parties who are inhabitants of, or residents within the same, shall not be construed to extend to any case where, by the laws of Maryland and Virginia, respectively, attachments may issue to affect the property of absconding debtors, or others having property within the district, and whose persons are not answerable to the process of the court.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the taxes to be levied in the county of Alexandria shall hereafter be assessed by the justices of the peace of the said county, and the poor of the town and county parts of the said county of Alexandria shall be provided for, respectively, in like manner as the county and corporation courts were authorized to do by the laws of Virginia, as they stood in force within the said county on the first Monday of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no part of the laws of Virginia or Maryland declared by an act of Congress, passed the twenty-seventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, "concerning the District of Columbia," to be in force within the said District, shall ever be construed so as to prohibit the owners of slaves to hire them within, or remove them to, the District, in the same way as was practised prior to the passage of the above recited act.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That so much of two acts of Congress, the one passed the twenty-seventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia;" the other passed the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and one, supplementary to the aforesaid act, as provides for the compensation to be made to certain justices of the peace thereby created, and for compensation to jurors attending the courts within said District, except so much thereof as relates to their travelling expenses attending the same, shall be, and is hereby, repealed; and the jurors, in future, shall serve in the said courts, and be summoned to attend the same in like manner as jurors serve and were summoned in the courts of Virginia, prior to the passage of the above recited act.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That ordinary licenses, retailers' licenses, and hawkers and pedlars' licenses, shall be granted by the circuit court of the said District, in the respective counties, as the same were heretofore granted by the courts of Maryland and Virginia, respectively. And the several judges of the said circuit court shall have like authority to grant such licenses in vacation, as the justices of the courts of Maryland and Virginia heretofore possessed; and the money arising from such licenses shall be applied to the use and benefit of the said counties, respectively, in such manner, and to such purposes, as the justices of the levy courts in the same shall appoint and direct.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the marshal of the District of Columbia be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to cause a good and sufficient jail to be built within the city of Washington, and that a sum not exceeding eight thousand dollars be, and the same hereby is, appropriated to that purpose, to be paid out of any unappropriated moneys in the Treasury.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the corporation of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, shall have full power and authority to tax any particular part or district of the town for paving the streets, lanes, or alleys therein, or for sinking wells, or erecting pumps which may appear for the benefit of such particular part or district: Provided, That the rate of tax so to be levied shall not exceed two dollars per foot front, and that the same shall be enforced and collected in the same manner that the taxes which the said corporation had heretofore been authorized to lay and collect.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That articles inspected at one port in the said District shall not be subject to a second inspection at any other port in the said District.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to cause the militia of the respective counties of Washington and Alexandria to be formed into regiments and other corps, conformably, as nearly as may be, to the laws of Maryland and Virginia as they stood in force in the said counties, respectively, on the first Monday in December, in the year one thousand eight hundred; and that he appoint and commission, during pleasure, all such officers of the militia of the said District as he may think proper; that he be authorized to call them into service in like manner as the Executives of Maryland and Virginia were authorized in the counties of Washington and Alexandria, respectively, on the first Monday of December, one thousand eight hundred; and that such militia, when in actual service, be entitled to the same pay and emoluments as the militia of the United States when called out by the President.

Approved, May 3, 1802.

An Act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, &c., That the inhabitants of the City of Washington be constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of a Mayor and Council of the City of Washington, and by their corporate name, may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, grant, receive, and do all other acts as natural persons, and may purchase and hold real, personal, and mixed property, or dispose of the same for the benefit of the said city; and may have and use a city seal, which may be broken or altered at pleasure. The City of Washington shall be divided into three divisions or wards, as now divided by the levy court for the county, for the purpose of assessment; but the number may be increased hereafter, as in the wisdom of the City Council shall seem most conducive to the general interest and convenience.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Council of the City of Washington shall consist of twelve members, residents of the city, and upwards of twenty-five years of age, to be divided into two chambers, the first chamber to consist of seven members, and the second chamber of five members; the second chamber to be chosen from the whole number of councillors elected, by their ballot. The City Council to be elected annually, by ballot, in a general ticket, by the free white male inhabitants of full age, who have resided twelve months in the city, and paid taxes therein the year preceding the election's being held: the justices of the county of Washington, resident in the city, or any three of them, to preside as judges of election, with such associates as the Council may, from time to time, appoint.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the first election of members for the City Council shall be held on the first Monday in June next, and in every year afterwards, at such place in each ward as the judges of the election may prescribe.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the polls shall be kept open from eight o'clock in the morning till seven o'clock in the evening, and no longer, for the reception of ballots. On the closing of the poll, the judges shall close and seal their ballot-boxes, and meet on the day following in the presence of the marshal of the district, on the first election, and the Council afterwards, when the seals shall be broken, and the votes counted: within three days after such election, they shall give notice to the persons having the greatest number of legal votes, that they are duly elected, and shall make their return to the Mayor of the city.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted. That the Mayor of the city shall be appointed, annually, by the President of the United States: he must be a citizen of the United States, and a resident of the city, prior to his appointment.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the City Council shall hold their sessions in the City Hall, or, until such building is erected, in such place as the Mayor may provide for that purpose, on the second Monday in June, in every year; but the Mayor may convene them oftener, if the public good require their deliberations. Three-fourths of the members of each Council may be a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day: they may compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as they may, by ordinance, provide: they shall appoint their respective Presidents, who shall preside during their sessions, and shall vote on all questions where there is an equal division; they shall settle their rules of proceedings, appoint their own officers, regulate their respective fees, and remove them at pleasure: they shall judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of their own members, and may, with the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole, expel any member for disorderly behaviour, or mal-conduct in office, but not a second time for the same offence: they shall keep a journal of their proceedings and enter the yeas and nays on any question, resolve, or ordinance, at the request of any member, and their deliberations shall be public. The Mayor shall appoint to all offices under the corporation. All ordinances or acts passed by the City Council shall be sent to the Mayor, for his approbation, and when approved by him, shall then be obligatory as such. But if the said Mayor shall not approve of such ordinance or act, he shall return the same within five days, with his reasons in writing therefor; and if three-fourths of both branches of the City Council, on reconsideration thereof, approve of the same, it shall be in force in like manner as if he had approved it, unless the City Council, by their adjournment, prevent its return.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Corporation aforesaid shall have full power and authority to pass all by-laws and ordinances; to prevent and remove nuisances; to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases within the city; to establish night-watches or patrols, and erect lamps; to regulate the stationing, anchorage, and mooring of vessels; to provide for licensing and regulating auctions, retailers of liquors, hackney-
